Seventh—The consciousness of the Kingdom. The present conception and emphasis of the Kingdom is the dominant fact in our modern religious life. There is no lessening sense of the glory and place of the church; rather it is deepened by the growing appreciation that the church is a means, not an end. The Kingdom of God is the end toward which the church is the "altar stairs." It is not that a few shall be saved out of the world, but that the world itself shall be leavened, recognizing all who are training for goodness as composing the Kingdom of God. There has dawned a nobler conception of what Jesus meant when he said "other sheep I have which are not of this fold." All who toil in service for their fellow men are with Christ whether or not they have "gone through the order of salvation with all the mechanical literalness of a recipe." As we return to Jesus as his disciples saw him, we understand that "God is no respecter of persons but he that worketh righteousness is accepted with him." This Kingdom has never been divided, the Church has. The Kingdom shall have no end, the Church will. As the Kingdom consciousness deepens, there is proportionate decline in appreciation of denominational church pride. Men respect the Kingdom more than petty progress in multiplied neighboring churches. Specifically, then, what may we propose as a possible program or policy of the Disciples, cognizant of the temper of the times and of the going of the Almighty?

Churches Must Be Christ-minded.

The necessity of planting a church in any community can only be equalled by the necessity of making its spirit like the mind of Christ. If we are not so to build, there is no duty to build at all. It will be to our condemnation to establish a church which is not born in the atmosphere of mutual coöperation in the life of its community. We must look more zealously to the motive which impels and the spirit which informs the new churches we plant. The largest catholicity should characterize its spirit. It should be planted in the firm conviction and accompanying conduct that it is to be large enough in its fellowship to include every devout soul in that community. The liberty we have proclaimed, the universality of the name we bear, the freedom to the truth and in the truth we profess, ought to make a spiritual home and sufficient foundation for every lover of God within its parish. We shall suffer too deeply for words if we build the narrow house of unrivalled Phariseeism upon such a foundation. If the door is shut to any, let it be the wilful refusal of those outside to enter.

Again, there should be the recognition of the deposit of truth which has proven serviceable in human experience through the centuries. The religious inheritances of men should not nor can be lightly esteemed. We must remember the wise counsel of the Apostle James to the deputation from Antioch and not forget that the Apostle to the Gentiles kept the law through proclaiming its efficacy. All that has survived has some element of spiritual worth in it. St. Paul was always reverent toward all religious conceptions whether Jewish or Pagan. We need all the values of the Christian centuries; they are the survival of the fittest. "All things are ours."

Affirmatively, it is most surely our duty to plant a church wherever it will contribute to the spirit of the Kingdom and is vitally needed. Nothing short of the betrayal of the passion of Jesus can keep us from it. The neglected city, the unentered frontier and the waste foreign field will condemn us if we do not do our share in establishing churches of the living God to witness against the emptiness of the world's vanity and the blight of its materialism.

Upon the catholic basis and in the Christian spirit the "field is white unto harvest" for such churches. It will doubtless become the Christian program, however, to practice at home what we have tentatively agreed to observe abroad: viz., an apportioned territory to a particular communion, for which it becomes peculiarly responsible. There is economy and wisdom in regarding Egypt as the especial field of the United Presbyterians and the Methodists and regular Presbyterians as having peculiar responsibility for Korea. This is valuing the evangelization of the whole world above denominational glory. There remains much land to be possessed in America, and the appalling two-thirds of the non-Christian population in the home land will increasingly compel some such distribution of labor in establishing new churches.

Attitude Toward Overchurched Centers

But what shall be our attitude toward those centers sufficiently churched or overchurched? Whatever may be the policy of other communions, the Disciples of Christ cannot afford to plant one more church in any such overchurched community. It will be but adding to the scandal of sectarianism. All the voices of truth and love of this generation will condemn such a program. Our only hope in being able to establish and maintain such a church would be in winning converts from other communions, and in such an atmosphere we would make them twofold more the sons of sectarianism than before. We should not be lured into such an effort by the call of a few Disciples who live there. No stray preacher or over-zealous evangelist can be a friend of this movement and perpetuate such a program. In a single state there are 1,700 churches dying or closed in small villages and country places. A great majority of these were in overchurched communities. If we still insist on entering any community which has less than 500 of its population to a given church, we shall affront the finest spiritual culture of our generation and rob our plea for unity of faith in its sincerity and bolt every avenue of approach. The pathetic experience which we have shared with others in that vast number of closed churches which hold their ghastly spires toward the sky to condemn us for our waste of the money of the Kingdom, and of something vastly more important, the good will among Christian brothers, condemns such a policy.

An Argument Met.

But it will be argued that our very traditions and inheritance compel us to go to the divided church of our generation as well as to the non-Christian world. None of us care to deny that statement; we are all happy to assent to it. But how shall we go to the divided church of an overchurched community? It is a violation of the law of love and brotherliness to go in a controversial or antagonistic spirit. It is equally un-Christian to add one more church to any such community. Have we any business there at all? Let us answer emphatically, yes. Let us regard our relation to any such community as one of spiritual intrusion. If there are no other communions prepared to share with us the unselfish propaganda of the plea for Christian union is such sadly rent places, then let the Disciples of Christ choose out from among them those rare and choice spirits upon whose hearts God has laid the burden of a divided church, who may go with such tactful winsomeness to all such communities and gather together, as far as possible, the varied communions to hear from these impassioned souls the yearning of God and the prayer of Jesus, and to discover some possible basis of local cooperation if not of union. But it will not be necessary, neither would it be wise for the Disciples of Christ to undertake such a propaganda alone. It would be misunderstood. There are other communions ready to share this most important mission. If such a joint commission were to espouse this peculiar task representing the host of Christians of America, the plea would be heard. At least this is the most the Disciples can afford to do toward organized church life in overchurched communities.

What shall be our attitude toward larger centers of population in which there are many churches already at work located in the most accessible portions of that population? It is well to remember that proximity is not sectarianism. Because a group of churches may occupy a single city block is not at all a mark of un-Christian hostility, nor indeed, is it proof of an overchurched community. Almost any city with radiating avenues finds it necessary to group its industries and business activities which in themselves are not antagonistic but proportionately accessible and indeed possibly helpful one to another. The same possibility may obtain within a group of churches in any given city. Its scattered membership throughout the city would make it most inconvenient to establish a church anywhere but in a commonly accessible section. What one church may do the others in that community may be compelled to do, and yet not all of them combined be able to hold all the people of that community should they choose to go to church, nor indeed be able to minister to their spiritual needs. Consequently proximity should not be misinterpreted as rivalry. The common tasks of social amelioration are assumed more easily because of proximity. Such centers, therefore, do not prohibit either by the spirit of the time or by the overchurched condition the establishment of a new church in their midst.

Caring for Churches Already Planted

The administration and supervision of hundreds of churches we have planted is as incumbent upon us and as essential to our future program as the policy of planting new churches. Our conduct in the new field can be greatly influenced by our conduct in occupied territory. It is a common occurrence, for example, among Congregationalists and Presbyterians to trade territory. Where two small churches representing these communions are barely existing, a mutual exchange is made by absorbing the Congregationalists in one place and the Presbyterians in another. Such consummations have not been infrequent among other religious bodies. We have a few illustrations of union with the Baptists and even with the Congregationalists which encourage us to hope for an increasing practice in the future. Invitations have come to Disciple ministers to become pastors of other communions. All these invitations should be accepted. We need the testimony which such practical coöperation will bear. Dr Dixon, a Baptist minister, had a most happy and profitable ministry as pastor of Moody Church (Congregational) in Chicago. He declared he was not less free to speak his convictions on baptism than he would have been in a Baptist church. Those who were thus led to be immersed he immersed. Those who still preferred to be sprinkled were cared for by the church officers.

All such practice of union must clearly be a matter of the heart rather than of the head. If we wait to reason out a basis of doctrinal faith and action we shall wait in a thousand places, until God's day of opportunity has gone by. The youth to be saved or lost, the blight or health of the life of the community and the civic welfare constitute an immediate appeal of infinitely more importance to the Father Jesus revealed than all the values of our doctrinal exactness. What have we been doing with the Judgment picture Jesus gives in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew, that we can tithe the anise and cummin of the letter of the law while unspeakable moral and physical waste of life goes on in our very streets? We cannot escape the crime of moral debauch we commit in a continued insistence upon the letter. "Everywhere the letter killeth but nowhere else has it been so sadly fatal as at this point. The unspiritually minded have naturally sought some test of membership in the Kingdom less exigent than the spirit of Christ; and the mechanically minded have painfully scanned the letter in a mechanical way without penetrating the spirit at all. But tests without the spirit only leave us in confusion; and when we have the spirit we can manage some things without the texts."

A Broad Vision Needed.

The prosecution of any policy of planting new churches can only be successful when our various home missionary boards and secretaries are constantly possessed with a vision of the Kingdom beyond the boundaries of our own household of faith. There is an ambition to report new churches organized, and an unwillingness to report merged congregations, both of which must have a new birth. We must choose the farthest visioned men among us as state secretaries and then be willing to support them in such a policy even if they report lost sheep from the fold of congregations. Charles M. Sheldon in our city declared recently that he would not favor planting a new Congregational church in any town in Kansas where there were other churches at work. We have heard the lamentation for decades that so many county seats of a given state were unrepresented by a church of the Disciples. Yet every such county seat is already sufficiently or overchurched. The new program will rejoice with St. Paul "that in every way whether in pretense or in truth Christ is preached."

The whole question is one of spirit and leadership. We have no hierarchy to formulate a policy nor ecclesiastical machinery to enforce it. Wherever ministers and churches "seek first the Kingdom," sincerely share the coöperative efforts of their communities, and live the passion of Jesus, there this policy of the Disciples will have come. Our missionary boards may assist materially in determining this spirit by guarding carefully the fields where men and money are to be sent. But it will remain for the great mass of liberty-loving Disciples, each man of whom is free to "do that which seemeth good in his own eyes," to build into the Kingdom, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, such churches as shall have the nail prints of service and the Son of Man walking in their midst.

Arthur G. Leonard, the president of the Union Stock Yards Co., Chicago, thinks that the increase in the price of meats is easily explained. He says: "For the period since January 1, as compared with the same period of 1912, there has been a total decrease in the receipts at Chicago of 646,600 meat animals of every type, amounting to an aggregate of 200,000,000 pounds. The high prices are due to the shortage and the shortage is due largely to the wiping out of a large amount of the range country and its division into smaller farms," continues Mr. Leonard. "The shortage has been increasing for the last seven years and it will take a like period to build up the cattle-raising industry so that any material reduction in prices will be possible. During the last year the decrease in the supply has amounted to one pound of meat per capita each month."

Disciples' Table Talk

Fighting Evil at "Old Vincennes."

"I am personally little troubled about how evil began in the world," declared E. F. Daugherty, pastor at Vincennes, Indiana, and just now engaged in a fight with the evil forces in that city, "but I'm majorly troubled by its present existence and the activities of those whose specialty is the extension of its power. My life and your life has little to do with the past—the origin of things—or with their endings; the weight of present responsibility is on our shoulders, and the battles which try our souls are present battles—for, it's ours to feel the heel of evil on our necks in shameless subjection to its sway, or to stand in the majesty of moral manhood and have the law observed, the law which is the only human guarantee of rights and liberties." Commenting on the evil powers which possessed men of the Bible time, the minister showed with what pitiless severity Jesus dealt with them. "Between the cause of Christ and the cause of Satan, here or anywhere," he said, 'it has been, and will continue to be a fight to a finish, a war without quarter. God or Mammon shall possess this world in time, God or Mammon shall have the life and love of every man. The issue is ceaselessly on, and will be settled by a conflict of ages. Through it all the cry of the powers of evil has been, 'Let us alone—what have we to do with Thee, Thou Jesus of Nazareth,' and the unmistakable truth may always have a rational emphasis, 'for this cause the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil,' even with their boasted unchallenged and impudent strength in Old Vincennes; a purpose which, however it may halt and drag in our town, about the world presses on and on to consummation—a purpose conquering, and here, in God's good time, to conquer."

Ohio's Large Sunday-Schools.

Probably the largest Men's Bible class in the country is that at Nelsonville, O., taught by R. A. Doan, graduate of Hiram College and prominent business man. On a recent Sunday 1,041 men were in attendance at the regular session of the class, while its average attendance for some weeks has been in the neighborhood of 500. Another "feature" in modern Sunday-school history is the school at Canton, Ohio, directed by P. H. Welshimer. Probably no city of its size in America has so large a per cent of its voters actually attending Sunday-school. It is encouraging to know that such an army of Bible men and women are at the guns in Canton, where, according to "The American Issue," the city council recently made it legal for the saloons to keep open twenty-four hours a day.

How About the Rural Churches?

Grant K. Lewis believes that the greatest single question before the Disciples of Christ to-day in the way of church conservation and statesmanship is that of the rural church. Recent estimates, based upon definite statistics gathered from representative communities, show that during the last decade, including all denominations, 1,600 churches were deserted in Ilinois, 750 in Missouri, 600 in Tennessee, 300 in Kentucky, 200 in Louisiana, and over 10,000 in the entire country. The abandonment of these churches has been accompanied by the removal of a large number of owners of farms and their occupancy by tenants. The Department of Agriculture has sounded a warning in repeated bulletins, declaring this to be one of the greatest dangers to country life in America. It may be safely said that eight out of every ten of our churches are either in the open country, a little village, or a town of 2,500 or under. A study of more than 700 country and village churches, made by the Presbyterian Department of Rural Life, in communities as widely separated as Missouri, Illinois, Indiana and Pennsylvania, show fully sixty per cent of them as either dead or on the decline. There is a tremendous revolution going on in the life of the country church. We have no reason to believe that our churches are any better off than the average. The above report shows that we are among the most vigorous in the communities investigated, but not that we are any exception to the general rule. In our small village and country churches we certainly have a problem that challenges our deepest concern. It is encouraging to note that the American Society has organized a department of social service which has already begun special studies of this problem. We have the assurance that a thorough investigation will be made in Illinois through a committee appointed by the State Board of which H. H. Peters is chairman; in Nebraska by a committee of which H. O. Pritchard of the Cotner church is chairman; in Missouri by A. W. Taylor, secretary of the Social Service Commission; and in Indiana by Professor Lumley of the College of Missions.

Mission Forces Uniting for Efficiency.

The Home and Foreign Mission Societies of America have decided to enter a great united missionary campaign next September. There is to be a five months' educational campaign during which time one thousand conferences and conventions are to be held throughout the land. Then, next March is to be used for a nation-wide every-member canvass for home and foreign missions. F. M. Rains declares that this is the most significant campaign of modern times. It is a hopeful sign that an avalanche of orders for Children's Day supplies is coming to the mission rooms at Cincinnati. Eight hundred more schools have ordered supplies than at this time last year. There seems to be no doubt that the Sunday-schools will give $100,000 for foreign missions this year. A news item that will interest many is that great anxiety is expressed concerning the health of James Ware, our veteran missionary at Shanghai, China. He is said to be but a shadow of his former self. Mr. Ware has been in the service of the Foreign Society for about thirty years.

R. H. Miller's Work in Buffalo Appreciated.

The close of R. H. Miller's ten years' work at the Richmond Avenue Church, Buffalo, was fittingly celebrated, and as a substantial token of appreciation of the good service that has been given this church by Mr. Miller and wife, the congregation has granted a three months' leave of absence and a purse of money for a tour in Europe. Mr. and Mrs. Miller sailed from New York April 19. On the evening of April 9, more than two hundred members of the congregation tendered its pastor and his wife a reception in tht Community House, appropriate services reviewing the work having been held Mar. 30. It was in 1903 that Mr. Miller accepted a call to this church, having been preceded there by J. L. Wharton, J. M. Trible, F. W. Norton, Lloyd Darsie, B. A. Jenkins and J. M. Philputt. The following are some of the achievements that have marked the period of Mr. Miller's faithful pastorate: In 1904 the church became a Living Link in both foreign and home missions; in that year the missionary offerings became 47 per cent of the total money raised in the church; in 1906 the National Convention was entertained at Buffalo, Mr. Miller heading the convention committee; in 1911 a $40,000 Community House, with complete facilities for Sunday-school, including gymnasium and club house, was built; in 1911 the church entertained the Jubilee Convention of the State Missionary Society, the greatest in its history; in 1912 the Church School was organized and seventy-five students were graduated from the school of church methods; with the beginning of 1913 the congregation was organized on the group or parish plan; the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, the largest society in the state, is now a Living Link in missions. During Mr. Miller's ten years' ministry 565 have been added to the church. Besides doing faithful service within the church, Mr. Miller has done notable work in behalf of the High School Bible Club, the Y. M. C. A., the Boy Scouts, and the teacher training movement.

Our Duty to the East.

Speaking about the duty of the Disciples in evangelizing the crowded districts of our east coast, L. E. Sellers, of Philadelphia, offers the following pertinent argument:

"We do not need to establish our cause in the East because she is not already religious or because here people are not already supplied with religious institutions. Our apology for doing work in this great and hungry field is that these millions are entitled to the best type of religious instruction and church life obtainable. It is not enough to be religious. The Moslem is religious. Why not in being religious seek the fountain heads, turning away from the pools and cisterns of men's construction, that the sweet waters of Christ and his Church as they flow from the New Testament may satisfy every thirst of the soul? Man is entitled to the best. Obviously tradition, formalism, credal bondage, over-worked ecclesiastical machinery and other devices of men that divide the body of Christ have been substituted for the plain, simple teaching of our Lord respecting the individual life and the democracy of his Church. Just here is where the Disciples of Christ may and must render a signal service. Our task in the East is not merely to evangelize but to correct, crooked things must be made straight. Things religious must be placed in their order of precedence, and the beauty and necessity of a return to the Christ ideals must be shown and insisted upon."

"Christ More than Career."

"Matthew was a young man with a fine position as a tax collector for the Roman government, but he gave it up to follow Christ. He did not make this change of employment because he expected to reap any personal advantage, but because he saw a chance thereby to be of greater service to the world," said W. F. Richardson, pastor of First Church, Kansas City, in a lecture to young men recently. "This young man had a promise of a business career that must have been the envy of the other young men of his time. He held a position of trust where industry and honesty would pay richly in promotion; but he saw the way to a better career, so he resigned."

Illinois Wins Scholar.

The church at Centralia, Ill., is fortunate in securing the services of D. S. Robinson as its minister. Mr. Robinson will begin his work May 1. He is a graduate of Butler College and of Yale University, having received his M. A. and B. D. degrees from the latter institution last June. He led his class in scholarship and carried off all the honors, including the Hooker Fellowship, which entitled him to spend the past year in Marburg, Germany, where he took special work in theology. Mrs. Robinson is a graduate of Butler, also of Indiana State University.

"Preacher Most Important Man."

"The preacher is the most important man in any town, potentially. He is not only the most interesting man, but he is the last one in the community that the people would allow to die. Sermon making is the biggest job in a town. It stirs the whole country upside down when it is done right. A minister can do more good on Sunday than is done by others all week." This was the declaration of President Joseph L. Garvin, of William Woods College, Fulton, Mo., in an address delivered at the closing session of the Central Illinois Christian Ministerial Institute, recently held at Lincoln, Ill.

Unifying at Anniston.

The church at Anniston, Ala., has combined its Sunday-school and communion and preaching services into one, moving the Sunday-school hour up from 9:30 to 10 a. m. The minister, L. C. Carawan, makes a fifteen minute appeal and gives the invitation at the close of the lesson period, during which the teachers have striven to prepare the hearts and minds of the scholars for the reception of the minister's message. Ths plan is found to be far more satisfactory and effective than the conventional method of morning services.

Kansas City (Kan.) Minister on Prohibition.

Writing to a a friend in a state that is not as dry as Kansas, Elmore Sinclair, pastor of Grandview Church, Kansas City, Kan., says of the effectiveness of prohibition in that state: "It looks as if state prohibition has ended saloon rule here forever. We have twenty-eight counties without a single inmate in their poor houses, forty-nine counties without a single prisoner in the penitentiary, and thirteen counties sent only one each in a year. This city (Kansas City) has not lost much by putting out the saloon. In the first three years of law enforcement rule the city treasury had $300,000 surplus; before it was bankrupt. Homicides have decreased fifty per cent, taxes decreased nearly one-half, and bank deposits have grown thirty-seven per cent."

Syracuse, N. Y., Discussing Union.

A Syracuse daily paper, speaking of the recent talk of church unity, especially on the part of the Episcopalians and Disciples, has the following: "Federation of churches, especially the amalgamation of the Episcopal Church and the Church of Christ, Disciples, with its two flourishing churches in this city, continues the topic of the hour in the religious world. At the meeting of the Clericus Club, composed of Episcopal clergymen at St. Paul's parish house this morning, the topic was taken up by the clergymen, with discussion continuing this afternoon. The Methodist preachers' meeting discussed federation at length, and Arthur Braden of the Central Church of Christ in an interview this morning declared that he hoped that the union of his church with the Episcopal Church would be consummated."

S. G. Inman Talks of Mexico.

Invited by Hugh McLellan, pastor at San Antonio, Texas, to speak in the Central Church of that city, S. G. Inman, missionary at C. P. Diaz (changed to Piedras Negras), had something to say regarding conditions in that unfortunate country. Taking as his text, "And other sheep I have which are not of this fold—there shall be one fold and one shepherd," he applied it to conditions in Mexico, and the responsibility of the United States toward our sister country, bringing out the fact that intervention would not solve her problems any more than the "iron hand" had mastered it; but, the religion of Jesus Christ alone, with the loving helpfulness that gives instruction to the eighty per cent of human beings who can neither read nor write, that lifts up the fallen, succors the poor and needy, becomes their "brother's keeper" and guides to "one fold and one shepherd"—such religion will bring peace and prosperity to Mexico.

The North Dallas Church, Dallas, Texas, is planning a new building.

Oklahoma City, First Church, entertained a school of methods April 14-18.

Yorktown, Ind., entertained the convention of the Sixth District of Indiana, April 8 and 9.

C. C. Buckner, of Irving Park Church, Chicago, reports a Sunday-school dinner held April 14 at the Y. M. C. A. Cafeteria.

The church at Kenton, Ohio, has pledged itself to support Miss Emma Sorgen as a "living link" missionary in the foreign field.

A. R. Liverett, pastor at Jefferson City, Mo., has been elected president of the Chautauqua Board of that city for the coming year.

A movement is on foot among members of the church at Franklin, Tenn., to raise $10,000 for the erection of a new building. Over half this amount has already been subscribed.

At the roll call of the New York churches the following reports of additions were given: East Orange, 21; 169th Street, 2; Russian, 2; Flatbush, 14; Greenpoint, 6; Central, 11.

Sumner T. Martin and wife, of San Rialto, Cal., will celebrate the 25th anniversary of their marriage on May 4. Mr. Martin writes that friends are invited to be present on this occasion.

The Baptist, M. E., Presbyterian and Disciple Churches of Oelwein, Ia., are conducting a union meeting. A tabernacle has been prepared for the sessions. C. L. McKim is pastor of our church at Oelwein.

The Russian Mission, New York City, celebrated its fifth anniversary Sunday, April 6. An elaborate program, including addresses by P. F. Jerome and Joseph Keevil, was enjoyed by the two hundred present.

J. T. Shreve, pastor at Ottawa, Kans., spoke before the Kansas State Ministerial Association of Christian Pastors, April 8. The meeting was held at Emporia. Mr. Shreve's topic was, "The Minister in His Pulpit."

John T. Houser, of Davenport, Ia., was the principal speaker at a recent banquet given in Davenport by the Brotherhood of the United Brethren Church of that place. Mr. Houser discussed the topic, "The Bible and Why We Should Study It."

E. E. Elliott, secretary of our National Brotherhood, addressed the Central Illinois Ministers' Institute at Lincoln, April 9, and the ministerial student body at Eureka College heard him April 19 on the subject of "Making Good in the Local Church."

The Central Illinois Ministerial Institute, which met at Lincoln, Ill., elected the following as officers for the coming year: President, David H. Shields, Eureka; vice-president, George W. Wise, Lincoln; secretary-treasurer, R. H. Newton, Atlanta.

Charles Reign Scoville, who was engaged in an evangelistic campaign at Lincoln, Neb., at the time of W. J. Bryan's recent birthday celebration, served as one of the speakers on that occasion. The Commoner reported Mr. Scoville's speech with evident appreciation.

Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, addressed a luncheon at the First Church, Springfield, on the plan of unity proposed by the Disciples. At this luncheon were present over 150 ministers and church workers of several denominations, invited by F. W. Burnham, pastor at Springfield.

Judge Curtiss D. Wilbur, of Los Angeles Superior Court, gave an address at a recent banquet of the Men's Bible class, at Pomona, Cal. This class has an enrollment of 142. Miss Edith Apperson went to the Congo field, in Africa, April 3, as the representative of the earnest church at Pomona.

W. G. Johnston, superintendent of missions and city evangelist at St. Louis, has resigned from that position to accept the pastorate of the Hammett Place Christian Church in that city. Mr. Johnston has been in charge of St. Louis missions for the last two years. The Hammett Place Church is considering building a new edifice on a location farther west.

The Association of Colleges of the Christian Church which held its annual spring conference at Christian University, Canton, Mo., considered, among other problems, the Christian Missionary Society to supply 2,000 college graduates a year for eight years—1,000 in the foreign field and 1,000 in the home field—to meet the needs of enlargement.

Since the destruction by fire, in January, of the First Church at Findlay, O., some negotiations looking to a union of our two congregations in that city have been in progress. As to the advisability of this union considerable diversity of opinion appears to exist, and at the present time it iooks as if the First Church will erect a new building in the territory served by the one recently destroyed.

The churches of the Fifth District of Indiana held their annual convention April 10 and 11, at Fort Wayne. Forty-five churches were represented at the meetings. On the program, among others, were Garry L. Cook and L. E. Murray, of Indianapolis; R. A. Bennett, of Marion; Alice W. Cole, of Huntington; Mrs. O. H. Griest, of Carlisle; Mrs. E. W. Taylor of Indianapolis and Joseph Todd, of Bloomington.

W. J. Wright recently raised $680 to continue the church at Mayfield, Ky., a living link in the Foreign Society. Mr. Wright has been holding a meeting at this place, where J. J. Castleberry ministers. With the Sunday-school collections added, the missionary offering from Mayfield this year will be over $1,000. On the last Sunday of the meeting Mr. Wright raised $4,000 to pay off the debt on the parsonage and reading room.

The mass meeting of the Disciples' Missionary Union, New York, will be held at Borough Park Church, May 13, at 8 p. m. The program will especially emphasize Sunday-school work. H. B. McCormick will speak on "The Sunday-school as the Recruiting Agency of the Church," J. M. Philputt on "The Sunday-school as the Teaching Agency of the Church," and Guy L. Carter, Eastern Sunday-school Superintendent for the Disciples of Christ, on "The Newest Things in the Sunday-school World."

Dr. Edwin A. Layton, returned missionary from Africa, addressed the Livingstone Centenary service observed at Seattle, First Church. This church has closed the second quarter of the present fiscal year with all financial obligations met. Both local and missionary obligations are cared for by weekly offerings. A progressive step that has just been taken is the appointment by the Sunday-school of a missionary committee, whose task it is to extend and unify the missionary activities of the church.

The Disciples' Missionary Union, New York City, supports seven missions, widely scattered. There are two in New Jersey, one in Manhatten, three in Brooklyn and one in Queens. These missions represent a work among the Russians, Poles and Americans. The reports of the missions for March show the following splendid work done: days of service, 84; baptisms, 18; other additions, 2; average attendance at Bible-schools, 600; average attendance at church services, 301; total money raised, $476.32.

Some good things are reported from the church at Franklin, Ind., W. J. Wright, pastor. The congregation raised $105 for the relief of Disciples in Indianapolis who suffered from the floods, sending in addition several wagon loads of clothing, bedding, fruit, furniture, etc. A good move on the part of the church is the organization of a Young People's Society of Social and Religious Service, which will seek to be of service to the community throughout the year, being especially a medium of aid in times of disaster.

The Central Church, Terre Haute, George Darsie, minister, reports the following recent events in its church life: A special Sunday-school session, entertained by the Rose Polytechnic Mandolin Club, of Terre Haute; a rally for men and boys, with aim set at 500 men and boys present; a rally for women and girls; and a Mothers' Day. A grand Army Day is also being arranged for. This church reports twenty additions during March. A flood and tornado relief fund of $250 was raised by the congregation, together with the donation of much food and clothing.

F. C. Lake and A. B. Houze, pastors at Lima, O., write that the Central and South Side Churches unite in extending a cordial invitation to all Ohio Disciples to attend the Lima Convention, May 19-22. The convention sessions will be held in the new and commodious Central building on West North street. Much confusion will be avoided if delegates will inquire for the Central Church of Christ. Another religious body is known locally as the First Christian Church. Homes will be open to delegates at $.75 for lodging and breakfast. Luncheon and dinner can be had at good hotels and restaurants at popular prices. The management asks that those expecting to attend give early notice of that fact.

Louis S. Cupp began his fourth year as Chancellor of Christian University, Canton, Mo., April 1. Last year he collected $180,265 for the school. The total cash results of his work to date are $311,284, which refers wholly to new resources and does not include tuitions or income from endowment. Christian University now has over $400,000 invested, of which $230,000 is in productive endowment. Outstanding obligations amount to about $12,000. Last year two new dormitories, gymnasium and central heating and lighting plant were erected and equipped at a cost of over $90,000. Mr. Cupp reports that the school needs $30,000 for an Institute of Fine Arts, $2,000 for books,

A GREAT AND POPULAR CHURCH MUSIC BOOK

The New Praise Hymnal

By GILBERT J. ELLIS and J. H. FILLMORE

The New Praise Hymnal comes as near being the ideal church hymnal for the present day as could well be conceived. It is a handsome book, dignified in appearance and make-up. It embraces in its contents as nearly everything demanded to-day as could be gotten into a book of 600 pages.

The New Praise Hymnal is practical in every way; everything in it is available for use in the average congregation. It contains what is used by the most advanced churches. The setting of the hymns and music is engaging to the eye and pleasant to read and sing.

It is a book that grows in favor as it is used. New beauties are discovered from time to time as its pages are tested. The hymns and tunes of the church universal are found in The New Praise Hymnal, also the best available Gospel Songs that the modern church has found to be necessary to its various activities.

The sales of The New Praise Hymnal are larger now than they have ever been. The sales are increasing day by day. This means that it meets the demands better than any other book. Sample Copies mailed for examination.

Prices: Silk Cloth Sides, Leather Back, at $70 per 100; Vellum Cloth, at $50 per 100.

New Invention SELF-HEATING IRON

The "Standard" Makes and Contains Its Own Heat

Works while it is heating, heats while it is working. Saves miles of walking.

Saves Its Cost Every Month

Economical, perfectly safe, convenient. The "Standard" is stove, fuel, heat—all in one. Fire is Inside. Carry it about, go where you please. Don't stay in hot kitchen; iron any place, any room. Go right along, one thing after another. All kinds of clothes.

IRONED BETTER IN HALF THE TIME

No waiting, no stopping to change irons. Right heat. Easily regulated. No time wasted. Iron on table all the time, one hand on the iron, the other to turn and fold the clothes. The "Standard" is neat, durable and compact; all parts within radius of iron and handle. No tanks nor fittings standing out at sides or ends to hinder or be in the way. No wires or hose attached to both er. Right size, right shape, right weight. Cheapest fuel, one to two cents does ordinary family ironing.

WHAT USERS SAY.

Alex Stalker of N. Y. writes: "The Self Heating Iron received sometime ago and will say right here it is the most useful time and money-saving device that was ever made. My wife has just finished a large ironing in two hours that usually took her half a day with the old stove heating irons, and the house is cool. It is certainly just the only iron made. We want the agency." W. P. Farnum: "After receiving your iron and giving it a thorough trial it will be a perfect success. My wife is enthusiastic over the work it does and the economy in its use." Mrs. J. E. King, Ill.: "Received iron yesterday in good shape. Well pleased with it. I want the agency." I. N. Newby, Ill.: "Find it to be all you claim for it." Mrs. Josephine Route, N. Y. "Received the iron O. K. and did my ironing with it yesterday. I like it very much." A. E. Covert, N. Y.: "Have lighted it several times already and find I can do ironing so much quicker and cleaner than in the old way. Think it is the best thing I have ever had in my house." Miss Roxie Sheets, of N. C.: "The two irons received and am delighted. Have turned off our regular ironer and will do the ironing ourselves now. Sold the extra iron to the first lady I showed it to." Mrs. Watson C. McNall, N. Y.: "I am more than pleased with it and its work. It is not a bit clumsy. It is a delight to use it." Mrs. Cora Wright, Ill.: "I received the iron Saturday and like it fine." Mrs. C. M. Winstead, Ky.: "I received my iron about three weeks ago. Like it better than anything I ever saw in the way of irons."

"Standard"

So they go—hundreds and thousands of delighted customers—the work of ironing cut in half—the expense of fuel almost eliminated—a God send to every home. The poor can afford it—the rich can buy nothing better. Every iron tested before shipping—fully guaranteed—ready for use when received. Price low—$4.50. Sent anywhere.

AGENTS MAKE MONEY. Men or women. Quick, easy, sure. All year business. Experience not necessary. Sells on merit—sells itself. They buy on sight. Every home a prospect. Every woman needs it. Price low—all can afford it. HOW THEY DO SELL! Even 2 or 3 a day gives $27 to $30 a week profit; 6 sales a day is fair for an agent; some will sell a dozen in one day. Show 10 families—sell 8. Not sold in stores. Send no money. Write postal today for description, agents selling plan. How to get FREE SAMPLE.

Professor R. L. Records, Dean of Virginia Christian College, Lynchburg, Va., has been appointed to a professorship in the Science Department of Transylvania University. After taking his baccalaureate degree in Franklin College, receiving the highest grade up to that time by any student of the institution, Prof. Records attended The College of the Bible, at Lexington, where he received his classical diploma. Later he won his Master's degree in Transylvania, writing his thesis in the field of fossil botany. During the last three years he has been a professor in Virginia Christian College, and has rendered service in that institution which has won for him a high place in the field of education. Professor Records is pursuing courses in Chicago University, from which institution he will in the near future receive the doctorate.

A Half Year of Chuch Extension

The following is a statement of comparative receipts for the first six months, this year and last:

Churches.

For this year	$7,497.03
For last year	8,794.07
Faling off this year	$1,297.04

Individuals.

For this year	$35,401.98
For last year	43,836.57
Falling off this year	$1,297.04
Total receipts for this year	$42,899.01
Total falling off for this year	$ 9,731.57

It will be noted that, for the first six months, we had a falling off in receipts of $9,731.57. This is due to the fact that last year in the month of March we received a $10,000 annuity, a $5,000 annuity, a $2,000 annuity and two $1,000 annuities.

At our April meeting the following loans were granted: Dallas, Texas, South Church, $3,000; Hydro, Okla., $700; Indianola, Miss., (Colored) $300; Adairville, Ky., $300; Russellville, Ky., First Church, $5,000, annuity money; Mabton, Wash., $800; Kimberly, Ida., $800; Erie City, Pa., $3,000; Elwood, Nebr., $1,000, annuity money; Baker, Ore., First Church, $1,500 annuity money; Great Falls, Mont., $2,500; Pekin, Ill., $2,000, annuity money; Louisville, Ky., Crescent Hill Church, $3,000 and Greeley, Colo., $10,000, 4 per cent.

During the month of March the following loans were closed: Laverne, Okla., (Cedar Rapids Church Fund), $500; Westville, Okla., (St. Louis, Compton Heights Church Fund), $750; Jackson, Miss., First Church, (Annuity Fund), $3,000; Bonners Ferry, Ida. (Walker Cowherd Memorial Fund), $300; Richland, Mo. (General Fund), $1,500; Azusa, Calif. (General Fund), $1,750; Moccasin, Mont., (Sunday-school Fund), $400; Fairview, Okla. (Annuity Fund), $1,500; Winslow, Ark. (Nell B. Ford Fund), $350.

During the first six months of the present missionary year we have helped to build forty-six churches in loans aggregating $102,450.

Since our last report we have received an annuity of $4,000 from a friend in Michigan; $1,000 from a friend in Ohio and $250 from another friend in Ohio who has made repeated gifts to our Annuity Fund.

People that can give annuity money ought to put it into the Church Extension Fund instead of putting it into insurance.

Good Work at Peoria, Ill.

The Central Church, Peoria, reports seventy added at regular services, during the ten months' pastorate of M. L. Pontius. At a recent Sunday evening service eight hundred were in attendance. Mr. Pontius is becoming popular as an occasional speaker. He will address the I. O. O. F. lodges of Peoria April 27, and the K. of P's. in May.

The Rural Church Discussed.

J. W. Street, of Mackinaw, Ill., recently read a paper before the Peoria Ministerial Association, taking as his theme "The Rural Church." The address received special commendation from the Association.

A SPLENDID OPPORTUNITY to Make Money, Both Men and Women. WRITE TODAY.

How often have many lady readers longed for the death of the old stove-heated sad iron and the hard, tiresome, hot days work it means to them each week—for the man that cut ironing day in two.

He lives—a genius of Cincinnati has invented a device that is proving a blessing to women folks. Made ironing day troubles all over—changed—there's a new way of ironing—astonishing but true. The family ironing can now be done in less than half the time—less than half the work, and with one-tenth the usual fuel expense. No running back and forth between stove and ironing board—iron where you please—you do not need to stay in the hot kitchen—iron in any room—on porch—under shade of tree if you wish. No drudgery—that is past. Goodbye to the old style stove heated irons. The easy way of ironing is here to bless our dear women.

SEE HOW SIMPLE, DIFFERENT, EASY

Light the iron; set it for the amount of heat desired. See how rapidly the hot iron slides over the damp clothes, ironing and pressing them quickly and easily, the smooth point in and out of the gathers, tucks and ruffles, drying them as it goes. Nothing to delay; it is hot, keeps hot, runs easily and smoothly. Iron on the table all the time, one hand on the iron—the other to smooth, turn and fold the clothes. It is a fast iron, you unconsciously move quickly to keep up with it. You can go as fast as you choose, and the clothes are ironed better and in one-half the time.

No waiting with this iron. Go right along, one thing after another. Irons all kinds of goods. No time wasted—iron right heat; regulate it to the required amount for any kind of ironing. If you want more heat, turn it on; if you want less heat, turn some off. Always ready for use when you want it. Just light the iron and go ahead, you don't need to build a fire in the kitchen range and wait for three or four irons to heat. With the Self-Heating Iron you have the iron when you want it, where you want it, and with the heat you want; whether you want to do a big ironing, or whether you want to press and iron only a few pieces. Sounds strange, may be hard to believe—but listen, the writer saw it demonstrated—it's all true. No experiment—going on daily. THOUSANDS ARE IN USE and customers are delighted. It not only irons white goods, finest laces, curtains, but anything that can be ironed by the old method. Saves time, fuel, health and money. Well and durably made, will last for years. Right size, right weight, right shape. Perfectly safe—anyone can use it.

HUNDREDS A WEEK

While at the factory in Cincinnati, the writer found that this invention has caused remarkable excitement all over the U. S. FACTORY ALREADY RUSHED WITH THOUSANDS OF ORDERS. Evidently the company's agents are making big money, as they offer big commissions to active agents, and will also send a free sample to those who mean business.

It will be noticed from the engraving that this iron is different from any other iron. Construction very simple—easily and safely operated by anyone, and built on the latest scientific principles.

It will be seen that the Standard Self-Heating Iron is complete in itself, simple and compact in construction. Carries its own fuel, makes its own gas, burns its own gas. The reservoir is placed above the iron and under the handle, convenient for filling, yet out of the way, does not interfere with the ironing. By an ingenious device, when lighting it is only necessary to open a small slide which can be again closed, thus retaining all the heat in the iron. With our new burner the flame is evenly distributed over the bottom of the iron, insuring a steady, regular heat. The valve for regulating the heat is on the outside, under the handle; turning this one way or the other gives more or less heat. No attachments, connecting pipes, no elevated tanks projecting to be in the way when operating. The handle is of wood and requires no cloth or holder; the iron burns perfectly, standing on heel when not in use.

CUSTOMERS PRAISE IT

The writer was shown hundreds of letters from actual users of this grand invention, proving it a positive success and giving splendid satisfaction. The following extracts may interest our readers: Alex Stalker, N. Y. writes: "The Self-Heating Iron received some time ago and will say right here it is the most useful and money-saving device that was ever made. My wife has just finished a large ironing in two hours that usually took her half a day with the old stove heating irons, and the house is cool. It is certainly just the only iron made. We want the agency." W. P. Farnum: After receiving your iron and giving it a thorough trial it will be a perfect success. My wife is enthusiastic over the work it does and the economy in its use." Mrs. J. E. King, Ill.: "Received iron yesterday in good shape. Well pleased with it. Want the agency." I. N. Newby, Ill.: "Find it to be all you claim for it." Mrs. Josephine Route, N. Y.: "Received the iron O. K. and did my ironing with it yesterday. I like it very much." A. E. Covert, N. Y.: "Have lighted it several times already and find I can do ironing so much quicker and cleaner than in the old way. Think it is the best thing I have ever had in my house." Miss Roxie Sheete, N.C.: "The 2 irons received and am delighted. Have turned off our regular ironer and will do the ironing ourselves, now. Sold the extra iron to the first lady I showed it to." Mrs. Watson C. McNall, N. Y.: "I am more than pleased with it and its work. It is not a bit clumsy. It is a delight to use it." Mrs. Cora Wright, Ill.: "I received the iron Saturday and like it fine." Mrs. C. M. Winstead, Ky.: "I received my iron about three weeks ago. Like it better than anything I ever saw in the way of irons."

This invention must, indeed, be wonderful, yes, a God-send, that cuts ironing-day in less than half and cuts fuel expense to almost nothing.

The writer personally saw this iron in operation and after using one in his own home is delighted with it and after a thorough investigation can say to our readers that the Standard Self-Heating Iron, made by the Cincinnati firm, seems to delight the users and the makers guarantee every one.

HOW TO GET ONE

It is not sold in stores. Write to the C. BROWN MFG. CO. 1077 Brown Bldg., Cincinnati, O. the only manufacturers of this grand invention. Send no money—simply your name and address, and they will send you circulars giving full description, and testimonials from users. The price of the Standard Self-Heating Iron, complete, ready for use, with full directions, so anyone can operate it, is only $4.50. If you prefer to order at once, do so—you won't be disappointed, as the makers fully guarantee every iron. They are reliable, have been in business for years, and do just as they agree.

Don't fail to send for circulars anyway.

THE JINRIKISHA—A Scene from "The World in Chicago"

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointed by churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

The Bewilderment of the Blessed

In the parable of the last judgment as Jesus told it to his disciples occurs the striking fact that both the righteous and the wicked address the Judge in terms of the same question, "Lord, when saw we thee hungry?"

The pathetic fact about this question as asked by the wicked is that the people who made it had gone straight through life and had never discovered the ethical significance of human relations. They had met Jesus Christ frequently and had never recognized Him. There was hardly a man among them who would not have fed Jesus had he known such an act to be possible, and realized who and what He was. Some one was hungry and they might have fed him, but they supposed that it was only some uninteresting modern unfortunate. And some one had been permitted to go on with his back bowed under a heavy burden unshared by those whose sympathy he craved, but they never suspected that Jesus was bearing His cross again in that poor man's distress. Plenty of people had yearned for sympathy and fellowship to whom they might have given an encouraging word or handclasp had they been less thoughtful of themselves, and more considerate of others, but they never suspected that God yearned for sympathy in their loneliness or that Jesus Christ sweat drops of blood in the Gethsemane of their sufferings.

The group of people on the right hand also asked, "Lord, when saw we thee hungry?" but theirs had not been the same failure to understand. They had not realized that it was Jesus to whom they had ministered. It was all the better that they did not. Small credit is his who is gracious to a king in hope to receive again. For this very reason among others, Jesus refused to reveal His Messianic mission until just before His death. He distinctly did not want men to know that He was the Son of God, and thus selfishly to bestow on Him in hope of a reward what belonged to humanity in its own right. Not only is it possible for us to give to Him when we bestow right benefits upon our fellowmen, but I am sure it may even be said that we give much more truly in the spirit of a gift to Him, when we give to others in His name. If Jesus were actually present among us in the flesh, recognized and acknowledged as the Son of God, there would be placed at His disposal suites of rooms in the finest hotels; dainty fare at the most luxurious tables; special trains on the railroads; carriages and automobiles on the public highway, but these would be no test of loyalty and love to Him. Pharisees invited Him to dine with them when He was here on earth, but that was no proof of their affection. If Jesus were actually present among us and wished a test of our loyalty to His teachings. He would need to approach us in disguise. It would be necessary for Him to insist that we should minister to others in His spirit as a proof that we really were ministering to Him.

We really have a fairer opportunity of testing our attitude toward the Lord in our daily conduct by reason of his bodily absence. The bewilderment is a part of the blessedness of it.

The Righteous Judge

By Evelyn Parkes Adams.

What judgest Thou, long suffering, and most patient God?
What judgest Thou, when we who own Thy Fatherhood,
In pride draw back our self-seamed skirts away from those Who, in the crucible of unrequited toil,
Body-marred, soul-seared, dull-eyed, cramped, inconsequent,
Are lifting hands nigh pulseless, maimed, and empty, up
To—heaven? Nay, for what knew they of heaven or
Its glory, of its hopes, or fulness of the best,
Who see no light of earth, who know no moment's rest
Amid her springing life, no joy in her abundance?
What know they of heaven, or its love, when we,
Who bear the name of Holy Christ, and claim His kinship,
Lift not hands of love, as He of old, to touch
With healing palsied bodies, and misshapen lives?
What judgest Thou, when we, who with heritage of wealth
And will, mid sheltering bars have striven to the heights,
Or quaffed unhindered this world's cup of joy and power,
What judgest Thou, O Christ, when we pass judgment on Their tear-filled lives, and tell them yet to strive, as we,
Whose feet know but the quicksands of a nation's greed?
Accursed? Aye, justly so, when strong men fall and sink.
Worsted and baffled, fighting to the last for breath,
Alone to live among the stench they sink in! Thrice
Accursed, when soul-starved women give their wavering strength
To lift their babes above the reeking, treacherous moil!
Accursed! And yet, ye gates of Hell! ye gates of Greed!
'Tis not enough for thee, that strong men fall, that light
Of women's eyes must fade to give thee sure foundation!
But ye must have the lisping, tottering, trembling babes,
And guileless childhood, with relentless power shut in
From field and flower, from living green, and growth, from home
Itself, from mother even, that their tender lives,
Their trembling hands may strengthen yet thy bulwarks.
What judgest Thou, long suffering and most patient Christ?
Are waters deep enough to hold the millstones, that Avenge but justly such great wrong to Thee and Thine?

Faith---in Mosquito and in Man

Someone has written most interestingly of the moment of supreme peril in the life of the mosquito. It is when, having passed through several changes to adapt its life to the water in which it is born, it leaves the water behind. It finds itself possessed of wings and an instinct to use them, and it makes its way out of the water. It has never been on land, and no mosquito has returned from the shore to assure its companions in the water-world. Its wings are wet and untried, there is no one to teach it how to use them; there is no one to help it up the bank; it faces a most appalling peril, one fatal to millions of mosquitoes. But all the mosquitoes that survive are those who make the venture.

Now that is an analogy for faith. For here we are, inhabitants of the world in which we were born, feeling wings that have never been spread, and impelled by an inward impulse toward a life which faith alone reveals, and we make that venture of faith. We dare declare ourselves children of the God we have never seen, and citizens of the heaven where we have never been. We choose to climb the banks, and leave the lower level for that of faith. The choice is not without its perils, but it is that which gives the soul companionship with God. It is the mightiest moment in the evolution of the soul—the moment in which it accepts its high-born destiny by an act of faith in the unseen. Some men have faltered and fallen back, but the career of those who have succeeded is the history of the spiritual progress of the human race.

There is no known process by which the soul can reach its spiritual heritage by passivity. We may not sit idly and await our transformation into the divine image by processes external to ourselves. If we are saved into our spiritual heritage it will be first because God has appointed us heirs of salvation, and ordained the means for our evolution into the liberty of the glory of the children of God; and secondly because we respond to the act of God by a mighty effort of faith, by which we know and appropriate our divine heritage.

A few years ago scientists assumed that the progress of the world was by exceedingly slow and painfully laborious processes. This still is partly true. But the advancement of life is also by opportune and decisive leaps and bounds. There are sudden and immediate transitions by which a form of life rises instantaneously to claim a higher sphere than its own. The experience of the mosquito is repeated in varying forms in the metamorphosis of other types. And it is analogous to spiritual transformation, in which faith faces its problems and its privileges. The evolution of the human soul is an appeal to faith in an unseen God, a hazardous pilgrimage toward an unrealized destiny. All about us are the evidences of our relations with the world of matter, but within us is the impulse of the indwelling God, who made us in his own image. The triumph of faith in human life, causing men to assert their divine heritage, is the supreme fact in evolution, and is analogous to a thousand facts which have marked the progress of life from its beginnings. It is the triumph of "resident force" over an environment of the material. It is the determination of the being made in the image of God to declare himself related not alone to the dust but also and supremely to the Deity.

If these analogies are true, they both inspire and warn us. They inspire us with faith in the purpose of God, and with faith in our own mission as related to that purpose. But they warn us that we may not hope to escape if we neglect so great salvation.

They warn us that strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life. But they warn us also that he who ventures nothing loses all. In the midst of life he is in death. Life is gained by the heroic leap of faith.

There is no salvation by inertia. Progress is perilous, but inertia is fatal. Faith without works is dead. Dependence on past progress is an invitation to decay. Humanity's meridian can never be reached by the policy "that earth should stand and gaze like Joshua's moon in Ajalon," fearful lest it collide with a comet. The hope of the future is not in a return to the past.

> "He must onward still and upward,
> Who would keep abreast of truth."

But the homely old adage is good in religion as in practical affairs, "Be sure you're right, then go ahead." The way of true progress is the way that is guided by the Christ. The most progressive life in all the earth is the life that is growing into the likeness of God.

Symmetrical Development

The symmetrical development of the individual is a process for which he is not solely responsible. For this reason the church is charged with the duty of preaching the importance of environment as well as with the duty of telling every man that he must make the best of his opportunities. Some children are born with defects that make it impossible for them to be symmetrical. For this they are not to be blamed. The right to be well born should be the constant theme of the church. All ideas and customs and institutions that stand in the way of this right are to be condemned.

The prayer of the apostle is that the Thessalonians may be wholly consecrated. Now consecration is not confined to religion. Men consecrate themselves to money-making, to pleasure, to political activity. The value of the consecration depends upon the thing to which a man consecrates himself. If he is consecrated to God, we have to know what sort of God he worships. Religion intensifies vices and virtues alike. To say that a man is religious is not always enlightening. We need to know what he thinks is right and what he abhors before we can pass judgment.

We are not left in doubt as to the sort of consecration Paul had in mind when he prayed for the Thessalonians. His God loves righteousness and hates iniquity. He is the God of all men, not of a few. Hence he hates whatever injures human life. To be consecrated to him is to have a world religion, to see beyond the confines of tribe and nation, and to act in accordance with principles of conduct that can be applied to all the world. No man thus consecrated ever thanks God that he is not as other men. It is not class consciousness but human consciousness that distinguishes the Christian.

The doctrine of self-denial is being restated. It does not mean the impoverishment of life; it means the right use of life. To deny oneself is to refuse to use ability and opportunity selfishly. The Christian enjoys the light of the sun, he delights in the strength of his arm, he is pleased with the success of his children, he saves his money, and he likes a good meal. But he is not trying to deprive other men of the sunlight they need, he is not asking that the arms of others may be made feeble in order that his may become strong, he does not use his neighbor's children as mere tools of material success, his money is his servant, he is not a glutton and he gets his meal by helping others to get theirs.

The prize fighter is not accepted by any nation as its worthiest representative. The business of being a champion brute is in disrepute among enlightened peoples. The reason is that there is lack of symmetry in the life. The strength of the fighter is admired in spite of his lack of intellectual and moral qualities. The error has been that he put too much emphasis upon brute force. Of course a certain amount of intelligence and morality is needed to bring brute force to perfection. If the physical had been developed for the sake of the intellectual and spiritual there would be a different attitude toward the champions of the prize ring. The evolution of mankind is toward the intellectual and the moral. Physical strength is needed but it is not an end in itself.

The symmetrically developed person is interested in all that makes for social progress. He may not agree with all his neighbors on all questions, he is often a debater. He has his own work to which he devotes himself assiduously. But he is not indifferent to what other workers are doing. He is pleased that men like what they are doing and he sees to it that his lack of knowledge due to indifference is not a factor contributing to the burdens of any class. No one reform exhausts all his sympathy. He understands that the abolition of the trusts would leave many financial problems, that after the saloon is destroyed sin will exist, that better divorce laws will not make all homes happy—in a word, he is fully aware that the man who has one remedy for all the evils of the world is ignorant of human nature and of the conditions of life.

The best developed man is one who sees most clearly where development is needed. He never discovers a place to stop. The victory of today offers an opportunity for another tomorrow. One selfish habit conquered reveals another. If evil men are deprived of their power to work injury in one place, they will move to another. The worst deformity is that which stops growth. A Meaningless and Repugnant Phrase

Rev. Charles H. Dodd, of Baltimore, is a Baptist minister whose strong sentiments for the closer unity of Baptists and Disciples are well known among Disciples. He believes, and has repeatedly declared, that if these two groups of Christ's followers would break open the distinctive forms of speech used by each other they would find themselves at one in essential meaning and purpose.

Probably there is no man on the Baptist side of the house who has so well earned the right to speak reprovingly of his Disciple brethren as has Doctor Dodd. His sympathy and unsectarian purposes are so well attested that a serious bit of counsel from him deserves serious attention at our hands. Due consideration certainly was not given his recent earnest communication to a contemporary Disciple newspaper in which he pointed out, in terms as frank as they were pertinent, a specific instance of harmful and misleading speech quite common on Disciple lips.

Doctor Dodd finds his text in an address delivered by a distinguished Disciple pastor before a union meeting of Baptists and Disciples in an Eastern city. Among the pivotal principles upon which the Disciples' movement was said to turn the speaker named "Immersion into Christ, and the consequent reception of the Holy Spirit." Doctor Dodd was painfully struck by these phrases. "Taken either separately or as standing together," he says, "I am frank to say that I do not know what these phrases mean." He continues:

> I am, however, aware that, whatever such forms of expression may mean, they are the very things which mystify the Baptist mind in Disciple statements of doctrines. I know your people well enough to be convinced that they do not believe in baptismal regeneration or in any idea of the Spirit as necessarily conferred in or through baptism. I also know what is the usual interpretation of these phrases among yourselves, but despite their logic and cogency to the Disciple mind they are plain stumbling-blocks to the Baptist mind. I cannot find by searching in the recesses of my own mind any reason, essentially necessary, why these forms of expression are used by your people. If all that is held is the idea of complete obedience to Christ before any man can really call himself a Christian, why not make that a separate item in the program and not plunge the idea of baptism in Christ's name and as a symbol and witness of foregoing regeneration into a wholly mystical relation by speaking of "immersion into Christ?" And further, since we know that many unbaptized persons have received the Holy Spirit also, why so persistently link the idea of the reception of the Holy Spirit with baptism by the use of this word "consequently?" Mr. Ewers remarks that these elements, among the others, are "the forces which must determine the future curve of the Disciples." I am absolutely sure, for my part, that such "forces" as I have named will remain positions of departure from the position of the Disciples by average thinking Baptists, and that no blending of our denominational "curves" can be anticipated so long as Baptists continue to take these expressions as meaning just what, on the surface, they seem to declare, namely, baptismal regeneration and the conferring of the Spirit in or through baptism. The point of my criticism is, that if these phrases do mean what, on the surface, they seem to imply, neither Disciples nor Baptists can consistently hold to them, and if they are mere forms of expression, possessing a meaning which must be interpreted independently of those forms of expression, they are decidedly unfortunate and well calculated to produce doctrinal disunion through misunderstanding.

Doctor Dodd's point is undoubtedly well taken. For, in addition to misleading the Baptists, to talk of being "immersed into Christ" is to outrage ethical religion and to perpetrate an atrocious grammatical absurdity. One wonders how such an expression could hold itself on cultivated tongues at all. If the immoral suggestion of getting into Christ by a physical act did not jar the sensibilities of the immersionist dogmatists one would have supposed that the impossible grammatical construction of the phrase would have done so. A moment's attention will show that the transitive preposition "into" cannot be used with the verb "immerse." A person may be immersed in water, or in sorrow, or in the Holy Spirit, but he cannot be immersed into any of these elements. To say he is "immersed into Christ" is simply unintelligible.

for he should be gently reminded that he lives in a glass house. He is a Baptist, and he must not forget that the Disciple minister's phrase which he now criticises is nothing more nor less than a quotation from Scripture in accordance with accepted Baptist interpretation. There is nothing in Doctor Dodd's article to indicate that he differs from his Baptist brethren in teaching that the New Testament word "baptize" means "immerse" and should be translated "immerse." The Disciple minister could easily enough give high Baptist authority for the phrase which Doctor Dodd so earnestly condemns.

If the Baltimore pastor will turn to his new "Baptist Bible" he will find Paul's statement, "So many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death," rendered ridiculous by the insertion of "immersed" in parenthesis after each occurrence of the word "baptized." Baptists, then, are guilty of giving the Disciples scriptural authority for this stupid talk. If to be baptized is to be immersed Doctor Dodd must find fault not with the Disciples but with the New Testament, for the New Testament does assuredly teach that we are baptized into Christ and that the gift of the Holy Spirit is a consequent of our baptism.

But let us—Baptists and Disciples, all—be forever done with the crude delusion that baptism in the New Testament means immersion. It robs many New Testament passages not only of their moral content but of their intelligibility to translate the word as Disciples and Baptists have been accustomed to do. And besides, it contradicts the plainest facts of Christian experience. We know that immersion is not the way into Christ. We know that millions are in Christ who have not been immersed. We know that, even if it were intelligible to say that we were "immersed into Christ's death," the statement would be contradicted by the facts. Millions have passed into the experience of His death who have not been immersed. Unimmersed Presbyterians have been baptized into Christ and have also been baptized into His death.

What the apostle has in mind in Romans 6:3 is baptism itself, not the particular physical act by which it was administered. This baptism is initiation or induction, and while neither word is wholly adequate as a translation, either one comes nearer expressing the apostle's thought than any English word that has been suggested.

"Know ye not," Paul asks, "that so many of us as were inducted into Christ were inducted into his death?" Therefore, he adds, by our initiation or incorporation into his body we were buried with him into death, that is, we shared the whole experience of his passion and his resurrection.

It is not a symbolic thing that Paul has in mind, but an actual experience. And while it is more than probable that the administration of Christian initiation (baptism) by immersion suggested to Paul this particular phrasing of the experience it must not be forgotten that it is the actual experience he is talking about, not a mere symbol of it.

It is heartening to know that Disciples who have, as we think, been more determined than their Baptist brethren to live close to the New Testament on the baptism question are coming rapidly to see that the fundamental position on the meaning of the word itself which both bodies have held in common is thoroughly false.

When the reconstruction of this fundamental error shall have been completed we shall be able to use New Testament language concerning the relation of baptism to the forgiveness of sins and the gift of the Holy Spirit without suggesting in the faintest degree the repugnant doctrine of water regeneration.

And in that day no one could imagine himself using the meaningless expression, "immersion into Christ"!

A Call to Prayer

Like the voice of a muezzin heard from a distant tower comes from the East a call to prayer. Who calls to prayer? The new Republic of China. It asks the Christian Churches of that great land to unite in prayer that the new government, sailing uncharted seas, may be guided by the hand of God with its own upon the helm of the great ship of state. The world has heard nothing like this before. The far land of China groping in the dazzling light of its new found liberty, pauses ere it rushes on, and asks the Christian people resident within the bounds of that ancient empire to pray God for its guidance in the new way it is going. Let not the churches of China answer alone. Let Christendom with one heart and voice join in heartfelt intercession.

Almighty God, Ruler of nations, who hast brought our brethren on the other side of the earth into the perilous glory of a new freedom, and hast enabled them to throw off the bondage of oppression and to stand forth in the liberty of a free people, guide now those whom Thou hast led by a way that they knew not. Restrain them when liberty would become license. Teach them the worth and the price of freedom. Help them to guard with righteousness that which they have won with the sword. May not their swift emancipation lead them to excess or folly. But build within the borders of that great land, education, prosperity, peace and righteousness. Reward the labors of Thy servants, our brethren the missionaries, and help them in these days to act with wisdom and great discretion, and to be the helpers of those for whom their prayers of past years are answered. And bless with them all nations and peoples, all rulers and governors, the whole world round. Yea, bless Thou our own nation and its people, for we in our hundred years of liberty have learned all too little of how rightly we may use it. God of the nations, bless our own beloved land, and make it a blessing to the whole world. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Old Adam in Us

Breathes there a man with soul so dead, that never to himself hath said, "This spring I will make a garden"? If so, let him lay down this paper straightway, for this editorial is not for him. Moreover, he is exceptional among men, and not at all to be reckoned in computing averages or in making generalizations applicable to humanity in the large. Ever since the Lord God set man to till the ground out of which he had been taken—and there seemed a sort of poetic justice in that act of reciprocity—normal men have taken up agriculture, if not as a vocation, then certainly as an avocation.

Now as for the farmer, to him belongs the tillage of the soil as a regular business. To him be the just reward of a harvest sufficiently abundant to enable him to pay off the mortgage on the farm, and reduce for us the high cost of living. But it is not the farmer of whom we now are thinking but he who owning or inhabiting a house and lot, looks out upon a neglected back yard, and addressing himself, his wife and the recording angel, says, "This spring I will make a garden."

Before we write another line let the author of this article make a frank confession. Some men like to hoe; we do not.

One of our ancestors, some distance back, before the Mayflower or the flood, had a situation as gardener. He lost his job. It is a matter which has occasioned no little discussion in the family. We all felt more or less sensitive about it. This ancestor of ours did not make a brilliant success as a gardener. The writer inherits his ancestor's lack of skill as an agriculturist, and lack of love for the hoe.

Yet even the writer a number of times in his young life has looked out upon the face of nature and smilingly has said, "This spring I will make a garden!"

One time it came about through our member of congress who sent to each of his constituents a half dozen packages of garden seeds. Of all ridiculous forms of bribery, this, surely was most absurd. "As though I would vote for any man on account of the gift of a quarter's worth of garden seeds, and those grafted from the government!" Nevertheless, there lay the package of seeds on the desk. It seemed a ruthless thing to destroy them. Why not spade up a square yard or two of the back yard and let them grow? "This spring I will make a garden."

The mistress of the manse smiles when she hears that word. She has an assortment of smiles each one with its own particular meaning. The smile which she smiles concerning the garden is her Mona Lisa smile. Only she and the recording angel know what she means by it. It is an enigmatic smile. We wonder if the recording angel smiles in the same way. Both of them have heard us say it before. But that was five years ago. "This spring I will make a garden."

Perhaps the reader is expecting this article to record the pitiful ending of the plan. Perhaps he thinks we will confess to a zeal that began with enthusiasm and lagged as the days grew hot. Perhaps he thinks we will record that after digging till our hands were blistered, and planting the seeds, and marking the rows so that when they came up we should know the beans from the radishes, we lost our enthusiasm, and that the weeds grew faster than the lettuce; that the radishes were tough, and the beets all run to tops, and that nothing grew but the onions which we do not like.

But we shall admit nothing of the sort. It is bad enough that it should be true without having to admit it.

No, no. If we failed in the past, let the past take care of that. Our soul is still unconquered. Did Adam give it up after that first failure? By no means. Every few years he continued to say, "This spring I will make a garden." And Eve smiled her Mona Lisa smile.

Come, let us at it again. The cost of living is high. What better way to reduce it than to raise a few vegetables in our own back yard?

There is a spade in the barn, and a rusty hoe and a broken rake; and garden seeds cost only five cents a package.

Come, let us take off our coats and go at it. Nothing is so good for the man who lives in town as to strip to his shirt-sleeves, and feel the honest perspiration on his face. A half hour before breakfast every morning will do us a world of good. It will add years to our life, and reduce our girth and the family expenses. The birds are willing; the flowers are nodding us encouragement. Come, we will find the spade—if we can—and also the hoe and the rake. And we will plant a few choice varieties—and take care of them every day. This spring we will plant a garden.

Madame, stop smiling!

Again, Mr. Smith and Going to Church

It will be remembered that a national controversy arose over Meredith Nicholson's articles in the Atlantic Monthly last year about "Mr. Smith and the Church," meaning the average man's attendance upon and devotion to church services. In the light of that article, it is interesting to note what the Congregationalist (Boston) has to say about "Lenten Churchgoing in New York:"

"The total attendance at the noon hour services in New York during the Lent just closed reached 170,000, of which about 10,000 was in two Brooklyn churches. Old Trinity at the head of Wall Street, and Grace, at Broadway and Tenth Street, led all others. Trinity had 27,500 and Grace 34,000. Single congregations were larger in Trinity, but it had fewer services, and omitted Saturdays altogether. St. Paul's Chapel, in lower Broadway, had 17,000, including the large numbers present on days when the cantatas were sung. Some figures of other churches were 7,000 at St. Bartholomew's, 5,000 at Ascension and 8,900 at Calvary. The largest numbers attended in Holy Week, and especially on Good Friday. At Trinity at the three-hour Good Friday service there were in all 3,500 people, new ones coming as others left. Seating and standing the church contained 1,400 throughout the whole three hours. The John Street Methodist had 7,000, the Brick Presbyterian 6,000 and the Broadway Tabernacle 2,800. New York had three well advertised preachers from England, but the Bishop of Kentucky attracted 1,100 more to Trinity in one week than did an English preacher. It is found at Trinity Church that on Wednesdays women far outnumber men, but on all other days men are three to one. The reason is an organ recital on Wednesdays immediately following the noon hour service. Women come early and remain for it. At St. Paul's Chapel women far outnumber men at all services. The reason is the Business Women's Lunch Club, with its 1,700 members, lunching in the parish house in St. Paul's Chapel yard. At the Brick Church, and also at the Broadway Tabernacle, men and women are about equal in numbers. The numbers attending these noon hour services were considerably larger this year than ever.

Missionary, Totally Paralyzed, Writes Book

Dr. F. A. Chalfant for twenty-five years was an active missionary in China of the Presbyterian church. He is now in Pittsburg, confined to the home of his aged father, Doctor George Chalfant, a retired minister. The returned missionary some months ago suffered a total paralysis of both his limbs. But infirmity seems to have given him an opportunity for a most important scientific and literary work. The work is no less than one of the most elaborate and scientific treatises on the origin of the Chinese language ever written. There is something about the man and the work that appeals to the heroic in us all. Four hours a day this invalid spends in investigating Chinese inscriptions which have been preserved on tortoise shell and bones of animals, many of which date back to 800 B. C. Both the British Museum and the Carnegie Library of Pittsburg have expressed a desire to undertake the work of publishing Doctor Chalfant's monumental book, when completed. May success crown his efforts.

A Presbyterian Achievement in Toronto

The Disciples of Christ will hold their annual international convention in Toronto next October. Naturally, the Disciples are interested in that city and what is going on there. Here is an item from The Continent (Chicago) that should be read by all Disciples with peculiar interest:

Assured realization is now announced for the daring and unique proposition to hold an unofficial "church congress" of Canadian Presbyterians in Toronto the first week of June, just preceding the meeting of the Canadian General Assembly. The plan involves nothing less than bringing to Toronto in that week all the active pastors of the whole denomination and their wives, together with one lay representative from each congregation in the church. This will make a convocation of more than 5,000 Christian leaders, vitally related to the activities of individual local congregations. Discussion by and before this great and influential audience of the project and ideals of Presbyterianism must create enthusiasms that will penetrate every nook and corner of the whole Presbyterian fellowship in Canada.

The value of such a gathering was recognized on all hands from the first moment of its suggestion. But there was much doubt whether such an enormous undertaking could be financed. It involves paying the expense of railway travel for representatives from the extreme borders of Canada and every intermediate portion of the dominion. But every obstacle was swept away when ten generous Presbyterian laymen of Toronto joined to pledge $100,000 for transportation charges and the congregations of Toronto unanimously agreed to entertain the visitors in the homes of their people. Massey hall, the largest auditorium in the city, has been secured for a whole week of meetings, and the program now being laid out will present the entire work of the church proportionately and with the most impressive eloquence of the strongest leaders in each department.

Minimum Salary for Methodist Parsons

The Laymen's Association of the New York East Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church went on record at its annual meeting at New Haven in favor of a minimum salary for its pastors. The measure proposed aims eventually at paying to each married minister who is a member of the conference a salary not less than $1,000 per year and to each unmarried pastor in the conference "a minimum cash salary of not less than $800." The association advocated further that a pastor's aid society be formed by the merging of the district pastoral and church aid societies. It is expected that this society will raise annually about $15,000 as a part of a fund to guarantee the minimum salary.

Episcopalians on Parade?

Every three years the Protestant Episcopal Church meets in General Convention. Such a convention will meet this fall in New York City. Now comes The Churchman (New York City) with a suggestion that the deputies to the convention march behind bands of music down Broadway to Old Trinity Church, as a demonstration. Any one who knows of the dignified conservatism of this denomination, must smile at the suggestion, but The Churchman offers it in good faith and in all sincerity as follows:

"What would it mean for the church if, at the time of the General Convention, its men joined in a great parade, headed by the processional cross, led by their bishops, accompanied by bands of music, and singing such hymns as "Onward, Christian Soldiers" marched down Broadway to Old Trinity and held a service in the heart of the business district of the country! It might be too much for the dignity of some of the participants, but as a demonstration it would be worth while to the church. The suggestion may seem fanciful and savor of the dramatic, but it is by no means a new thing in the Anglican Communion. Two years ago, on Good Friday, the churchmen of London, led by their bishops, marched in procession from Trafalgar Square to St. Paul's Cathedral, singing hymns on the Passion. A similar procession was seen in South London last year, and another was held in Birmingham on Good Friday of this year, consisting of more than 3,000 men, who marched with their bishops through the principal streets. It is said that each of these parades made profound impressions on the crowds who lined the streets. If this can be done by churchmen abroad, it can be done by churchmen here. Why not make a similar parade a leading feature of the General Convention? It would, we feel, be justified by results."

A Home Board Diplomat?

According to a correspondent in The Presbyterian Advance (Nashville), "the latest word is that the Board of Home Missions proposes to establish a kind of diplomatic department next, so that if occasion arises a secretary may be sent to any part to negotiate with other denominations as to who shall establish a church in a certain field." Has it come to such a pass in Christian comity, that a fancy-salaried diplomat may be hired by the Presbyterian Church to take part officially in the shameless competition of sects on home missionary soil? Perish the thought. It may reduce friction so far as the Presbyterians are concerned, but will that be any balm in Gilead to other home boards? It is possible that the root of much of our American denominational evils is too often in the home boards. The less these home boards have to do with building up of churches on new soils, the more self-respecting and self-reliant will be the people involved and certainly there will be considerably less objection all around. It certainly looks singular that a diplomat is necessary in this day when all sects are supposed to be coming together anyhow.

Christian Union in New Zealand

In New Zealand, the Wesleyan and the Primitive Methodist churches have just been consolidated under the title of the Methodist church of New Zealand. It is a family reunion, but an event of momentous importance. The deed of union was signed rather dramatically. A great public convention assembled in the town hall of Wellington, the capital of New Zealand. Lord Liverpool, governor-general of the dominion, presided. The deed was signed in the presence of this magnificent company. Among the signers was Doctor Gittos, aged eighty-four, who has been a missionary for sixty years among the native Maoris of the islands. He is known as the "grand old man" of the general conference.

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

China's Capital and the Great Wall

The day before we left Tientsin I went by invitation to the chapel exercises of St. John's College, a Church of England school for Chinese young men. I found it a most interesting place. The buildings are imposing and artistic. The residence of the principal is a part of the main structure. Adjoining is the large Gothic chapel where at least three hundred youths were gathered for the religious services, followed by the address. This mission is supported by the Church Missionary Society, the broad church organization which has many centers in the Orient. It has a keen rival in the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, commonly known as the S. P. G. This is the high church propaganda, and the relations between the C. M. S. and the S. P. G. are far less cordial than the common origin of the two in the Anglican Church would seem to make natural.

That same morning the principal took me through the museum of the college where I found many valuable antiquities of the region, especially some old forms of Chinese money. As we were going out he remarked that he was due at that hour at a wedding of native Christians to be celebrated in the church across the way. So I went with him, and was a witness of the unusual ceremony. For the community of Christian people is not a large one, and the adoption of a Christian form of marriage seems very strange to those who have been accustomed to marry their children in infancy, or early childhood. The bride and groom were young people of mature age, and the service added to the usual marriage forms of the Church a lengthy discourse on the Christian idea of home and marriage. The services were conducted by two C. M. S. missionaries, with whom I afterwards had an interesting talk regarding the work of John Kenneth Mackenzie, whom they had known.

Off for Peking.

We took a train for Peking at about three o'clock in the afternoon. It is always well to have the station-master reserve the number of sittings a party is likely to require. You cannot buy reserved seats, as with our Pullman car system in America. But other things being equal, you can have them kept for you in the first or second class coaches. But that does not mean that they are actually secured or really held for you. It means that if you do not forget to tip the station-master suitably, and if the station-master does not forget to wire ahead, and if nobody gets in before you and takes possession of the seats, you are reasonably likely to have a place. It was just that way at Tientsin. The seats were reserved—so we were assured. When the train came all who were waiting made a rush for the available sittings. Nothing had been reserved for anyone. It was a cheerful case of "Everyone for himself—et extremum diabolus capiet!" When we had done the best we could, and were trying to take inventory of the parcels of luggage, the station-master came in cheerfully and said he was glad we had gotten such good places. And he actually seemed disappointed when after bidding us an affectionate farewell, he was not tipped again!

The trip from Tientsin to Peking only takes about four hours. We went through a country badly flooded, and where the people have had to be aided of late because of their sufferings and losses from the inundations. On the train were several Chinese gentlemen, handsomely dressed.

Sometime after dark we reached Peking. The porters from the Hotel des Wagon-Lits were there ready to show us to the hotel, which is managed by the Internationale Compagnie des Wagon-Lits, the Sleeping Car company which is building up an extensive business in the East as a tourist agency and rival to the Cook & Sons enterprise. We walked a short distance down the platform beside the city wall, and then through the South Gate of the city, and into the door of the hotel.

Peking is in reality four cities in one. There is the Chinese city, with its inclosing wall. Then within this is the Manchu city, where the aristocracy of the old imperial days resided. In the center of all is the so-called Forbidden City, where behind still stronger walls the imperial palace lies, safeguarded from all intrusion of the hostile or the curious. Inside of the Manchu city but of course outside the central imperial domain are the foreign concessions and consular residences. On the morning after our arrival our party went onto the wall of the Manchu city, just back of the hotel, and over to the South Gate, overlooking the railway station. An American soldier was on duty there, who said that the different consular forces guarded the different portions of the wall since the revolutionary troubles of last year.

On arriving at the hotel, I found a note from Mr. Calhoun, the United States minister, a Chicago man, inclosing passes to see the summer palace and other public places of interest for which official permission was necessary. When I called on Mr. Calhoun later I was glad to meet Mr. E. T. Williams, the first secretary, and for years the right arm of our embassy in Peking. Disciples of Christ will remember that Mr. Williams was formerly one of the most eminent of our ministers in America. In the day of his greatest power as the pastor of the Central Church in Cincinnati, he announced his determination to become a missionary to China, in words that brought tears to the eyes of Isaac Errett, then the president of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society.

He became our first representative in the Chinese Empire, and opened the work at Nanking, which has since grown to such notable proportions. His abilities as a linguist were remarkable, and after a time he was induced to become a regular member of the diplomatic force, where his masterful knowledge of the language and his long acquaintance with the people made him a most valuable authority upon matters Chinese. Three years ago, in the opening of stressful times in China, he was summoned to Washington as an expert on Chinese affairs, and has only just returned to Peking.

It was very pleasant to visit with Mr. Williams, recalling incidents of former days when he used to visit Bethany College on some anniversary or commencement occasion, or make his appearance at one of the national conventions. He seems not a day older than in those times. He spoke with interest of the Disciples and their missionary problems, and with affection of the men at Nanking, especially Dr. Macklin and Prof. Meigs. Mr. Williams rendered us most helpful service while in Peking.

At the British Compound.

One morning we devoted to a walk through the British Compound, the largest of the foreign reservations. It was here that nearly all the foreigners and many of the native Christians took refuge during the revolution two years ago. One remembers with what anxiety we watched the reports of that company pent up in the British concession, and liable to be attacked at any moment. Perhaps the actual danger was less than we then feared. Mr. Conger's dispatches did much to reassure all who had friends in Peking. But there were actual attacks from bands of fanatical haters of all foreigners, who would have been glad to scale the walls and massacre all within. At one corner of the quadrangle there are the marks of cannonading, and above the scars thus made some hand has painted in bold letters the words, "Lest we forget!"

Of course everyone who visits Peking must make the journey to the Great Wall. This is not to be seen in the vicinity, but one must take a train some thirty miles to the north, and at the head of the Nankow Pass see it in all its superb majesty. So, though it was quite cold, we started for the wall. At the village of Nankow we left our luggage, and remained on the train till it reached the head of the pass, ten miles and more above. We also left word with the hotel people to have donkeys and chairs enough for our party brought up to the wall so that we could return that night, as the train does not make the return journey till next morning.

It was about four in the afternoon when we reached the little station where one is supposed to alight. The Chinese boy we had taken with us had never been there before, and was of service to us merely because he could speak the language. When the train pulled away from the little station house we were left without chart or compass, and our "guide" was purely ornamental. But we could catch glimpses of the wall on the heights above us, and there was nothing to do but strike out in the effort to find the right way. After climbing a fairly smooth road for a time we came to a steep path up through the rocks. Near that point we hailed a man in a hillside cabin, who made signs that the step path was the way to the wall. So up we went, the ladies going gamely at the task, and only hoping that we were not getting lost.

In Sight of the Wall.

After a half hour of steep work we came out in sight of one of the big stone gateways of the wall. It was evidently a thoroughfare, for every now and then herds of cattle, flocks of sheep, or laden mules were driven along through it. A little higher up we found that the road we had left down below wound about in great circles up to the point we had reached by the shorter and much harder climb. We spent an hour of satisfaction clambering over the walls and their huge gates. On either side the big structure climbed up the mountains, lifting every quarter mile one of those square towers which form so important and artistic a feature of the massive barrier.

It was evidently the purpose of the builders to make the gates impregnable, and with this in view they threw out a curtain of stone, either in front or at the rear of the gate, with another gate piercing it at a distance of thirty or forty yards from the main gate. This gave the advantage of a double entrance far more difficult to take than a single opening. The doors of these double gateways have long since disappeared. The wall itself would be of little value in the modern day of field guns. But one is astonished beyond measure at the massiveness and precision of this enormous enterprise. For what one sees at the head of the Nankow Pass is the same rampart that extends hundreds of miles in either direction, and was in its day worthy to be counted one of the wonders of the world.

And from the Great Pass Road, that highway down which Marco Polo traveled a half millenium ago, you can see this wall running its amazing course up and down the mountains, appearing for a moment at the top of some rocky headland, or winding down into some ravine, quite regardless of the physical difficulties which nature has thrown in its way. It looked massive and majestic to us when we first saw it in its ruins at Shan-hai-kwan days before. But that was nothing to the impression it leaves upon one who sees it at close range on the heights above Nankow.

By the time we had taken our photographs in the all too scanty light, and had climbed about on the big structure to heart's content, it was rapidly becoming dark, and no donkeys or chairs had come. We waited, not without some anxiety, for the hotel people down the line might not have understood, the place we were in was no safe spot for a night's sojourn, there was no near-by village to which we could go, and our "guide" had about the intelligence of a hen and the courage of a sheep.

An Anxious Situation.

Finally we started down toward the spot where we had left the train. But would the men come up the broad road or along the path we had climbed? We thought we would risk the former. So we walked on, passing what seemed numberless cattle, sheep and laden mules, and their drivers who looked us over with the half curious, half insolent air of men who seemed to partly guess that we were not escorted on that remote Chinese road. On we went and still on. We came to the hut where the man had given us his hint of the path. There were no signs of the men. It was getting dark, and the road was too rough to make walking easy. So we decided to wait there, and the boy was sent ahead to see what tokens he might find of the expected help.

Soon he came back with the good news that the men had come. The one who had the mules was just behind him, and the others, with the swinging chairs, four men to each, were down below. We were soon mounted or seated, and the long journey down the pass began. By this time the night had come down, and with it the cold. It was ten miles by rail to Nankow, but at least thirteen by the pass. It seemed much longer. The chair-carriers were able to go at a pace which the donkeys could not match, and were soon far ahead. The road was very rough, and the little animals often stumbled. Once one of the ladies went cleanly over the head of her beast onto the road. But she and Providence must have decided that it was not a good place for broken bones, for no damage was done.

Then the moon came up, and we had the Pass in all of its weird beauty. On one side the mountains towered above us. On the other, sometimes at a considerable depth below, a stream plunged over its rocky bed, and beyond rose the opposite wall of mountain-side. Now and then the Great Wall rose out of the gloom on a spur above us, and twice it came swiftly down and completely crossed the valley, so that we had to go through the big gates, curtained as usual, where a handful of men could have held a host at bay.

Relief Sighted.

In one of these inclosures formed by the square of the two gateways, we came up with the ladies who had been carried off by the rapid pace of their bearers. Not a word could they communicate to the men, for the boy was with us, where he could do the least good. The ladies insisted, as well as they could, that they wanted to go on, thinking we must have gotten on another road and be somewhere ahead. But the men would not move, and meantime the people, not to speak of dogs, of a near-by village gathered around in an ever-narrowing circle. When the situation became actually tense, and they had begun to wonder what would be the outcome, they heard the shouts of our muleteer, and we were soon with them in the brilliant moonlight between the huge walls of that hollow square in the Nankow Pass.

Another hour and we came upon a lantern bearer who acted as the outpost of the little hotel at Nankow. Then across the fields we were carried, almost too cold to move a muscle, and never were warmth of fire and well-served food more welcome than was the hospitality of that place. For days afterward we still talked of sore joints and sensitive muscles. But not one of us felt that we would like to have missed the sensations, or even the hardships, of that trip to the Great Wall, and the midnight ride down Marco Polo's road through Nankow Pass.

National Missionary Campaign Next March

Plans for a nation-wide, interdenominational campaign for home and foreign missions were formulated in New York City on March 19, the centennial of Livingstone's birthday. Committees of ten, representing the Foreign Missions Conference and the Home Missions Council of America, both general organizations embracing the whole missionary activities of all the evangelical churches, quietly met and laid plans for a movement to be executed in March, 1914, that will probably end the competitive rivalry between home missions and foreign missions. Preparations begin immediately for what is described as "a comprehensive and sustained effort, with such developments as may prove necessary, to lead the whole church out into the discharge of its total missionary duty, in this crisis of national and world history." The idea and the effort appear to be the dramatic climax of a series of missionary movements of every kind that have been gathering momentum for the past five or ten years. As The Continent (Presbyterian, Chicago) remarks: "All in all, the combination effected is the biggest working association of denominational executive officers ever yet brought together in America, and it should, corresponding to the force enlisted, make an unprecedented impression on the churches."

The committee organized to direct this movement includes secretaries of both home and foreign boards. The chairman of the general committee is quite appropriately the missionary president of the one denomination which already combines both of these interests under a single head of organization—Bishop A. S. Lloyd, head of the Protestant Episcopal Board of Foreign and Domestic Missions. Dr. H. C. Herring, secretary of the Congregational Home Mission Society, is vice chairman. Of the executive committee organized under this general committee, S. Earl Taylor, Methodist foreign secretary, is chairman and Dr. Charles R. Watson, United Presbyterian foreign secretary, is vice chairman. Two executive secretaries have been named—William B. Millar, one of the general secretaries of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, and George Innes, the hustling United Presbyterian business man who has given up his secular affairs to devote all his time to missions as a volunteer worker.

Catholic Priests Become Protestants

Two more Roman Catholic priests have entered the communion of the Protestant Episcopal Church. One is an Italian, Rev. Dr. Joseph F. Militello, who became a presbyter in the diocese of New York. At the same time he presented Bishop Burch with a large class of Italians for confirmation. The other priest, Rev. William Thomas Walsh, was formerly a Paulist father. He will shortly become rector of St. Mary's Church, Mott Haven, N. Y. "Father" Walsh is considered a brilliant accession from Romanism, on account of his varied experience as a "missioner" and his commanding eloquence. It is odd to think of the "conversion" to Protestantism of one who had made it his life vocation to "convert" Protestants to Romanism. While many pass out of Episcopalism to Romanism, yet it is equally true that many pass out of Romanism into Episcopalianism and into still more pronounced Protestant bodies.

The World in Chicago

An Exhibit of Missionary Achievement

By William Bernard Norton

"THE World in Chicago" is nearly ready for its opening ceremonies. All preparations will be complete by Saturday, May 3, and the first day will see all exhibits fully equipped and ready for inspection. In fact the first days will give attendants the choicest of opportunities, for, in spite of all urging, many will wait until the enthusiasm coming from those who have attended will have touched them.

"The World in Chicago" will occupy with its exhibit every part of the Coliseum, the largest exhibition space under one roof in the city. The galleries and annex, as well as the main floor, will be filled with life-like reproductions of all nations, including the United States and its possessions, Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands.

A spectacular exhibit of missions, under the title of "The Pageant of Darkness and Light," is to be given every afternoon and evening in the Auditorium theater, the largest hall in Chicago, seating over 4,000. Here will be depicted some of the most thrilling episodes that have marked the struggle of the "Light" of Christianity overcoming the "Darkness" of paganism. The "Pageant" assumes rather than teaches a knowledge of facts, and occupies itself with making vivid, impressive, and real, the tragedy as well as the beauty of the triumph of Christianity.

Persons of every age—young, middle-aged, old—of every degree of education or lack of education, the religious and the non-religious, those interested in or indifferent to missions, the musical and the unmusical, the lovers of fun, entertainment, and romping, and the sober reader of books and the student of charts—every one will find something to delight and to satisfy.

Hundreds of children will take part. They will show how boys and girls play the games native to China, India, Japan and other countries. What would a Chinaman look like if he did not have a son with him to hand down his name and to perpetuate the worship of his ancestors? What would a missionary do if there were no children in the homes of missionaries? Of course the children will be in the exposition, not only as sightseers but as exhibitors and entertainers.

Even persons who are not personally Christians like to see the curious and the beautiful. They enjoy seeing children play and many of them desire to know about the world just as they like to travel abroad. A Christian will have a deeper appreciation than the one whose eyes have never been opened to Christian truth, for through the curious and the beautiful, the degrading and the useful, the Christian will see the higher meaning of the way in which God is leading the world to himself. But it must be remembered that the exposition has been prepared for all classes and one need not hesitate to invite even the worldliest in spirit to hear and see for fear that the sights offered will be dull or uninteresting.

Objects that come to the brain through eye gate somehow stir us as nothing else does. The World in Chicago will make visitors see the real thing. They will see not a picture or an image of an African hut, an India monkey shrine, a Japanese tea garden, but they will see the real thing. Household utensils, devices for manufacturing, articles of worship, instruments of torture, playthings, works of art, have been brought from foreign lands and will be seen just as they would be if one were actually on a visit to the country to which they are native.

The exhibits are large enough to make them worth while. A Chinese street, with shops, homes, and scenes in the street itself, is so completely shown that the visitor can stand in it, shut out from all other surroundings, and imagine himself transported to China land. This is true of many other oriental and domestic scenes which will be reproduced.

General View, the Orient in London Missionary Exposition, 1908.

An Alaskan Eskimo igloo, a western pioneer sod shanty, American Indian wigwams, Negro log cabins, as well as frontier and mining town churches, are among the home land exhibits that make real the experiences of those who work in the field of home missions.

"The Pageant of Darkness and Light" takes the form of four episodes and a closing spectacle in which all participants are grouped around the cross, the symbol of Christianity's triumph.

The episode of the North pictures life among the Indians and Eskimos and the restoring of a lost child of an Indian chieftain by a missionary who then preaches to the natives the gospel of love. The Eastern episode gives a realistic presentation of the practice of the burning of widows on the funeral pyre of their dead husbands and the abolition of the custom, called "suttee," by a Christian government. The episode of the South depicts Stanley's finding of Livingstone, and the episode of the West shows the defiance of superstition by Kapiolani, queen of Hawaii, with the consequent rescue of those whose lives were to be sacrificed by being thrown into the volcano's crater.

One of the most interesting sections of the pageant will be that devoted to the work among incoming immigrants at the Ellis Island immigration station, New York. The Philippines, Hawaii, Porto Rico and Cuba and the South Sea Islands will also be represented.

In the section given over to the representation of scenes from Palestine, a notable feature will be a faithful reproduction of a Jerusalem street.

Every day there will be addresses from missionary leaders and from representative men and women of many branches of the Christian church.

Nearly 600 Chicago churches are coöperating in this exhibition. Twenty thousand persons will take part in presenting the various features and a million visitors, it is hoped, will attend.

The Wing Life of the Soul

From a Sermon Preached in New York City

By Rev. J. H. Jowett, D. D.

Text: "They shall mount up with wings as eagles." Isaiah 40:31.

"They shall mount up with wings as eagles." Who shall? "They that wait upon the Lord." And waiting upon the Lord is not merely a passing call, but an abiding in him. Waiting is not so much a transient action as a permanent attitude. It is not the restless vagrant calling at the door for relief, it is rather the intimacy of the babe at the breast.

They who thus wait upon the Lord shall obtain a marvelous addition to their resources. Their life shall be endowed with mysterous but most real equipment. They shall obtain wings. We do well when picturing the angel presences to endow them with wings. At the best it is a clumsy symbolism, but all symbolisms of eternal things are clumsy and ineffective. And what do we mean by wings? We mean that life has gained new powers, extraordinary capacity; the old self has received heavenly addition, endowing it with nimbleness, buoyancy, strength. We used to sing in our childhood, "I want to be an angel." I am afraid the sentiment was often poor and unworthy, and removed our thoughts rather to a world that is to be than to the reality by which we are surrounded today. But it is right to wish to be an angel if by that wish we aspire after angelic powers and seek for angels' wings. It is right to long for their powers of flight, their capacity to soar unto the heights. We may have angels' wings. Wing-power is not only the reward of those who are redeemed out of time and emancipated from death, and who have entered into the largest life of the unseen glory, but it is the prerogative of you and me. "They that wait upon the Lord . . . shall mount up with wings." Waiting upon the Lord will enable us to share the angels' fellowship, to feed on angels' fellowship, to feed on angels' food, and to acquire the angels' power of wing. "They shall mount up with wings as eagles." Now let us see what are some of the characteristics of life with wings.

Characteristics of the "Wing Life."

I. It is life characterized by buoyancy. We become endowed with power to rise above things! How often we give counsel one to another, "You should rise above it!" But too often it is idle counsel, because it implies that the friend to whom we give it has the gift of wings; too frequently he is endowed with feet. If, when we give the counsel, we could give the wings, the things that bind him to the low plains of life might be left behind.

How frequently we are held in bondage by grovelling to the mean and trifling! Some small grievance enters into our life and keeps us from the heights. Some disappointment holds us in depressing servitude. Some ingratitude paralyzes our service and chills our delight in unselfish toil. Or some discourtesy is done to us, we cannot get away from it. Or, perhaps, it is "the murmur of self-will," or "the storm of passion" which prevents our emancipation. Whatever it may be, and there are a thousand such tyrannies, life is separated from the heavenlies, and becomes utterly mundane, of the earth earthy. Well, now, when we get the wings we have the power to rise above these trifles and may appear like gigantic hills. Wing-power gives buoyancy, and we are enabled to look down even upon the hills and see them beneath our feet. The life with wing-power is not the victim of "the spirit of heaviness." It does not creep along the deep, heavy melancholy. In the day of difficulty and disappointment it can soar and sing at heaven's gate.

Characterized by Loftiness.

II. Life with wing-power is characterized by loftiness. "They shall mount up!" You know how we speak of the men and women endowed with wings. We speak of a "lofty character," as opposed to one who is low or mean. There are men with low motives, and they move along the low way. There are men with mean affections which do not comprehend a brother. Now, it is the glorious characteristics of the Christian religion that it claims to give loftiness to the life. There is no feature that the Bible loves more to proclaim than just this feature of "aboveness." It distinguishes the disciples of Christ. See how the ambitions of the book run: "Seek the things that are above;" "Set your mind on things above." It speaks also of dwelling "with Christ in the heavenly places." All this describes the life that looks at everything from lofty standpoints and approaches everything with high ambition. We know these men when they appear. How often one has observed the power of their presence in public meetings! Other speakers have addressed the assembly, and the thought and life of the meeting have grovelled along a mean and questionable way. And then the wing-man comes! He lays hold of the subject, and what happens? Everybody says, "How he lifted it up!" A pure atmosphere came round about the assembly; everybody felt the inrush of a purer air and a finer light. We had mounted up with wings as eagles.

III. The wing-life is characterized by comprehensiveness. High soaring gives wide seeing. Loftiness gives comprehension. When we live on the low grounds we only possess a narrow outlook. One man offers his opinion on some weighty matter and he is answered by the charge, "That is very low ground to take." The low ground always means petty vision. Men who do not soar always have small views of things. We require wings for breadth of view. Now see! The higher you get the greater will be the area that comes within your view. We may judge our height by the measure of our outlook. How much do we see? We have not got very high if we only see ourselves; nay, we are in the mire! "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others." It is well when we get so high that our vision comprehends our town, better still when it includes the country, better still when it encircles other countries, best of all when it engirdles the world. It is well when we are interested in home missions; better still when home and foreign work are comprehended in our view. We cannot do this without wings, for without wings we cannot get into the heights. The higher we get the more we shall see of other parties beside our own. "Lord, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and we forbade him, because he followeth not with us." How narrow the outlook! One day the vision of the disciples will be immeasurably enlarged, and that will be when they are dwelling in the heavenly places with Christ. If we remain locked up in an ism we shall never see our brethren in the other isms. If we rise up into Christ we shall meet our brethren there. Unity is coming by the use of wings! "They shall mount up with wings as eagles."

Proportion a Characteristic.

IV. The wing-life is characterized by proportion. To see things but they contributed not one positive idea to the entire series. Note aright we must get away from them. We never see a thing truly until we see it in its relationships. We must see a moment in relation to a week, a week in relation to a year, a year in relation to eternity. Wing-power gives us the gift of soaring, and we see how things are related one to another. An affliction looked at from the lowlands may be stupendous; looked at from the heights it may appear little or nothing. "This light affliction which is but for a moment worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." What a breadth of view! and here is another, "The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed to us afterward." This is a bird's-eye view. It sees life "whole."

All these are characteristics of the life with wings. And does it not sound a strong and joyful life? "As Eagles!" How mighty the bird from which the picture is taken! What strength of wing! And such is to be ours if we wait upon the Lord. We shall be able to soar above the biggest disappointment and to wing our way into the very presence of the sun. "They that wait upon the Lord" shall have all this. Let us abide in waiting and find our joy and our power in the heights.

Missionary Library Dedicated at Yale

The new building housing the world's second greatest missionary library was dedicated at Yale on March 31, with appropriate services. Professor Williston Walker gave the opening address, and Rev. Arthur J. Brown, D. D., secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Missions, made an inspiring speech. The new building, which now completes a quadrangle, is the result of a bequest by the late Rev. George E. Day, D. D., the consecrated professor in the Yale Divinity School, who is said to have done student missionary movement work long before the Student Volunteer Movement and the Laymen's Missionary Movement stimulated public interest in foreign missions. Doctor Day built up a missionary library gradually, until it became what is said to be the second most valuable collection of missionary books in the whole world. A few years ago, Doctor Day died, but left a large bequest to provide a special library building for this collection, also a special fund out of which each year new missionary books are purchased and added to the library. The main room of the library building has a capacity for 25,000 volumes, three times as many as are now owned by the school.

With the object of saving its employes $2,000,000 a year in the purchase of food and incidentally developing a system of farms and dairies that will improve the quality of foodstuffs, the New York Railways Company has opened the first of its co-operative stores. The first day's sales showed a total of just under $1,500. Prices of all articles were shown conspicuously, and the manager said that everything was being disposed of at considerably less than the market price.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

CHARLES DICKENS, CHAMPION OF CHILDHOOD

The early part of the nineteenth century was an age of social wrongs. The application of machinery to manufactures made, for the first time in the world, the woman and the child an important industrial asset. In England, no law regulated their hours of labor; a commission was appointed and brought an enormous amount of evidence to show the terrible effects of overworking women and children. A statute was passed in 1833, forbidding women and children to work more than twelve hours a day! Think of it, when strong men are now demanding a working day of eight hours.

One of the first voices to be lifted against the iniquities of child labor was Elizabeth Barrett, in her "Cry of the Children:"

"Do you hear the children weeping, O my brothers,
Ere the sorrow comes with years?
They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
And that does not stop their tears.
They look up with their pale and sunken faces,
And this look is dread to see.
For you think you see their angels in their places,
With eyes meant for Deity . . .
But the child's sob curseth deeper in the silence,
Than the strong man in his wrath."

These little slaves of the mine and the factory are very different from Wordsworth's serene children, with the light of heaven lingering on their earnest faces—but those who plead their cause had as sacred a mission as the great poet and prophet of childhood.

I think I may venture to say that Charles Dickens was the most powerful advocate that wronged childhood has ever had; he wrote from a burning heart, for he had known the pangs of poverty and child labor. Think of the pathetic procession of abused and neglected children in his novels, and the passion with which he pleads for them!

Oliver Twist, starving in the poorhouse, and poisoned mentally and spiritually in the school where boys were trained for crime; the outcast Joe, always being "moved on" by the relentless arm of the law—a figure of everlasting pathos, pleading the cause of the helpless and hopeless childhood of the slums; Smike, bereft of will and reason by the brutality of a system of getting rid of illegitimate children; David Copperfield, suffering from the cruelty of a stepfather, and the hopeless grind of lonely work in a great store; Esther Summerson, Florence Dombey, starving for love—and many others, who speak to us from his pages of the wrongs of the little ones.

What capacity for pain these children show,—and what a new note that was! A child's sorrow was thought a light thing, until Dickens threw the searchlight of his genius on their sensitive, suffering hearts! He, and other wise writers, have taught us that theirs are among the deepest sorrows of life. As we grow older, we become acquainted with grief, and learn that it is not lasting—

"That darkness passes, storms cannot abide,
A little patience, and the fog is past,"

Or, as the Good Book puts it, "experience worketh hope;" but a child's sorrow has no such consolation—there is nothing to measure it by, and there seems no end to it.

And what fidelity to a trust these little ones show! Little Nell, following her grandfather through his hard pilgrimage, guarding and caring for him with grave, unchildlike forethought; little Charley, nursing his kind mistress through the smallpox, the Marchioness running away to care for her friend, while he lay neglected and wasting with fever; and many others of whom I cannot pause to tell.

The Social Rights of the Child.

But Dickens not only paints the social wrongs of children, he also fights a good fight for their social rights. His plea for right training and education for them is perhaps his greatest contribution toward the modern uplift of childhood. He was the first great English student of Froebel, the first Englishman of note to advocate the kindergarten. He gives more attention to the training of the child than any other novelist, or any other educator, except Froebel. He makes schoolmasters prominent characters in six of his books, and deals with nineteen different schools. It is not too much to say, that he has taken the most advanced position on every phase of modern educational thought except manual training, and when he is thoroughly understood, will be recognized as the Froebel of England.

I have treated Wordsworth and Dickens, the pioneer champions of childhood in literature, somewhat in detail, because the pioneer deserves all the glory that can be given, and because their work has been a keynote and an inspiration for the hosts of writers who now give us loving and true pictures of child life. It would not be possible even to mention them in detail, for their name is legion.

Two Master Painters of Childhood.

Victor Hugo was one of the greatest child lovers in literature, and we find wonderful pictures of them in his writings, especially in "Les Miserables." It is a book of wrongs, so we expect to find there the child wronged. Look at the little orphan, Cosette, the pitiful drudge of the innkeepers—overwhelmed with blows by the brutality of the woman, barefooted, clad in rags, because of the avarice of the man! What more pathetic picture in literature than this forlorn babe in the woods, forced to go at night to the spring in the woods for water for the horses! Before her terrified vision was the black winter forest, where beasts, or even spectres, might be looking to seize her, but behind her was the dreadful innkeeper, with hideous, hyena mouth, and wrathful eyes. The phantoms of night and the forest were less terrible than the cruel, implacable Thenardier.

Or take Gavroche, a thief, a street brat, a ragged outcast, finding his only shelter in a tumble down monument—yet, in spite of the pangs of hunger, and the pinch of cold, sharing his scanty bit of bread with two starving children, and giving his shawl to a freezing, half naked girl.

When finally the little gamin fraternizes with the noble young revolutionists, his is the most heroic figure in that group of patriots. He saves them by recognizing the spy Tavert; he goes out to reconnoiter when it seems certain death; when the ammunition is exhausted, he climbs over the barricade to get a fresh supply. And when he finally falls under a rain of bullets, he passes from the story with the tender epitaph, "This grand little soul had taken its flight."

A picture of childhood wronged, but childhood glorified, is given to us by George Macdonald in "Sir Gibbie." Like Gavroche, Gibbie was a street waif in a great city, denied not only food and raiment and love and care, but denied also the gift of articulate speech. But the mute boy was happy because his heart was a spring of love, which was ever seeking its outlet in service. His drunken father was the special object of his devotion; each night he waited without the tavern, until the poor drunkard would stagger out, and then, with infinite pains and ingenuity, would pilot him to the haven of his bed and garret—and there found his reward and his heaven in sleeping on that poor, erring father's bosom. After his father's death, he constituted himself the guardian of helpless drunkards generally.

It sounds as if it were a sad story, but it is not, neither does Gibbie seem a strained or unnatural character. For, after all, the most imperious craving of the heart is love, and true love is always helpful. With these two talismans of love and service, Gibbie was victorious over cold and hunger and homelessness.

Woman's World

—Mrs. Luella B. Johnston of Sacramento, Cal., is believed to be the first and only woman yet chosen as a commissioner by any city which has adopted the commission form of government.

—Miss Julia Lathrop of Chicago will serve the remaining three years of her term as chief of the new children's bureau and may be reappointed. It is said that President Wilson will not yield to the pressure to remove her and name in her place Mrs. Robert Wicliffe.

—Woman police officers grew out of an effort made by the Young Women's Christian associations to safeguard young women during the St. Louis exposition in 1904. This protective work has been found so valuable that several cities in Washington state, in Oregon, Colorado, California and Maryland have made it a part of their police service, with women endowed with police powers to work for women and children.

—Lady Dorothy Nevill, long one of the most remarkable figures in London society, died recently in London of bronchitis within six days of her eighty-seventh birthday. Her memory was said to be wonderful. It went back to the days of George IV. She had known the great Duke of Wellington and could recall the famous dandy, Count d'Orsay; enjoyed the friendship of Gladstone, Disraeli and a host of other notables of the last century and knew Prince Louis Napoleon in the days of exile which preceded his rise to the imperial throne. Lady Nevill's Sunday luncheons for many years were famous. King Edward, as the Prince of Wales, frequently attended them and used to describe them as the pleasantest parties in London. In her old age she wrote her reminiscences in several entertaining books.

THE GOODLY FELLOWSHIP, by Rachel C. Schauffler, has Persia for its background, with characters drawn from a mission station there. The heroine, Jean Stuart, of New York and Bar Harbor, is a wealthy society girl touring the world; she is rescued from mountain brigands by Thorley Prescott, who is a missionary, not from love of the work, but because he had promised his dying mother to follow that calling. How these two strongly individualized characters are won to a genuine Christian experience, and to a love for each other, is told in a story of unusual appeal. It is full of stirring adventures, as well as insight into the mind of the people of Persia, and the hearts of the noble band of missionaries who were giving their lives to this service. The author is the daughter of a missionary, born on the mission field, but came back to Amerspiration to this fine book. [The Macmillan Company, New York, Price $1.25 net.]

Disciples Table Talk

Using Printer's Ink at Macon, Ga.

April 27 was observed as Dedication and Good Fellowship Day at Macon, Ga., where Leroy M. Anderson ministers. A new pipe organ and a church printery were dedicated to the service of the church. Mr. Anderson has this to say of the new printery: "The world is reading as never before. And it is a good class of reading men want. The church realizes this and is seeking to place the proper matter in the hands of a nascent world. Not a whit behind is our congregation in this building of a new citizenship through the press, and we announce the purchase of a complete printery to be known as the Christian Church Printery. It will be conducted by parties with years of experience in the mechanical and editorial departments, and besides publishing a weekly paper, there will also be tracts, brochures, advertising matter relative to the kingdom of God and civic righteousness printed by the thousands. It will also give opportunity to direct the motor activity of the young people in the church and Sunday-school, giving training in editorial, reportorial and story writing work, and systematc learning of a profitable and worthy trade to all who make proper application."

A Boy Specialist.

R. N. Simpson, pastor at Harrodsburg, Ky., is specializing on boys. He has inaugurated a once-a-month series of sermons on boys and girls of the Bible. The first of the series was on "The Boy Slave in Potiphar's House." In this the splendid traits of character in the youth of Joseph that are reproduced in the true Boy Scout of modern times, were emphasized by the pastor. A feature of Mr. Simpson's work is a fine organization of Boy Scouts, with a membership of forty. The Scouts meet every Saturday morning at nine o'clock for instruction and games. There are three full patrols and a fourth is forming. The boys are planning a Field Day for May and their encampment for June. The Pages of the Holy Grail meet the second and fourth Tuesday in each month at Harrod Castle for initiation and business connected with their rank.

What About the Preacher Supply?

One of the striking addresses given at the meeting of the Central Illinois Christian Ministers' Institute, Lincoln, Ill., was that by Pres. J. H. McMurray, of Lincoln College on the theme, "Ministerial Supply." President McMurray plainly portrayed the present and prospective need of ministers of the gospel by giving the statistics on the decrease of candidates for the ministry in the last ten years. The statistics were taken from fifty-eight of the leading theological seminaries, including more than a dozen denominations. In the ten years there has been an 18 per cent decrease in ministerial candidates and at the same time an increase of 25 per cent in the church membership. He also gave statistics showing from what class of people the large percentage of the preachers come. Twenty per cent are sons of farmers, ten per cent sons of ministers, six per cent sons of laborers and so on in smaller percentages. The speaker stated several reasons for the decrease in ministerial candidates, some of which were the call of commercialism, false standards of success, small salaries of ministers and the lack of information and inspiration in the molding period of child life. He then gave some means and methods to overcome this tendency. Among these were (1) Parents must dedicate their sons. (2) Ministers must keep needs and attraction of the ministry before their congregations. (3) Christians should emphasize the dignity of the ministry. (4) Claims on young men for entering the ministry should be urged by Sunday-school teachers. He urged that evangelical and vocation campaigns be made in all the churches. Worthy and needy young men should be aided financially by the church. The governments of the world train men to fight for their cause and so should the followers of Christ do likewise.

The Missionary Life Not Easy.

Any who are under the impression that the life of the modern missionary is an easy one, should read with care such letters as the following, written to a friend in America by Dr. Paul Wakefield, of Lu Chow Fu, China: "Our quarters here are by no means comfortable. Our trunks and boxes of clothing are stacked up as best may be. I cannot even get at my desk. We eat and live and study and play and receive guests in this one room. No chance for privacy or quiet. But now, March 10, bedbugs are coming out, and in a Chinese hospital they carry disease. In another month flies will be here. Our location here then becomes one of absolute danger. Mary has a sore throat now that she got from a child in the hospital. I thought at first it was diphtheria. It has spread all over the place. In another month will come smallpox. The Chinese will walk right into the clinic with it. The children to go out of the place have to go right through the hospital yard. and every Chinaman wants to play with them and talk to them. They cannot go out to play without someone with them." In connection with this letter from a medical missionary it is interesting to note the following, from an address delivered by Yuan Shi-Kai, president of the Chinese Republic: "It gives me great pleasure to receive here so many members of the China Medical Missionary Association, who have gathered together in the capital from far distant provinces. I am really grateful to you for the charitable services you have rendered to the people, especially in the interior of the country, where they do not know the importance of sanitary principles. The disastrous plague of two years ago in Manchuria at one time alarmed the whole world. Many of you were engaged in assisting the local authorities to devise means of prevention, and the checking of the extension of the pestilence was principally due to your efforts."

The "World Call" at Bloomington, Ind.

Joseph C. Todd, University Pastor at Bloomington, Ind., reports that Bloomington and the State University have heard the "world call" as they never did before. "The College of Missions at Indianapolis," he writes, "was literally moved to Bloomington during April 13-15." Pres. C. T. Paul and Mrs. Paul; F. E. Lumley, Professor of Social Science and Pedagogy; Dr. H. C. Hurd, Professor of Anthropology and Missionary Science; J. G. McGavran, Professor of Hindu Languages and Literature, and Rev. Motosaburo Oiwa, Professor of Japanese Language and Literature, visited Bloomington under the auspices of the Indiana University Pastors' Association, an organization of the religious workers at the University. Several churches co-operated in making the mission effective. Classes and pulpits were thrown open to these missionary leaders. Prof. Lumley delivered an address at the University on "The Social Obligation of Students." Mr. Oiwa addressed a mass meeting of young people on the theme, "Why I Am a Christian?" and Prof. McGavran on "Lives Worth While." On Monday morning the students and faculty gathered at the university auditorium to hear President Paul on "The Renaissance of China." Many conferences marked these significant days. The last service was a union meeting of missionary societies of the city, at which President Paul spoke on "Petrus Rijnhart." Mr. Todd makes the following observations, gleaned from the conference. The College of Mission workers can deliver telling messages, and are worthy a place on any platform; this series of services suggests a new field for the faculty of the College of Missions—recruiting excursions in which call is made for volunteers of self and wealth for the world cause of the Kingdom; the practice of unity among the five churches joining in the conference. As one result of the meetings Mr. Todd states that no less than fifty have been led to give serious thought to the mission field as a life work, half of these having already sought guidance from the visitors or the University pastors. There were a number of definite commitments, the prospect being that the student volunteer band will be doubled. This fact alone justifies the conference.

"Girl Problem the Greatest."

As president of William Woods College, Fulton, Mo., a school for girls, Joseph L. Garvin was speaking from experience when he declared during a recent convention that "the girl problem is the greatest problem confronting the country today." "It is not talked of nor written of," he continued, "but it is a home problem and therefore most vital. Our school aims to do two things—give a thorough education and at the same time train girls to go out and enter homes of their own where the Christian atmosphere is maintained."

A Real Teacher of Teachers.

Among Sunday-school workers in the brotherhood who are doing substantial service is Miss Eva Lemert, who has been conducting a successful Sunday-school campaign at Bloomington, Illinois, in connection with the evangelistic services conducted there by Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore. So valuable has been her work that several hundred church people of the city, regardless of denominational lines, regularly attend the Sunday-school conferences. Typical of her work were her lectures on "The Mid-week Training School," and "The Life Touch in the School." "No one should teach in the Sunday-school," Miss Lemert believes, "who is not being trained to teach. The new ideals of modern Sunday-school efficiency demand a training school for teachers meeting weekly and established permanently as part of the church life."

Houston, Texas, Central, Reports.

The annual report of the Central Church, Houston, Tex., of which W. S. Lockhart is pastor, presents the following as some of the achievements of the past year. 1. The division, organization and enlargement of the boards, and the more efficient work of each because of this division. 2. The establishment of city evangelistic work and the calling of O. M. Pennock. Two missions started—Bellaire and Houston Heights. The Heights church is self-supporting and has called T. F. Weaver to be pastor. 3. The organization of a city mission board to plan and direct the missionary work in the city. 4. The increase in membership, as follows: during the regular services, 263; during evangelistic services, 353; total, 616. 5. The Sunday-school has been carefully graded, thus doing more efficient work. The attendance has nearly doubled. The "Loyal Women's" Class and Club, the Cradle Roll and Home Department have been organized. 6. The C. W. B. M. has been raised to a living link standard, membership increased, and a Young Ladies' Missionary Circle organized. 7. The changing of the Ladies' Aid Society to the Dorcas Circle, with increased activity. 8. The establishment of the office of financial secretary and assistant pastor combined.

Churches Federate at Springfield, Mo.

A meeting of pastors and laymen of all the churches of Springfield, Mo., was held at the South Street church recently for the purpose of effecting the organization of a church federation. The federation was organized with the intention of having a cohesive force which can proceed as a body in any movement for moral betterment or the uplift of the social conditions of the city. The united effort of the churches is felt to be assured if each of the denominations in the city has representatives in the federation. The movement is an unusual step among the churches of Springfield, as at no former time have the churches joined in a central organization.

Training the Young in Church-Going.

The church at Marion, Kan., have rented the Free Methodist church and are conducting a church service for children at the regular morning hour for worship. The aim of the service is to train children in the habit of regular church attendance, and equip them in every way for the church of the next generation. The first part of the service consists of the usual opening exercises, followed by observance of the communion by helpers and children who are members of the church, and a sermonette for children. Then comes the C. E. period, when children are taught leadership and trained for active service. There is then a separation into classes for Bible and Mission Study. One of the most interesting and helpful features of the plan is a nursery in connection with the meeting where little ones are cared for. Thus the mothers may bring the little ones and know that they are safe in the hands of the "Nursery Mother" while they enjoy the regular church service. Provision is made for all children from infancy to fifteen years of age, so that there is no reason why the entire family may not worship in the house of God every Lord's Day morning. This plan is not intended to break the unity of the few families who do worship as a family, but to train those children in the habit of leaving the church at the close of Bible School, for regular attendance, with the hope that in a few years where now but few families have all members present, there shall be many.

Annual Convention, Jubbulpur, C. P. India.

Mrs. O. J. Grainger, Mungeli, C. P. India, writes, under date of March 12: "The Missionaries of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions have just held their annual convention in Jubbulpur, C. P. India. Missionaries in India look forward to this annual convention with great anticipation and with much prayer. It is the one time in the year when they can meet together to praise God for his wonderful goodness, when they can with one heart call upon Him for forgiveness and strength, when they can discuss together the problems which confront mission work. The morning sessions were a series of services on the theme, "The Glorious Gospel"; First, Its note of Sacrifice; Second, Its note of Love; Third, Its note of Forbearance; Fourth, Its note of Victory. The other sessions of the day were given to planning the work and to estimating the expense for the coming year. We welcomed three new missionaries to our midst, Miss Furman, Miss Caudrey, and Dr. Tallman. We are very thankful for these reinforcements. We enter upon another year's work with renewed courage and with a full assurance that His Word will not return unto Him void. Pray for your fellow workers in India."

More Questions and Answers.

E. A. Hibler, pastor at Warren, O., has had much to say to his congregation recently about calling Bible things by Bible names, and has directed his aim especially against the popular use of such terms as "reverand" and "clergyman." In answer to questions propounded to the congregation by Mr. Hibler, many answers have been received. Among those we note the following: 1. What is the difference between the Sabbath and the Lord's day? Ans. The Sabbath was a day of rest. Ex. 20:10. The Lord's day, or the first day of the week, is a day of worship. Acts 20:7; Rev. 1:10. 2. What is the numerical difference? Ans. The Sabbath, the seventh day. Deut. 5:14. The Lord's day, the first day of the week. Mark 16:1, 2, 3. What is the civil name for the two days? Ans. The Sabbath is called Saturday. The Lord's day is called Sunday. 4. What do these two days commemorate? Ans. The Sabbath commemorates the rest day of creation and bondage in Egypt. The Lord's day commemorates the resurrection of the Saviour of the world.

Attention Brethren!

Less than 50% of our contributing churches have to this date ordered supplies for the May offering. So far as it hazards the income of the American Society, this ominous fact causes the Home Office more anxiety than the devastation by floods and storms.

Brethren, will the offering be taken in your church? Speak up, please, and give our anxious hearts relief. Drop us a card and tell us what we may expect. Offering envelopes and literature furnished free. Write now to

Shall It Be the Greatest?

George A. Miller, president of the American Christian Missionary Society, declares that the year 1913 should be the greatest in our home mission history for four reasons: First, because our attention is being directed, by the fact that the annual convention meets at Toronto this year, to the opportunity for missionary activity in the vast territory of our Sister to the North; second, because of the effort being directed toward the evangelization of foreigners in the United States; third, because of the fact that the cities are receiving more attention than ever before in history; fourth, beause of the revival of interest in the question of religious life in towns and villages. For these reasons President Miller asks a liberal offering in May.

Bible Lectureship, University of Illinois.

The annual Bible Lectureship upon the T. H. Bondurant Foundation, given at the University of Illinois under the auspices of the University Place Christian Church, was presented the week of April 27, the lecturer being J. H. Garrison, editor emeritus of the Christian-Evangelist. The subjects treated were: "The Place of Religion in the Life of Man"; "The Place of Christ in Religion;" "The Place of the Bible in Christianity;" "The Place of the Church in Christ's Plan"; "The Place and Progress of the Kingdom of God." Dr. Garrison also preached each evening at University Place Church. The late T. H. Bondurant, of Deland, Ill., among many munificent bequests provided in his will for this perpetual fund to provide each year in the State schools of Illinois a series of Bible lectures of such value as to be worthy of preservation in book form. Stephen E. Fisher ministers at Champaign.

The West Washington Missionary Rally was held at Tacoma, April 27-29.

George Darsie, of Terre Haute is "mixing religion with politics." He preached recently on "Our Next Mayor—Who?"

M. A. Thompson, minister of the church at Puyallup, Washington, has accepted the principalship of one of the Puyallup schools.

J. B. Weldon, pastor at Boonville, Mo., has been granted a leave of absence of two months. During this time Mr. Weldon will try to regain his health in California.

Fifty churches were represented at the North Indiana District convention held at Fort Wayne. This is said to be an unusual report.

The Kansas State Convention, 1914, will be held at Arkansas City, Kan., April 1. The 1913 meeting was held at Emporia. Hugh Lomax is the new president.

The congregation at Fairmount, Ind., is planning to dedicate its new building during May. Mr. Myrick, late of Redkey, Ind., began work with this church May 1.

At the Bell County, Tex., Convention, held at Belton, April 14, E. C. Boynton, of Belton, was elected permanent chairman, and Charles M. Ashmore, of Rogers, secretary.

The First Church, Tacoma, has named May as "Acquaintance Month." It is planned that during this month in so far as possible every member will visit every other member.

Among the speakers before the district convention held at Hutchinson, Kan., were K. F. Nance, Ira Garmon and G. W. Alford, all of Hutchinson. The sessions began April 21.

The Tod Avenue Church, Warren, O., dedicated their new home April 20. A fellowship service was held in the afternoon, at which members of all the city's churches were present.

At the district convention held at Plattsmouth, Neb., recently, J. L. Ellis, minister at Unadilla, was chosen president for the coming year. The next convention will be held at Greenwood.

A telegram from H. P. Atkins, at Birmingham, Ala., reports that First Church of that city has pledged $1,200 for home missions. I. N. McCash addressed this congregation Sunday, Apr. 20.

The church at Athens, O., have secured an option on a splendid piece of property at W. State and Congress streets, valued at $10,000. It is expected that a new church home will be erected on this site within a few months.

R. B. Helser, pastor at Trenton, Mo., is pursuing the plan of following his Sunday evening sermons with stereopticon views illustrating the international Sunday-school lessons. At a recent meeting fifty pictures were shown, illustrating the life of Christ.

Miss Olive Griffith, of Damoh, India, takes charge of the girls' orphanage at Bilaspur Miss Kingsbury, of the C. W. B. M. has gone on a furlough. Miss Kingsbury has served long and faithfully and richly deserves the change and rest. There are one hundred and twenty-five girls in the orphanage.

Some changes have recently been made in the location of the staff of missionaries of the Foreign Society in India, agreeable to all, however. Miss Stella Franklin will go to Mungeli; Dr. Jennie V. Fleming to Harda, after her return from her furlough; and Miss Josepha Franklin will take up the work at Damoh.

Practically the entire membership of the West Jefferson Street Church, Ft. Wayne, Ind., gathered at the reception given their pastor, Earle M. Todd, who is departing for another field. A purse of gold was presented to Mr. Todd by the congregation as a token of appreciation of the service he has given them during his ministry.

The members of the official board of the Christian church, at Oakwood Mo., by an unanimous vote, requested that the pastor, William H. Cannon, reconsider his resignation, which was tendered several weeks ago. Mr. Cannon has notified the board that he will accede to their wishes and remain in charge of the church.

Forest Avenue Church, Kansas City, Mo., organized twenty years ago, had its annual "home coming service" April 13. A. W. Kokendoffer, of Sedalia, who was the first pastor of the church, preached on the text, "Thy people shall be a willing people in the day of thy power." R. B. Briney is the present pastor.

A letter from S. D. Dutcher, former Terre Haute pastor, has been received by George Darsie, of that city. In part it runs as follows: "I am here in the Battle Creek Sanitarium. Do not know how long we shall be here nor what is before us. We are strangers in a strange country." This news item will be a surprise to many.

The church at Jacksonville, Ill., supports the Lu Chow Fu (China) hospital and dispensary at $1,000 per year. Clyde Darsie, the pastor, sends some interesting information: For regular hospital work per year, $565.93; for dispensary per year, $434.10; total cost of hospital per year, $1,008.04; total patients treated last year, 17,530.

R. Ray Eldred, Longa, Africa, writes: "The number of additions to the church for the whole mission so far is already larger this year than last. The Lord's work here is growing and while the price of the Congo's redemption is being paid may the churches at home not think it too costly and may others be found who will help to garner in the sheaves."

The annual convention of the churches of the sixth district, Missouri, is to be held at Macon, May 12 and 13. W. A. Shullenberger and Mrs. Q. T. Hall are convention chairmen. On the program, among others, are: J. H. Wood, Shelbina; H. B. Robison, Canton; R. B. Briney, Kansas City; A. R. Leverett, Kansas City; G. A. Campbell, Hannibal; W. D. Endres, Kirksville; Miss Alice Doherty, Dexter and Mrs. Ralph Latshaw, Kansas City.

At the annual meeting of the church at Niles, O., held April 10, reports from the various organizations showed that the past year had been unprecedented in work done and in raising of finances, but the surprise of the evening was experienced when the trustees reported that $8,000 had been raised, all church debts liquidated and the affairs at the present time in excellent condition. Allen T. Gordon is beginning his sixth year as pastor of this church.

H. C. Boblitt will close his successful work as pastor of the Rocky Mount, N. C., Christian Church in May to take the field as leader of song in religious conventions. Mr. Boblitt is happily gifted with special talents for song leading and will devote his whole time to that work. His permanent address will be care of Fillmore Music House, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Ever since the congregation of the burned Central Christian Church, Peoria, has been meeting in the Shrine temple, their morning church service has been blended with the Sunday-school, and the two made one continuous service, with no sermon, but only a short impromptu talk by the pastor, M. L. Pontius. However, so many strangers to the church and plan have been attending the morning services in recent weeks, that Mr. Pontius has decided to go back to the plan of a regular sermon at 11 o'clock.

When E. L. Day, pastor of the North Park Christian Church, Indianapolis, went to the church for the regular weekly prayer service two weeks ago, he was surprised to find the large assembly room filled with practically the entire congregation. The members of the church had planned the surprise in recognition of Mr. Day's completion of two years of excellent service as pastor. Several members of the congregation spoke in praise of Mr. Day's work and the minister, who was deeply touched, responded. Three members were taken into the church.

Miss Edith L. Apperson, of Pomona, California, has been appointed a missionary to Africa by the Foreign Society. She sailed from New York on the S. S. "Zeeland," on April 19. This new worker will be supported by the church at Pomona. This is the second "living-link" for this church through the Foreign Society. C. R. Hudson, the pastor, and the whole church are much encouraged over the missionary advance of this congregation. He says that the letters written by Miss Apperson from Africa will be read from time to time in the Sunday-school.

The church at Gary, Ind., has established a full-fledged nursery in one room of its building. A competent nurse, with assistants, will have charge. Officials of the church have decided to try out the plan in order to relieve mothers who have been obliged to remain away from services or leave during the progress of the sermons on account of crying children. It is believed that an increase in the attendance will result from the plan. Other churches of Gary have been considering the same plan and it will probably be adopted in all these institutions within a short time.

First Church, Duluth, Minn., dedicated the first story of its new building April 13. The principal address was given by Evangelist Robert Whiston. A collection was taken for the fund to be used in the completion of the church, and about $3,000 was realized. The first floor, which has been completed, with the lot, cost $15,500. This was not really the whole expense, however, for a considerable amount of the work on the building was donated by members. The main auditorium of the new building has a seating capacity of 400. The membership of the church now numbers more than 200, and in addition to this, the Sunday-school has about 175.

Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland, held a reception for its new members April 17. Since September 1, 1912, 114 new members have been received, 31 being by confession. On the occasion of a recent baptismal service Mr. Goldner, the pastor of this church, had the unique experience of baptizing two men one a Jew and the other a Roman Catholic. Euclid Avenue will celebrate its seventieth anniversary in October. A week's program is being planned. Anniversary aims have been adopted as follows: A resident membership of 800 in the church; an attendance of 100 in prayer meeting; an average attendance of 500 in Sunday-school.

At the latest Sunday-school service of the special season of evangelistic and organizing effort, at First Church, Bloomington, Ill., 875 were present in the Bible school and eighty new pupils were enrolled, making a total of 432 new pupils enrolled in four weeks. Especially noteworthy is the high mark of attendance of the last two Sundays, which was sustained without high pressure methods, but instead by the general interest and the new orderly system introduced by Miss Eva Lemert. The junior and intermediate departments are newly organized and have seventeen new teachers at work. Already the need of a room for this department is looming large and an effort will be made to find temporary quarters in some building near the church. This church has recently fallen heir to $4,000, by the will of the late Miss Ethel M. Clarke.

Disciples day, during "The World in Chicago," will be Monday, May 26. It is expected that national secretaries S. J. Corey, I. N. McCash, Claude Hill and Mrs. Anna Atwater will be present; also one of the notable men of the brotherhood, as a star attraction. A meeting will be held at 2 p. m., at which the secretaries and several other speakers will deliver addresses. A shorter meeting will be addressed by the secretaries at 5 o'clock, and at 6 p. m., will be given the denominational dinner. All these assemblies will be held in one of the halls of the Coliseum.

A Rock Island, Ill., newspaper has this to say of the coming of M. E. Chatley to the pulpit of the Memorial Church, at that place: "Mr. Chatley gives the impression that he will be not only a popular preacher, but that he will be an aggressive worker in all lines of church work and that he will be a welcome addition to the ranks of the local pastors. He is a man well schooled and trained for the ministry, a man whose heart is in his work and who will make himself felt in the community when he gets better acquainted. The congregation is congratulating itself in the choice of a pastor and looks forward to better things during the coming year."

Members of the church at Janesville, Wis., recently celebrated the first anniversary of the beginning of their work, with a reception and banquet held at the Caledonian rooms, their regular meeting place. Frank L. Van Voorhis acted as toastmaster. I. R. Spencer has ministered to this congregation during most of the past year. All the property of this congregation, together with the rooms in which they formerly had their meetings, were destroyed by fire April 1. It was a fine, heroic spirit that prompted this recent anniversary gathering.

The Third District, Missouri, Convention will be held at Greenfield, May 5-7. On the program will be, among others, Stephen J. Corey, W. R. Warren, W. J. Lhamon, and Levi Marshall. Special features will be a social service banquet presided over by D. W. Moore; an address by W. T. Carrington, of the Springfield Normal School, on "The Common Schools and Religious Training;" an address by A. J. McDowell, of the Department of Development, Frisco Lines, on the subject, "The Influences of Better Agriculture on a Community;" a talk by J. S. Shupp, of the Anti-Saloon League, on "Is Southwest Missouri Going Dry?" In addition to these, Clair S. Adams, Field Assistant for the Department of Church and Rural Life of the Presbyterian Home Board, will present surveys of country church problems. The first session of the convention will open at 2 p. m., May 5.

The Illinois State Sunday School Convention will meet at Beardstown, May 13-15. Among the notable speakers listed are: W. C. Pearce, John L. Alexander, Dr. Franklin McElfresh, Mrs. Mary Foster Bryner and Mrs. Zillah Foster Stevens of the International Committee; J. N. McDonald of Maroa; F. H. Brigham, General Secretary Wisconsin Sunday School Association; W. B. Morris, State Secretary Baptist Sunday School Work; Clarence L. DePew, State Secretary Disciples Sunday School Work; Prof. Frank Ward, Chicago; H. M. Bannen, Rockford; James A. Beebe, D. D., Chicago; Dr. W. E. Chalmers, National Educational Secretary of the Baptist Sunday-school Work, and the music will be led by Prof. E. O. Excell, of "everywhere." Credentials can be secured from the secretary of county associations. Entertainment can be secured at the following rates, by mailing to G. W. Morton, Beardstown, the card attached to the credential: Hotels—Per day, $1.50 to $3.00; lodging and breakfast, 85c to $2.00; rooms only, 50c and 75c. Private homes—Lodging and breakfast, one in a room, 75c; two in a room, 50c each.

Blesses Benefactor and Beneficiary

The annuity plan is growing into great favor among the friends of the widow and the orphan. During the past month gifts of $1,000, $100 and $500 have been received. By this plan it is practicable for people of modest means to give in a most effectual way. The gift (on which the annuitant receives 6 per cent if fifty years of age) protects the giver in his old age when he most needs protection; and it protects and cares for our Lord's dependent "little ones" in their poverty and helplessness when they most need such protection.

The most enthusiastic friends of the plan are those who have tried it. A good friend in California in acknowledging the receipt of annuity interest writes: "We have been talking for some time of adding to our annuity but neglected it. You will please find check enclosed for $500 to be added to Bond No. ———. Please find enclosed a five dollar bill for an Easter offering. I am deeply interested in the orphans and old people. Would be glad if we could do more for them.

Friends, if you want to learn of the very best way to invest for Time and for Eternity let us acquaint you with our annuity-plan. Address all communications and send all offerings direct to

Flood Relief in Ohio

I have recently made a personal tour of investigation visiting a large number of the churches most seriously injured by the floods. Personal investigation revealed the substantial accuracy of representations made by me in former letters. No description can gave an adequate conception of the unspeakable desolation of cities that were the embodiment of beauty and prosperity. Some idea of the magnitude of the devastation and loss can be gained from the report of the chief engineer that it will cost $600,000 in Dayton to clean the streets and cellars alone. Readers will be interested to know that the Miami Presbytery issued a call to the Presbyterian brotherhood for $175,000 for the benefit of the Presbyterian churches in that valley.

Receipts to date at this office total $2,005.23. Of this amount $2,225.92 came from Ohio, $779.31 from outside the state. The committee has apportioned the cash thus far received among the following churches: Dayton, West Side, $400; Hamilton, First, and Coke, Otto, $300; Portsmouth, First, $1,000; Zanesville, $400; McConnelsville, $400; Ironton, $150; Chilicothe, $200; Chicago Ave., Columbus, $100; Marietta, $50. Twenty thousand dollars of assistance from friends would still leave these afflicted churches with very heavy problems to work out in their present conditions.

A GREAT AND POPULAR CHURCH MUSIC BOOK

The New Praise Hymnal

By GILBERT J. ELLIS and J. H. FILLMORE

The New Praise Hymnal comes as near being the ideal church hymnal for the present day as could well be conceived. It is a handsome book, dignified in appearance and make-up. It embraces in its contents as nearly everything demanded to-day as could be gotten into a book of 600 pages.

The New Praise Hymnal is practical in every way; everything in it is available for use in the average congregation. It contains what is used by the most advanced churches. The setting of the hymns and music is engaging to the eye and pleasant to read and sing.

It is a book that grows in favor as it is used. New beauties are discovered from time to time as its pages are tested. The hymns and tunes of the church universal are found in The New Praise Hymnal, also the best available Gospel Songs that the modern church has found to be necessary to its various activities.

The sales of The New Praise Hymnal are larger now than they have ever been. The sales are increasing day by day. This means that it meets the demands better than any other book. Sample Copies mailed for examination.

Prices: Silk Cloth Sides, Leather Back, at $70 per 100; Vellum Cloth, at $50 per 100.

ADDITIONS TO CHURCHES.

Evanston, Ill., O. F. Jordan, pastor; 6 in 30 days, regular services.

Douglas Park, Chicafio, C. G. Baker, pastor; 8 last two Sundays, 22 last five weeks, regular services.

HERE AND THERE.

B. S. Ferrall, of the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, reports that he took a confession recently through an interpreter. Four confessions are reported for March 30, four April 6 and seven April 13.

On May 14 J. W. Porter, pastor of the Rantoul, Ill., church will wed Miss Lura V. Thompson, of Carthage, who has for a long time been engaged in field work for the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

The building committee of the First Church, Findlay, O., has purchased an additional tract of ground adjoining the site of the burned church and will build thereon a handsome structure.

Jesse P. McKnight and wife were royally received in their new field of service, First Church, Pasadena, Cal. Four hundred persons attended the reception given in their honor April 11. Mr. and Mrs. McKnight have recently returned from their wedding journey.

The annual convention of the Fourth district, Kansas, which includes the counties of Butler, Chautauqua, Cowley, Elk, Greenwood, Harvey, Sedgwick and Sumner, was held at Conway Springs April 23-25. O. L. Smith, pastor of the Christian church, at Wellington, was president of the convention.

W. H. Bagby, who for a number of years has been on the firing line in the far West, in Denver, Colorado, Phoenix, Arizona, Salt Lake City, Utah, Missoula, Montana and San Francisco, has accepted a unanimous and hearty call to the pastorate of the church at Taylor, Texas, being drawn back to Texas by the desire to be near the mother of Mrs. Bagby, who is growing aged and quite infirm. He commenced his work Sunday, March 16. Large audiences attend upon his preaching and the church in all its departments, is taking on renewed life.

Eureka College Notes

The college has recently installed a new telescope, the gift of Eureka citizens. The telescope is complete in every particular and will make a valuable addition to the astronomical work in the college.

Plans are now matured for a long step in advance in the complete standardization of Eureka College work. For the coming year, all full professors will be free from preparatory teaching. They will thus be enabled to offer advanced courses.

Professor E. E. Boyer, who is now in the University of Chicago, and Professor L. E. Cannon, now in Harvard, will be on duty again next year.

Miss Grace Cameron, who has supplied for Professor Cannon, has received some good offers. She is a teacher of unusual ability, with splendid grasp of both German and French.

A short time ago a friend of the college gave Eureka $1,000 on the annuity plan. We would be glad to receive many such gifts. With the past few months $5,000 from the estate of a friend came to the college.

In addition to these larger gifts, there is constant support to the college through the Illinois Christian Educational Association. Miss Luceba E. Miner, the Field Secretary, has visited a number of places throughout the past few months, securing many life memberships, many living link churches, many contributions through annual dues, and many offerings from churches. She has recently worked in and about Chicago with good results in increased loyalty and friendship for the college, as well as larger contributions. Wherever she goes she makes friends for the insitiution. CHARLES E. UNDERWOOD, Pres.

PORTABLE STOVE COOKING —AND— HEATING

Saves Fuel Bills, Saves Dirt, Work and Drudgery.

SIMPLE IN CONSTRUCTION, DURABLE, AND ABSOLUTELY SAFE

COMBINES ECONOMY, COMFORT and CONVENIENCE

COMBINED COOKING AND HEATING—The Portable Stove will boil, bake, fry, roast—cook anything. Ideal for quick meals, washing, ironing, hot water, hot milk, canning fruit, camping. Summer or Winter Stove. Oil automatically turned into gas furnishes a steady, intense heat passed into radiator and distributed throughout the room; or condensed under cooking vessels the heat is absorbed by articles being cooked.

Two-Burner with Oven

Heat under control. Not dangerous like gasoline. No valves. No wicks—all parts open—nothing to clog, close up or get out of order.

THE PORTABLE STOVE

is simple in construction. No complicated machinery to get out of order. The oil flows from the reservoir into the open steel burner bowl, where it is converted into a heavy gas. This gas is carried into the open-air cylinder, where it is superheated and given the required amount of air to make combustion and give the greatest amount of heat for the smallest use of oil. As will be seen, all parts are open—the burner bowl, air mixer, the cylinder or chimney. Nothing to clog or close up. The stove furnishes its own heat to generate the gas

CHEAP FUEL

Kerosene or coal oil, is recognized the world over as providing economic fuel. The difficulty has been in securing methods that would use it both economically and satisfactorily. The Portable Stove solves the problem. It furnishes the family need. It burns this common fuel, giving an intense heat, but concentrated under cooking vessel, absorbed by articles being cooked—not thrown out to overheat your kitchen. In every section of country coal and wood are getting higher in price. The continual discovery of new oil fields in different parts of the country has furnished oil in abundance. The Portable Stove is a practical method of using this fuel. It also saves work and dirt. The intense heat provides quickly cooked meals.

EASILY REGULATED

The flow of oil is easily controlled by the adjuster on the end of the reservoir. Each burner has its own reservoir and adjuster. The height of the flame is easily lowered or raised with this adjuster. More oil—higher flame. Less oil—lower flame. No oil—flame shut off.

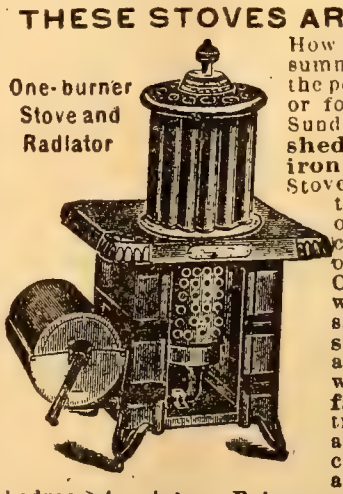
SAFETY

Coal oil or kerosene not dangerous like gasoline. There is no longer excuse for using dangerous gasoline stoves, thus causing mothers and children to run daily the chance of losing their lives. One can hardly pick up a newspaper without seeing an account due to the use of the deadly gasoline. Coal oil burned in the oil-gas stove is a safe fuel. The Portable Stove is safe for every day family use.

CONVENIENCE

Every woman will be glad to get rid of the coal or wood, dirt, ashes and all the nuisance that goes with the ordinary cook stove. The Portable Stove will save trouble, anxiety and annoyance, without any additional fuel

THESE STOVES ARE PORTABLE



One-burner Stove and Radiator

How convenient on a hot summer day to take out on the porch for a quick meal, or for coffee on a warm Sunday night, or in the shed for washing or ironing. The Portable Stove can easily be carried to a church for a social or to picnics or to camping grounds. One of our customers, Chas. Schaufler, Calif. who is a railroad man, said he used their stove on a caboose and was able to cook with the hard and fast running of the train. We cannot imagine anything more convenient for heating a cold dining room or bedroom in winter. Being portable they can easily be moved to any part of the house and are always ready for instant use. The new Model 1912 contains many valuable improvements, which add greatly to the efficiency of the stove.

DURABILITY

They are made of steel throughout, thoroughly tested before shipping. Sent complete, ready for use as soon as received. Nicely finished with nickel trimming, and they will last for years.

OVENS FOR BAKING

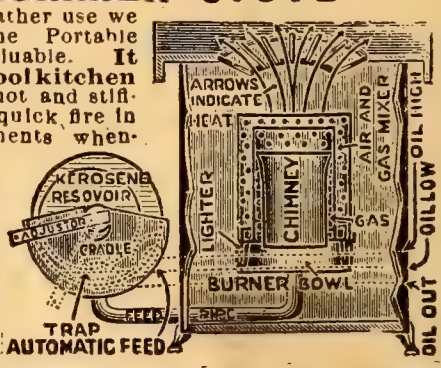
The ovens furnished with the Portable Stove are splendid bakers, handsomely finished throughout, made of sheet steel full lined with tin plate, removable shelves.

RADIATORS FOR HEAT

The radiators are placed over the burner. The heat of the stove is thrown from the surface of the radiator, giving a cheerful heat. It is convenient size and when not in use can be laid to one side.

SUMMER STOVE

For hot-weather use we consider the Portable Stove invaluable. It means a cool kitchen instead of hot and stifling; a hot, quick fire in a few moments whenever you want it. Think of the time wasted in starting the old cook stove before it gets hot enough to cook, and the overheated kitchen after it is started REMEMBER this stove consumes no fuel except when in use. Put this stove in your home—you will find it convenient and a delightful stove to use in summer and winter.



WHAT USERS SAY

"It is so convenient and economical." Rev. P. V. Hawkins, Ohio. "It is clean, convenient, no trouble, burns steadily; perfect baking." Henry Schilling, Ill. "For baking it has no equal." V. E. Bostwick, O. "Bakes pies, cakes, bread, never saw nicer baking done." Mrs. O. Thompson, O. "Never cooked meals so quick and easy." James Newark, Mich. "Baked, cooked, washed, ironed—can do anything my range does." Mrs. M. E. King, Ky. "Cooked for a family of 6 for 5 days with 3 quarts of oil; they are great time and fuel savers." H. M. Frey, Ia. "Heated a room when the temperature was 10 degrees below zero with one radiator." Wm. Baering, Ind. "With the radiator it soon warms up our dining room." J. F. Lisson, Calif. "We are using it to heat our office." McPherson Co., R. I.

ECONOMY—E. N. Helwig, Ont., "Only used a half gallon of oil last week for cooking, baking and ironing" F. G. Boylston, S. C. "Cooked for a family of six five days—only three quarts of oil." Wm. Stapley, Ariz., "Your oil-gas stove was just as expected it to be after reading your description. With one gallon of oil we did the cooking for a family nine persons, six of them grown, for three days and one meal, besides doing the small ironing. The oil cost 35c. Wood cost $6.00 per cord here." Fred Hadder, Wis., "Moved my old cook stove in the wood shed. You won't catch me sawing or carrying any more wood. This is a snap for me."

SAFETY—Mrs. E. R. McClellan, Ills., says "It is safe and clean as a lamp, and children that can be trusted with a kerosene lamp can be trusted with this stove." Mrs. P. P. Leherer, Mich. "Easy to run quick to heat—no danger of explosion. D. L. Dennis, Ind., "Makes no dirt, no trouble to operate; takes very little fuel; no danger possible; makes plenty of heat. H. N. Flora, O., "Perfectly safe, a person can operate them without constant worry of danger.

CLEANLINESS—Mrs. S. R. Croft, speaks of this when she says: "There is no smoke, dirt, or ashes to bother with. It is easy and simple to operate, very clean and safe to handle; is away ahead of coal or wood fire." E. J. Free, Me. "It don't smoke, is easy to operate, and we find it clean." Wm. Irsh, Mo. "A splendid baker and cooker, although we use the cheapest grade of oil. For good work, simplicity, economy and cleanliness, it is simply perfection itself." Mrs. J. F Hascall, Fla. "It does not leak at all; it is a great comfort. The oven is a beauty and bakes fine—not heavy to move from place to place, and convenient in size and shape. W. O. Poe, Mo. says: Can cook a meal in 20 minutes; baked biscuits in 4 minutes." Mrs. Ella Holleman, Tenn., "Takes less oil to cook a meal than is often used to kindle a fire in the old stove. Cooking was a burden because of heat. This oil stove is a pleasure."

DON'T FAIL to write today for full information. The price of these stoves is remarkably low—only $3.25 up, any number of burners. No sold in stores. See catalogue with testimonials from hundreds of patrons, sent free; also full information regarding our Portable Stove.

AGENTS MAKE MONEY Quick, Easy, Sure.

Show stove MAKING GAS—people stop, look, excited—want it—buy. B. L. Huested, Mich. "Was out one day—sold 11 stoves." W. E. Baird, S. C. "You have the best stove on the market; sold 9 in 2 hours; I do not fear competition." (first ordered 1—200 since) Chas. P. Schroeder, Conn., bought 40 stoves one order. Head & Frazer, Tex. write "Sell like hot cakes; sold 50 stoves in our town." J. W. Hunter, Ala., secured 1—tested it—ordered 100 since. J. G. R. Gauthreaux, La., ordered 1; 155 since. So they go. These men MAKE MONEY. You have the same chance. You should make from $10. to $15 a day. Write for our selling plan. Do it today. Send no money.

RELIGION IN STATE SCHOOLS

MOTHER'S FAITH

AN EDITORIAL FOR MOTHER'S DAY

NEW OPENINGS FOR CHURCH ACTIVITIES

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

CHICAGO

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointed by churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

Two Certain Rich Men

J. Pierpont Morgan wrote a considerable statement of theology into his will, and left mills to his own kin. His gifts to charity during life had not been large for a man of his wealth, his bequests for benevolence were inconsiderable. William W. Borden wrote into his will his confession of faith in God, the Bible, the Trinity, the Deity of Christ, and the atonement on the cross, and left his million to religious work. There was not very much difference in the doctrine set forth in these two remarkable wills. There was a difference in the way the creed bore fruit in sacrifice. Borden first gave himself in the personal consecration of his life to missionary work, and dying left his treasure where his heart was.

It is not the duty of every rich man to give away his wealth and go as a foreign missionary. The wealth of the world ought not to pass wholly into the hands of those who are not Christians. The world's greatest enterprises should be managed by those who have learned the method of Christ. But wealth is stewardship, and the time has come for all rich men and all men who are not rich to know that truth. The real confession of faith in Christ is a reminder that He who was rich for our sakes became poor that we through his poverty might be rich.

New Diphtheria Antidote

Prof. Emil von Behring, of Berlin, in a lecture before the medical congress at Wiesbaden, last week, described a new antidote for diphtheria. It consists of a mixture of diphtheria toxin and antitoxin, which, unlike the old Behring serum, is harmless and has a more lasting effect.

The professor said he was ready to provide private hospitals with the serum, but was anxious that accurate observations should be made as to its effects. If these experiments were as successful as the first ones it would be possible, he said, to immunize many people during an epidemic of diphtheria.

A Marburg doctor said he had inoculated a child with the serum and had then transferred the culture to another person. This was the first case known of immunization by human serum.

"The discovery of Prof. Emil von Behring will prove a wonderful success," declared Dr. W. A. Evans, health commissioner of Chicago, "It will solve one of the greatest problems with which physicians have to combat in diphtheria cases. If he has succeeded in mixing the diphtheria toxin with antitoxin it will prevent to a great extent the spread of the disease. The antitoxin simply affects the diphtheria toxin, but has no effect on diphtheria bacilli. If toxin can be administered with antitoxin the bacilli will be destroyed. It will prevent diphtheria as vaccination does smallpox."

A bill pending in Kansas legislature providing that "when two trains approach a crossing both shall stop, and neither shall go ahead until the other has passed by," could hardly be called progressive legislation.—Wall Street Journal.

A Book Review

FRANCES WILLARD: HER LIFE AND WORK, by Ray Strachey. Here is a new life of perhaps the greatest American woman in the nineteenth century by an English woman, Miss Ray Strachey, who in her preface declares: "I started to write this book as an outsider, and a critic, as one who should judge of her life unblinded by loyalty or affection. But I have not succeeded. I am not an outsider any longer, but a follower and a friend." There have been many attempts to sketch Frances E. Willard. She herself attempted an autobiography. But the sketches heretofore have been more or less partial and partisan, and Miss Willard's own autobiography was confessedly in the interests of the great temperance movement with which her illustrious name will forever be associated. After the deluge of Willard bibliography a few years ago, one picks up this English woman's judgment of the American woman with something like a rare interest.

Miss Strachey, the granddaughter of the author of that devotional classic, "A Christian's Secret of a Happy Life," shows very clearly that she had immediate access to Miss Willard's letters, journals and private papers. She shows also that her famous grandmother's influence and advice were not disregarded. But best of all, Miss Strachey shows a sturdy and consistent independence that stamps itself particularly in her selection of material. She evidently attempted to portray the real Frances E. Willard, not as her friends saw her nor as her enemies imagined her, but as she really was in all the weaknesses and strengths of her phenomenal personality and career. Miss Strachey succeeded admirably. Her portrait is not an impressionistic one, but a critical one. With charming simplicity and grateful condensation, she has drawn a life-like portrait against a real background of the sturdy days in which Miss Willard lived, moved and had her being. Her work is notable for its viewpoint, its spirit and its literary method. It is an adequate appreciation of a notable woman.

Lady Henry Somerset contributes the introduction to the book under the heading "An Impression." It is a beautiful tribute from a loving friend and co-worker. The element of hero-worship is apparent. It is difficult to imagine anything more gracious, more tender, more sympathetic, even more extravagant. Unwittingly, Lady Henry Somerset's introduction clearly shows the difference of an appreciation of Miss Willard by an "outsider" like Miss Strachey, and an "insider" like herself. For this very reason, Miss Strachey's portrait of Miss Willard will be accepted all the more unquestionably by the critics.

But to read Miss Strachey's book will do more than give the reader an accurate and critical idea of Miss Willard. No one can read it, without adding faith to faith, love to love and hope to hope. It makes the reader braver and better. No good life is ever lost. Its goodness passes on to enrich other lives. Miss Strachey has passed on a beautiful life, and we, who have read, are grateful.

The Faith of Our Mothers

The division of the human race into two sexes is the most interesting and significant fact in the social life of the world. It is a permanent fact. It implies the division of labor, and involves mutual recognition and honor. No man is a true man who does not hold woman in high esteem; no woman can be a true woman who does not reverence manhood. On this mutual affection and reverence of man for woman and woman for man is founded the home; but that foundation attains a greater stability in the fact of parenthood and the common love of father and mother for childhood.

That fathers and mothers should love their children and bequeath to them opportunities and incentives for usefulness is the most important element in human progress. No one generation lives long. Whether any one man is happy or miserable, good or bad, is a question not indeed unimportant but of vastly less importance than the question whether he gives to the next generation a fair start in life.

It makes a great difference what kind of fathers the human race has had, has, and is to have. One crying need of the present, as of all generations, is that there should be real fatherhood in the world, that more men should realize their duties as fathers and give to their children that element of virile, stable character which never can be quite complete in households where the double responsibility of training falls upon the mother.

Nevertheless it is true today, and is likely to be true in the future, that the major share of responsibility for the training of the young rests upon the mother. The burden of the two halves of the human race finds its balance in this adjustment. Whatever a woman is able to contribute to the world as a wage-earner, as an educator, as a writer of prose or verse, or as a member of any art or craft, her greatest possible gift to the world is that of motherhood. No greater gift can possibly be made to the world than that of perpetuating righteousness through a personal contribution to the life of the coming generations.

In a very real sense it is true that no nation has any larger duty than that of providing good mothers for the future. Whatever affects the health, the virtue, the moral influence of womanhood has its immediate effect on manhood and its permanent influence on childhood.

It is rather surprising that we should know as much as we do about the childhood of the Bible characters. So many of them come upon the stage in full maturity we should hardly expect that the narrative would go back and that we should know in as many cases as we do of the influence of mothers upon their children. But Timothy and Samuel are only types of a considerable group of men whose character and greatness we are able to trace in no small measure to their faithful mothers. Throughout the history of the Christian church it has been so. Augustine, greatest of the church fathers, became the man he was through the prayers of Monica, his faithful mother, redeeming him from a wayward youth. Constantine who turned the Roman Empire from heathenism to Christianity saw in the skies the vision of the cross, but another vision was his also, the vision of fidelity and Christian earnestness bequeathed to him by his mother, Helena. Washington and Lincoln and Garfield paid glad tribute to the influence of their mothers in making them the men they afterward became. The Roman mother, Cornelia, could say of her sons, "These are my jewels," and train them into the great tribunes whom we know as the Gracchi. Much more may a Christian mother rejoice in her motherhood as affording the opportunity for an influence second to none in advancing the progress of the world.

Henry Drummond pointed out that the progress of life upward seemed to have had as its goal the creation of a race of mothers. He taught that the world had risen from small and pitiful and repulsive things in proportion as motherhood in its higher meaning had come into the life of the world. The larger meanings of motherhood are still to be disclosed. The problem of the future in no small part is the problem of an adequate motherhood for the race.

Most men who have any worthy ideals in life, or who are reclaimed from unworthy ideals, cherish in their hearts some holy vision of a mother's faith.

Mothers' Day is a new festival among us. For a few years only have we worn the carnation on a day in May in especial honor of motherhood. The day deserves a high place in the calendar of the saints. It deserves to be held in high honor for Mother's sake.

"Blessed art thou among women," said the angel to one mother. The angels are whispering that same word everywhere in the ears of beautiful motherhood.

Value and Duty of Early Training

Dr. Blimber asked six-year-old Paul "if he would like to have them make a man of him." Paul replied, "I had rather be a child." It is the right of a child to be a child. The Blimber method of training denied this right. "A child!" exclaims another of the characters of Dickens, "When was I a child? What childhood did you ever leave to me? I was a woman—artful, designing, mercenary, laying snares for men—before I knew myself or you, or even understood the base and wretched aim of every new display I learned."

The imagination is one of childhood's most precious possessions The child is greatly wronged whose instruction is wholly of the matter of fact kind. A writer on education says: "The liveliest conscious activity in childhood is fancy; the little creator creates his own world, and lives, and moves, and has his being in it. Myths, parables, fairy tales, have made children and childish people happy throughout the ages. Myths and fairy tales are the sure signs of the upturning of the hearts of little ones to God. The proper function of fancy in intellectual life is spirituality. Spiritual truths are hidden in the precious honey of stories."

The cramming process is still destroying the hopes of youth. Its evils are described by Dickens in words that ought to be read repeatedly by all who have anything to do with the teaching of children. "Dr. Blimber's establishment was a great hothouse, in which there was a forcing apparatus incessantly at work. All the boys blew before their time. Mental green peas were produced at Christmas, and intellectual asparagus all the year round. Mathematical gooseberries (very sour ones, too) were common at untimely seasons, and from mere sprouts of bushes, under Dr. Blimber's cultivation. Every description of Greek and Latin vegetable was got off the driest twigs of boys, under the frostiest circumstances. Nature was of no consequence at all. No matter what a young gentleman was intended to bear, Dr. Blimber made him bear to pattern, somehow or other. This was all very pleasant and ingenious, but the system of forcing was attended with its usual slight disadvantages. There was not the right taste about the premature productions, and they didn't keep well. Moreover, one young gentleman, with a swollen nose and an excessively long head (the oldest of ten who had "gone through" everything) suddenly left off blowing one day, and remained in the establishment a mere stalk. And people did say that the doctor had rather overdone it with young Toots, and that when he began to have whiskers he left off having brains."

That children should learn to love God and man is the wish of the pious parent. This wish may express itself in formal instruction. But love is not communicated by definition. The place for the child to learn what love is is the home. It learns love not only by being served, but by being taught to serve. The mother in one of Kipling's stories is so foolishly fond of her son that she never opposes his slightest whim. As a consequence, the boy is about as worthless and disagreeable as he can be. By a fortunate accident he is swept off an Atlantic liner, picked up by a fishing boat, and kept among the fishermen until the boat returns to land with its load of fish. The captain did not believe the boy's story that his father was very rich; he told the boy what he would give for his work and he made him earn his money. The boy found out the meaning of life and was started on the road to success. You cannot teach children how to love unless you teach them how to do something useful.

The formal instruction of the church must be supported by its practical work. The minister whom the children love because of his interest in them and because he understands them has the first qualification of a church leader. The Sunday-school teacher thinks of the children before she thinks of the lesson. The lesson is selected for the sake of the children. Life, not logic, is first. If church leaders talk of justice and mercy on Sunday and deny by their conduct on other days that they believe God is just and merciful, children soon discover the inconsistency, and they are influenced by the practice more than by the preaching. Idle gossip, carping criticism, and exhibitions of uncontrolled temper need attention before we come to the question of formal teaching. The latter is necessary but too much is expected of it. The school and the church are blamed for results due to parental and community folly and sin. (Midweek Service, May 14. 2 Tim. 3:14-15; Prov. 22:6.) S. J.

The Heroic in Men

Mr. Sherman C. Kingsley, who is one of Chicago's most effective social workers, spent two weeks in the flood afflicted districts of Ohio. On his return home he told his Bible class how the flood and its dangers gave opportunity for the heroic in men to manifest itself. He said:

"The reason more people were not killed, the reason that the ten thousand estimate was not finally realized, was, I believe, due to unusual deeds of heroism, and everybody performed such deeds. I want to tell you of one instance or two. There was a fellow known as 'Sailor Jack.' He had been a cowboy and worked about ships. When this flood came up he broke his way through the roof of a house. There were four girls marooned across the street. The streets were raging torrents; and it is astonishing to see the street in front of your house, where your children have played, a perfectly innocent, unsuspecting sort of a street, become the worst torrent that you ever saw, worse than the pioneers had to deal with, and have the top of your porch used as a landing dock, and see bodies of people and horses and debris sailing down the stream in a turbulent mass.

"This fellow got up on the top of the house. He had a rope and he lassoed the chimney on the house across the street; then by means of the rope he went across the street and got the girls out, and then went about saving more people. The reason why the tramp became a hero on this occasion is easy to understand. It was easy sailing for him to ride the roofs of houses. It was easy compared with riding on the trucks of railroad cars. There were numerous instances where such men as that got busy and saved anywhere from five to ten, twenty or thirty people. That was repeated all along the line."

The Side of the Road

There was a man who came into Jerusalem one day, arriving some hours later than he intended, and perhaps suffering somewhat in the day's marketing for the time he had lost. He was not a popular man in Jerusalem, anyway, being a Samaritan, and no one showed him any favor over the counter for the good deed he had done. Business was business, then as it is now; supply and demand, profit and loss, these reckoned little with the benevolent causes of his delay. He was a dollar poorer to the end of his life, to say nothing of a hotel bill for which he had made himself responsible at the inn toward Jericho. And he had not been hunting for trouble. He merely saw a man by the roadside, wounded and naked and in need of his help. And to his everlasting glory he helped him. It was a few yards out of his way toward Jerusalem to where the poor fellow lay; but it was in the straight road to heaven. Jesus said that man, though not very orthodox, had discovered the real meaning of half the moral law, and that he who would obey that law of God and inherit eternal life, should go and do likewise. That man, with no great pretense of piety, took his duty to his neighbor as part of the day's work. It was all the better for that. If anyone commended him, he merely replied that he had not given the matter much thought; the poor fellow lay, not a mile away, but by the side of the road right where he could not choose but see him, and he helped him as a matter of course. Thank God for the religion that comes as a matter of course. It not only travels the road of life with a good reliable tread, and lends its horse on occasion to the man who is down, but it has proprietary rights in the inn, and established credit beside.

The Inn of the Good Samaritan is maintained by the patronage of those whose business takes them over the Jericho road; and those who help their fellow men. The innkeeper, who is not keeping an inn for the mere pleasure of it, has not chosen that location without some thought of the responsibilities of the situation. He, too, in his way, is a philanthropist, a self-supporting helper of those who travel toward Jerusalem.

In the beginning of the Sixth Book of Homer, a character is described of whom it is said, "He was a friend to man; and he lived in a house by the side of the road." Now, that is a fine and ample biography!

"Axylus, hospitable, rich and good:
In fair Arisbe's walls (his native place)
He held his seat, a friend to human race.
Fast by the road, his ever open door
Obliged the wealthy and relieved the poor."

But Sam Walter Foss translated the deeper thought of it thus:

"Let me live in a house by the side of the road,
Where the race of men go by—
The men who are good and the men who are bad,
As good and as bad as I.
I would not sit in the scorner's seat,
Or hurl the cynic's ban—
Let me live in a house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

Our Readers' Opinions

IBSEN'S ETHICS CHRISTIAN, NOT PAGAN.

Editors The Christian Century: I have read with great interest your excerpt from the paper of Charles A. Elwood that was read at the Disciples' Congress. It is a stimulating paper full of timely observations that ought to set us all thinking. And I for my part want to thank the author for what he has done. Yet I cannot help thinking that he has done one man to whom he refers a great injustice. I refer to the case of Henrik Ibsen. Here is what the author says of him: "There is growing up a literature in western civilization today which is totally regardless of Christianity, which either derides or ignores it. I do not mean Christianity as a theology; I mean Christianity as a system of ethics. The plays of Ibsen . . . might be mentioned," etc.

I cannot believe that this judgment on the part of Dr. Elwood with his keen appreciation of facts can rest on first hand knowledge of Ibsen's plays as a whole. I do not wish to take the space to discuss the subject except to say that before you make up your mind to label Ibsen as a non-Christian writer read for yourself "Brand" and "The Emperor Julian." His chief plea in both of these works is for an appreciation of the ethics of the cross, the way of self-sacrifice, as opposed to the popular substitutionary theories of the death of Christ. It is a well-known fact that Ibsen's inspiration to writing came mainly from one of the most original religious geniuses of the last century, Mr. Kirkegaard, an evangelist, and a profound thinker on the subject of Christian ethics. It is unfortunate that the average American reader approaches Ibsen from his later prose dramas without a knowledge of the poetical and lyrical works of his earlier period. I know of no greater moral tonic than the systematic reading of Ibsen. And to class him with the un-Christian writers of the last century is not only a great injustice to one of the most stalwart defenders of what is noblest and best in the ethics of Christianity, but the result of such a label will doubtless be to proscribe his works from an age that to my mind needs him sorely.

DISCIPLES AND EPISCOPALIANS.

Editors The Christian Century: Your editorial in the Century of April 24 on the recent meeting of our Unity Commission with the Episcopalians in New York comes as a great surprise to me, and I am sure the other members of the Commission must feel as I do about it. It proceeds upon a wholly erroneous conception of the nature of our conference and the significance of the resolutions passed. You seem to have gotten your data from The Churchman. I have not seen the report referred to in that paper, but judging from some phrases used in the Century report you have been misled as to the facts. These "Australian Resolutions" were taken up and discussed for the light they throw on the general problem of Christian unity. When the report says they "were passed unanimously, etc.," it simply means that the motion to consider them was passed. The resolution which the members of our Commission signed speaks for itself and shows how careful they were not to commit themselves to the "Australian Resolutions" as a basis for union between the Disciples and the Episcopalians. Here it is:

"Resolved: That without committing themselves individually to all the resolutions, yet rejoicing in and welcoming such a definite effort to bring about reunion between these portions of the Church of Christ, they express their sympathy with the general purpose of this movement, and the hope that a similar effort may receive the careful consideration of the different communions of this country."

The Commission expresses its sympathy with the general movement in Australia and the hope that similar efforts may be attempted in this country. Could it do less than that? Not for a moment did our men think of the "Australian Resolutions" as a basis for union between the Disciples and Episcopalians. We are not far enough along yet for the consideration of any definite basis of union. We are getting acquainted with one another. We are trying to find, each what the other believes and just what his point of view is. We have committed nobody to anything as yet. We are hoping when we come to know each other there may be some avenue of approach disclosed. Your assumption that we were a lot of "innocents" in the hands of the wily Episcopalians, that we were blindly led as sheep to the slaughter, and complacently sat there and allowed our jugular veins to be cut without protest, betrays an obtuseness on the whole situation that is unpardonable.

In our discussions so far the Episcopalians have manifested a most commendable spirit. They have been much more ready and willing to make concessions in the interests of unity than the Disciples. As Bishop Vincent said in our Louisville Convention, "The Episcopalians are going into this union movement believing they are led by the Spirit of God, and they are not asking where they will be when they come out." Here is a splendid abandon to the union spirit that challenges our admiration and deserves our confidence.

If such conservative and cautious approaches as our Commission on Unity has already made are to be met with such broadsides of misinterpretation and criticism as your recent editorial, we had better as a people go out of the union business and take up some more hopeful task. Sincerely yours,

Central Church, New York City. James M. Philputt.

[The report of the conference printed in The Christian Century was received from the hand of the secretary of the Disciples' Commission, and our criticism was based upon this report, not upon the Churchman's statement. There are some variations between the two reports, the Episcopalian version including, for instance, a resolution concerning the administration of the Lord's Supper as limited to the ordained clergy. To this and other variations we made no allusion.

If Dr. Philputt will read again the authentic Disciples' version he will see that the resolutions "were passed unanimously as a basis of procedure." In the second resolution the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed are set down "as an adequate basis for any further formulated statement of Christian truth that may be needed" in the united church. The Christian Century did not represent the conference as adopting a "basis for union," but we did represent it, in the words of its own report, as adopting the resolutions as a "basis of procedure" toward union.

And our fundamental and earnest contention is that these resolutions do not "proceed" toward union; they "proceed" backward to a type of theological issues which the Disciples long ago abandoned and in which few of us could work up much, if any, interest today.

Apart from the question of "orders" which bulks so large in the resolutions, the Disciples will not admit for a moment that the Nicene Creed is an adequate basis, or any kind of a basis, for a statement of the creed of the united church. The faith of the united church will be cast in entirely different form from either the Apostles' Creed or the Nicene Creed. and to hark back to those venerable formularies of the ancient church is to confuse the issue which Disciples, among other factors, have been able in a century of teaching to get the modern church at last to see.

To assume, as the Commission seems to have done, that the reservation expressed in the clause, "without committing themselves individually to all the resolutions," protects the resolutions against candid criticism by their Disciple brethren is entirely to miss the point of our criticism. Our objecton is to the resolutions as a whole, as well as to particular statements in them. They do not illuminate the pathway along which Christian unity is coming.

We shall have to take Dr. Philputt's word for the willingness of the Episcopal commission to concede more than the Disciples. A search of these eighteen resolutions reveals not the slightest hint of this spirit of concession which Dr. Philputt commends. If Dr. Philputt or any other member of the Commission can point out a single Episcopalian concession in the series of resolutions he will do much to change The Christian Century's sentiments toward the whole affair. But, as we pointed out, the Disciples conceded much, and did not get so much as the tacitly promised complimentary reference to their baptism doctrine in return!

We do not like Dr. Philputt's picture of our Commission as a "lot of 'innocents'" having their jugular veins cut, and we certainly intended in our article no suggestion upon which such a picture could be hung; but we much prefer it to the conclusion Dr. Philputt's vigorous protest compels us to draw, namely, that he and the other members of the Disciples Commission do, honestly and seriously, regard these resolutions as having the significance they are alleged by the conference to possess. In short, we would much prefer to believe that under the courtesies of the situation our greatly esteemed brethren had become somewhat blurred in their thought processes than to believe that they had actually abandoned the position of the Disciples of Christ.—The Editors.]

The Drexel-Biddle Bible Classes

The name of Anthony (Tony) J. Drexel-Biddle is a familiar one to two classes of newspaper readers. That class of readers devoted to the society column is familiar with it, by reason of the fact that Tony is the aristocratic scion of one of the bluest-blooded families of Philadelphia. For years he was the Beau Brummel of Philadelphia. His name was invariably "among those present" on every imaginable social occasion and function. And then, strange to say, there is not a red-blooded sport in the United States that does not know that Tony Drexel-Biddle is the best amateur boxer in the United States. Tony would consider it boy's play to put on the gloves with a man like Jim Corbett or Bob Fitzsimmons. He is six feet tall, a wonderful athlete, and up to three years ago was considered on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean "a dead game sport."

It happens that Tony belonged with his people to the parish of Holy Trinity Church (Protestant Episcopal) in Philadelphia, where the broad-minded Doctor Floyd W. Tomkins leads as rector. One day three years ago, Tony went up to Dr. Tomkins and frankly admitted that he was wearied and bored with society life and that the life of a sport nauseated him. It almost floored the good rector! Tony asked Dr. Tomkins for something to do to make life worth living. The minister gave the erstwhile sport a class of three young men in the Sunday-school, "one of the three being an absentee." Tony put energy into the work, the same sort that he puts into his monthly private boxing bouts. Dr. Tomkins inspired him with evangelistic zeal. In a very few weeks, Tony's class grew from two to forty. He became enthusiastic. At last he had found something worth while to do. He conceived the idea of organizing young men's classes all over Philadelphia to be run on the same basis. The idea grew like wild fire. The Drexel-Biddle Bible Classes may now be found all over the United States. The constitution is very simple. Any Bible class in any denomination can become a member simply by registering at headquarters. Social and athletic features are prominent. The common brotherhood and sisterhood of all Christians is emphasized. There are now actually 300 Drexel-Biddle classes and 12,000 members, including affiliations in Scotland and Australia. Recently the second annual anniversary services filled Trinity Church, Boston, where Phillips Brooks preached so famously for many years. Three bishops and clergy of all denominations participated. Tony has gone about from one exclusive society gathering to another and has explained his enthusiasm for the modern Bible class movement and its great remedial value for the ennui of certain society folk. Tony Drexel-Biddle certainly has "made a hit."

A 1600th Anniversary in Roman Catholicism

The present year, 1913, has been set apart by Pope Pius X, as the anniversary of the alleged Christianization of the Roman Empire. By the Edict of Milan, 313 A. D., Constantine proclaimed religious liberty. It is also supposed that Constantine was converted in the same year by his famous "In hoc signo vinces" vision, but like many other Roman Catholic historical statements this is a pure supposition, supported by a few unreliable church historians. The greater probability is that Constantine himself did not become a Christian prior to 323 A. D., two years before the Council of Nicea he himself invoked. The present pope's setting apart this year as the 1600th anniversary of a supposed event evidently is capricious and arbitrary, and apparently for two purposes: first, to prick the Italian conscience over his alleged civil wrongs; second, to convey the impression of antiquity of the present Roman Catholic Church. That the present Roman Catholic system was non-existent in the days of Constantine is evidenced by the fact that Constantine, as emperor, assembled the Council of Nicea in 325, and presided over its deliberations, and not the "pope" named in the papal list of popes as St. Sylvester I.

Nervy Evangelist Fights Fire With Fire

Doctor Henry W. Stough of Wheaton, Ill., is not only an eminent Presbyterian evangelist at the head of his own party of helpers, but a nervy and a resourceful one, as the liquor interests have discovered in Elmira, N. Y., a town of 40,000 inhabitants. Dr. Stough pitched into the liquor question of Elmira. It happens that a woman, Mrs. Harriet Rathbone, not only owns a big local brewery there but actually owned fifty-eight of the 150 licenses, when the law allows a limit of only fifty-two. Dr. Stough denounced the traffic, and immediately John J. Hassett, business superintendent for Mrs. Rathbone, as it later developed, hatched a conspiracy to ruin the reputation of the party, after libel suits had failed to silence Dr. Stough. The conspiracy was no less than an attempt to besmirch the reputation of the evangelist's leader of song, Professor D. L. Spooner, and the evangelist's pianist, Miss Hester Cartwright, who travels with her father in the Stough company. Warrants were sworn out. The singer and the pianist were arrested by the police, when the two chanced to be alone together in their practice room for five minutes. It was calculated that the evangelistic party would hurriedly leave Elmira, in total disgrace. Here was fire sure enough, but the nervy evangelist decided to meet the fire with fire. The arrest was made on the last day of the meeting as planned, but Dr. Stough announced he would continue his meetings until his two associates were tried and vindicated. The trial came on. Intense excitement prevailed. The prosecution of course fell down, and the case dramatically ended by a Burns detective arresting a liquor spy with $500 in his pocket which he had just offered to a juror for standing out against acquittal. While in jail, it was proved, Miss Cartwright was besought to sign an alleged "confession." Instead, she prayed for vindication, with magnificent courage. In two minutes, the jury returned a verdict of acquittal. The church people were now solidified. An organization was effected, and now both the chief of police and the brewery manager are scheduled for criminal trials. In the meantime, liquor laws are being enforced as never before.

Three British Visitors

Prof. James Stalker of Aberdeen, Scotland, has accepted an invitation to deliver a course of lectures on religious psychology at the Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, Va., in April of next year.

For the important Haskell lectures this year, Oberlin Seminary has invited Rev. Hastings Rashdall, canon of Hereford, Fellow of New College and lecturer in Oxford. He is one of the best-known writers in Great Britain, has been honored by a Litt. D. from Oxford and is a preacher to the university. The lectures, which deal with Oriental literature in its relation to the Bible and Christianity, will be given April 10-17.

The Rt. Rev. the Lord Bishop of Aberdeen is expected to arrive in America soon to visit his brother, the Rev. John Forbes Mitchell, deacon in charge of St. Paul's Church, Warsaw, Ill. The Bishop will be present at the General Convention in October. He will also be the Hale lecturer for 1913 in the Western Theological Seminary, Chicago. The Bishop was in South Africa during the Boer War, and has traveled extensively in India and the Orient. This will be his first visit to America. He has not had the pleasure of meeting his brother since 1905.

Is the Catholic Church Catholic?

The following interesting paragraph is from Thayer's "Cavour and his Times."

"The Church which assumed to be Catholic was, first of all, Roman. Since the Dutchman, Adrian VI, died in 1523, every pope has been Italian; and although by actual census, the nominal Catholics in Italy have never numbered more than one-fourth to one-sixth of the Catholics throughout the world, yet the majority of Cardinals have always been Italians, and the chief offices at Rome have been filled by Italians. This small, compact, adroit body has been able, generation after generation, to persuade the faithful in all lands to contribute to its aggrandizement and wealth. For centuries, pope after pope amassed a great fortune to be bequeathed to his bastards or his kinsmen. Rome is dotted with palaces, each of which is a monument to the successful rapacity of some pontiff. Many of the collections of paintings and of sculpture were bought with the mites of widows and the oblations of devotees who had little idea that their pious offerings would be spent on pagan art or on pontifical luxury."

Voltaire said of the Holy Roman Empire that it was neither holy nor Roman nor an empire. Is the Catholic church really Catholic, or is it Italian?

Will the Episcopal Church Split?

Thomas Nelson Page stands as high in the Protestant Episcopal Church as in the world of belles lettres. He is probably the most distinguished layman in that church, now that J. Pierpont Morgan has passed away. For years his has been a familiar face on the floor of the General Convention, and next fall his will be a powerful voice in the deliberations of that body in New York City. Anything from his pen, literary or religious, commands immediate attention not only inside, but outside, his church. In The Churchman (New York City) of April 19, Mr. Page has contributed more than two solid pages of reading matter "On Changing the Name of the Protestant Episcopal Church." While, of course, one familiar with the various types and schools of that church, can clearly see the old-fashioned, Virginia churchmanship of the "low" and evangelical construction, yet Mr. Page fairly rises above the prejudices of his own partisanship, and takes a broad, statesmanlike view of what is undoubtedly the most alarming crisis ever confronted by the Protestant Episcopal Church. We cull some choice paragraphs from that article published at a psychological moment:

"Here we may direct attention to the fact that of those who clamor for a change of name, their objection is not to the term Episcopal, but to the term Protestant—all of them. Whenever we trace their objection to its source, we find them gnawing at the root of Protestantism. Yes, as has been said of late, "The issue depends upon the word Protestant." On that issue we stand. All this tinkering with the name of the Church is an assault upon Protestantism. I simply want to say that I am a Protestant, and I propose, please God, to remain Protestant. The people of this Church are Protestants and we say to the clergy solemnly that though they may vote a change of name, they cannot take the people with them. They will simply split the church. . . .

"I am, I think, a fair representative of the Protestant Episcopal layman, and I, for one, shall not be led out of the Protestant Episcopal church. It is endeared to me by too many sacred associations. But if I leave, I shall not stop on the way. I know where the path leads, and I prefer an openly-declared leader to others who are eager to fall in at the rear but are afraid to acclaim the flag. Gentlemen who would change our name should be warned that they cannot take the laity of the Protestant Episcopal church with them as a whole. A portion, of course, will go—perhaps a considerable portion—but they will inevitably find that a considerable portion also hold the plain declaration of Protestation in such reverend regard that they will only have split the church and burdened themselves with a perpetual contention. No divisions are so disastrous as divisions in the Church, and this division will be their work. I confess that when churchmen in our church engage in work which is obviously undermining that which they were sworn to protect, I grow out of patience. At the end of every one of these uncandid attempts certain of the disappointed leaders perform a little pilgrimage to Rome, and that is where they ought to be."

International Co-operation in Religion.

The Baptists of Japan are appealing to their brethren in America for funds with which to rebuild at once the tabernacle burned the other day at Tokyo, when 3,300 buildings were destroyed and 15,000 persons made homeless. They want to make it an institutional church, with modern conveniences and improvements, as it has a strategic location in the business section and student quarter of the city. The rebuilding of the structure will be regarded as a commemoration of the sixtieth anniversary of the opening of Japan to civilization by Commodore Perry. The sum of 50,000 yen ($25,000) is needed.

Bishop Blyth Retires.

After twenty-five years of missionary labor in the holy city of Jerusalem, Bishop Blyth will retire from his remarkable labors at the age of eighty. His retirement takes place next September, and in connection with it the Bishop of London has issued an appeal for a testimonial commensurate with the magnitude of Bishop Blyth's wonderful work among the Jews of Jerusalem. This testimonial proposed is a fund of about $17,500 from the entire Anglican world, with which fund two schools, one for boys and one for girls, will be erected as a part of the famous Collegiate Church, the center of Bishop Blyth's labors. For twenty-five years, Bishop Blyth has been among the most noted missionaries to the 55,000 Jews of Jerusalem. He became the fourth Anglican Bishop of Jerusalem in 1887, some forty-six years after that bishopric was founded.

New Methodist Brotherhood Secretary.

Dr. William Sherman Bovard, a native of Indiana, recently vice-president of the Methodist College at Chattanooga, is the new president of the Methodist Brotherhood, in succession to the late Dr. Fayette L. Thompson, who died about a year ago. Dr. Bovard's pastoral experience was gained in both Maine and California. He is one of six brothers, all ministers in the Methodist Church. Two of these brothers are presidents of Methodist colleges in Southern California and Montana, and a third is editor of the California Christian Advocate, published in San Francisco.

New Hotel for Salvation Army.

The Salvation Army has purchased the building on the Bowery, New York City, midway between Chatham and Cooper Squares. This will be used as a cheap but wholesome hotel for working men —one of a net work of such agencies in all the large cities of America. This building has been secured as a part of the scheme to honor the memory of Gen. William Booth, founder of the organization, and will be called The Salvation Army Memorial Hotel. Its height is ten stories and the total floor space is 18,720 square feet. The number of rooms, which are separate from one another, is 634. One-half of these have outside windows. There will be elevator service, electric lighting, two separate stairways and two fire escapes. The institution was formally opened on April 7.

McAll Mission in France Celebrates.

The famous Protestant McAll Mission in Paris, France, in which many Americans are interested, is twenty-five years old. On April 16 this notable anniversary was observed at a luncheon in the Fort Pitt hotel, Pittsburgh, Pa. No less than 375 persons representing twenty-eight of the leading churches, were present. Addresses were made by Dr. W. L. McEwan, pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, Bishop Whitehead of the Protestant Episcopal Church and George T. Berry, general secretary of the McAll Mission in this country. Plans were made for a new $30,000 building in Paris, and announcement was made that $25,000 was already subscribed. The Pittsburgh churches alone give about $1,000 a year towards this famous work of the Presbyterians.

Methodist Episcopal Plan Criticised.

The Christian Intelligencer reports not a little dissatisfaction among the Methodist Episcopal church friends in the use of the plan of episcopal supervision which was authorized by the General Conference of 1912. It adopted what is called the provincial system, that is, located bishops in central cities and placed under their supervision the work of the respective dioceses for four years. The arrangement is found fault with because, for one thing, it appears to conflict with the idea and practice hitherto of the "general superintendency," and there is also said to be some restiveness among pastors because of administrative practices. It is predicted that the new plan of locating the bishops, as described, will be changed at the next General Conference.

Christian Union Made Easy.

The Universalist Leader has a very simple remedy for the present state of affairs in Protestantism, so simple that it is a wonder no one ever thought of it before. All that every denomination would have to do to become united with each other is just strike out the word "denomination" from its vocabulary, and substitute the word "department." In that way, there would be only one church or denomination, with many departments. There would be but one Church of Christ, with such departments as a Baptist Department, an Episcopal Department, a Presbyterian Department, a Methodist Department, and a Disciples' Department. Annihilate the word "denomination," and, presto! there would be no denomination, merely departments. How easy! Suppose our Universalist brethren try it on themselves for five years, and at the end of that period tell us all about it.

Billy Sunday's First Big City.

Evangelist Billy Sunday will start an eight weeks' evangelistic campaign the last Sunday of next December in Pittsburgh. This will be his first effort in a metropolis. He will stay in Pittsburgh longer by two weeks than he has ever stayed elsewhere. Details for the Sunday campaign are not yet complete. There is rivalry among the various sections of the city as to where the Sunday tabernacle will be located. But Mr. Sunday's wishes in the matter will have much weight in reaching a decision.

New York Baptists to Have Headquarters.

The Baptists of New York City have accepted a bargain that will forever end the vagrancy of its denominational offices. Dr. Haywood's Collegiate church has offered its valuable property to be disposed of for the erection of a $750,000 building; the remaining sum above that so provided, to be secured by the Baptists of New York City. The Baptist brethren, with a sharp eye for business, snapped up the offer, and it is now confidently expected that commodious and accessible rooms for denominational accommodation, as well as a fit auditorium for the church, will soon be provided. New York City will now have something like Tremont Temple or the Ford Building of Boston.

Rev. Henry C. Mabie, D. D., formerly secretary of the Baptist Foreign Mission Society, has ended his world tour in Germany, where he is being featured in many religious circles.

Doctor Francis L. Patton, president of Princeton Theological Seminary and former President of Princeton University, will retire from active work the end of the present scholastic year. He is more than seventy years of age. He served as president of Princeton University from 1888 to 1902, when he was succeeded by Woodrow Wilson, the first layman ever to become its president.

A. C. Tapley, railroad agent at Haverhill, Mass., is a deeply religious man who has solved the problem of what to do with his Sundays, when of course he cannot go to church. He solves it by holding evangelistic services every Sunday afternoon on the platform of his station. He gets preachers to preach the gospel. If a preacher should happen to discuss some theological or critical or sociological problem, Brother Tapley rises up in meeting and tells the unfortunate preacher to come back to the subject!

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Tientsin

It was our hope that we should be able to visit Port Arthur on the way from Korea to China. The interest of the place of the great siege is sufficient to draw in that direction all who can spare the time to make the visit. But from there one must either make the journey to Tientsin by ship across the Gulf of Chih-li, or take the long rail trip north again to reach the North China Railroad. We learned that the journey by water was uncertain, owing to the floating ice, and as we did not wish to double the railway trip, we reluctantly abandoned our plan. Our Japanese guide assured us that nothing could prevent his visiting the place where for eighteen months he had served in the trenches, waiting for the capitulation.

We had to stay at Shan-hai-kwan over night. The ordinary trains do not run through from Mukden to Tientsin, but stop for the night at this place on the Chinese line. There is nothing of particular interest there. In fact all you can do to make the enforced stop of any significance is to walk or drive out three miles to the place where the great Chinese Wall once came down from the mountains to the sea. Here those ancient monarchs of the land, almost as far back as the beginnings of our Christian era, began to build this gigantic structure which is worthy to be numbered among the wonders of the ancient world.

Stupendous Piece of Engineering.

That portion of the wall which came to the coast at Shan-hai-kwan has been destroyed. But back a mile or two from the shore it can be traced, and up the mountain side it climbs with irregular but majestic lines till its towers, which recur at short distances, stand out against the sky in imposing strength. It seems almost inconceivable that a structure like this, thirty to sixty feet high, twenty to thirty feet broad at the top, and widening out at the base to give greater strength, should take its way over mountain, ravine and plain, completely around the northern border of ancient China for a distance of more than twenty-five hundred miles. In comparison with this stupendous piece of engineering, this colossal structural task, the building of the pyramids of Egypt or the palaces of Babylon seems child's play. The only constructive enterprise approaching it in magnitude was the building of the roadways of the Roman empire, the remains of which may still be found from Scotland to India.

The hotel at Shan-hai-kwan is called the Railway Hotel. I am slow to believe that the railroad company, which is of course the governmental department of railways, is chargeable with its management. The proprietor has the air of an ex-saloon keeper, who has abandoned one method of preying upon the public for another. The house is not bad, the rooms are comfortable, and the table fair. But the business ethics of that house would give points to the highbinders of Peking or the gambling trust of Chicago. To a tariff beyond all justice, the genial rascal adds a list of extras of which the charge of half a dollar for each dish of coal of the capacity of a hat is one of the more modest. And if you come with Korean or Japanese money, as you are almost certain to do, there is a vicious squeeze on the exchange.

Vicious Brigandage of Hostelry.

When you protest in the name of justice and humanity, he tells you with the tone of a saint that he feels the wrong, but he is working for a hard master, the manager of the concern, who of course does not live there but in Peking. With a regret that verges on tears he takes your good money, and seems only relieved by your threat to report him to the "man higher up." This he sincerely hopes you will do, and he begs you to point out to this wholly fictitious personage the injustice of the system of which he is the unfortunate and quite unwilling instrument. You begin to see that your protest is perfectly wasted, and that your only chance of getting satisfaction is to administer lynch law, and give him the beating he deserves. From this procedure you are only restrained by the fact that he is several sizes larger than you are, which at once recalls you to the higher levels of dignity and forbearance. But for some days you find it hard to look upon a stick or any object that would serve for a cudgel without meditating longingly on the serviceable manner in which it might function in a disciplinary way upon the back of that rascally hotel keeper at Shan-hai-kwan.

Late in the afternoon of the next day we reached Tientsin. A purely informal inspection of the luggage preceded the long drive to the hotel, in the modern part of a very modern city. One would almost imagine himself in some European locality. Most of the nations that aspire to a place among the "Powers" have demanded and obtained from the Chinese government "reservations" or "concessions." Within these foreign quarters the different groups of English, French, Russian, Austrian, Japanese and other residents live, on streets that bear names suited to the nationality in possession. These concessions were demanded at the time China was struggling with the boxer uprising. The shrewd plea was made by the foreign residents that they were in danger unless they were given separate quarters, with the rights of policing and otherwise guarding their sections.

Foreigners in Best Parts of City.

The Chinese government, always amiable to foreigners, and indeed unable to refuse the request at the time, complied. And the result is that the best parts of this fine city are now occupied by foreigners, who count themselves a law unto themselves, and claim the rights of little fragments of their own lands on this Chinese soil, including the quartering of considerable bodies of troops, on the claim that they require protection from the Chinese. It is one of the causes for satisfaction in the breast of an American that our government refused to be a party to this unjustifiable spoliation of a helpless people. And perhaps nothing has tended more to increase the respect of China for the United States than this unselfish and friendly act at a time when so many of the powers were seizing a mere pretext to enrich themselves at the expense of the empire.

We were hardly settled at the Astor House when our ladies had a call from Mrs. Roscoe M. Hersey, wife of the secretary of the Y. M. C. A., who invited them to a reception at the new home of the Young Woman's Christian Association. We had met Mr. and Mrs. Hersey on the ship crossing the Pacific, and had promised them a visit when we should reach Tientsin. They took us all in hand at once, and arranged for every day of our stay in such a manner that we were able to see the place in all of its most interesting features, and at the same time have the opportunity of studying its educational and religious life under the most favorable conditions.

A Fine Group of Students.

The next morning we were under way as early as it was possible to see the place. Through one after another of the foreign concessions we drove, stopping on the way to visit the Girls' School of Miss Cushman, a Methodist lady, and the new homes just going up for the officers of the Y. M. C. A. In the former we found a most engaging company of Chinese girls, some of whom were the daughters of leading Chinese of the city and of Peking. All the younger girls wore the usual clothing, consisting of trousers, jacket and pointed toe shoes. A few had their feet bound, but not many. They were as fine a lot of students as any school could wish.

Then we drove through the Japanese concession, and could not help wondering that there were not more frequent fights between the two classes, considering the hatred and detestation in which the Chinese hold the men from the Island Empire. But these sentiments are not unmixed with fear, and the government holds its people in severe check, for the last of its desires is to allow any aggression of its people against the Japanese to form the ground of fresh claims of territory and indemnity.

Some of the best streets in the present city of Tientsin occupy the lines of the old walls, which were quite demolished after the Boxer troubles. From the standpoint of the antiquarian and artist it seems a pity to tear down ancient and picturesque structures of this sort. But on the ground of light, air, room and all that tends to make a modern and a healthful city, it is a gain to have the walls demolished. Then too the materials are of high value for building purposes along the new streets for which room is thus made.

At the Woman's Hospital.

At the Woman's Hospital, just outside the old East Gate, one of the few parts of the wall allowed to stand, we found a group of patients waiting in the court outside the dispensary. One woman was huddled up in a large basket in which she had been brought. Dr. Yamei Kin, "Dr. Gin," as she is usually called, showed us over the place. She is a young woman of competent western medical and surgical training, and her work is supported by the government. She and her assistants have a busy time caring for the great numbers of women and children who come to them for help. The number of major operations she performs in a week would rival the record of some of our experts at home.

While talking with this energetic young Chinese woman regarding her work, and its meaning for the city, I could not fail to recall the fact that one of the first English books I read on missions was the "Life of John Kenneth MacKenzie," one of the first medical missionaries to China, whose life was spent in Tientsin, and whose memory is still fresh in the minds of the older missionaries of the place. Such work as his made possible the creation under governmental auspices of the institutions Dr. Kin and many other physicians are conducting now.

But the most interesting institutions we visited were the schools. At the Government Middle School, which we reached after a long drive through streets that seemed so narrow and so crowded that we should be quite unable to proceed, and where we had to stop several times to allow the vociferous carters, ricksha men and policemen to untangle the knot of traffic, we were welcomed by Mr. Wang Mun Chang, and introduced to his colleagues and teachers. The young men of the two upper classes who had been assembled for the occasion, seemed to understand the English of the address almost well enough to make translation unnecessary. One of the teachers of this school is a young American, Mr. Percy B. Tripp of Falls Church, Va. Contrary to the usual custom of foreign teachers, Mr. Tripp wears the native costume, and lives in the native style.

Native Costume Adopted.

Later in our visit he took us to his rooms in the school building, where he made us at home with Chinese tea and cakes, and told us of his Bible classes and his social evenings with the boys of the school. One may wonder whether the adoption of native customs in a time when all Chinese are keenly interested in foreign styles and ways is the most effective method of getting into close relations with the most ambitious Chinese youth. But one cannot help admiring the ideals and the courage of the men who like Mr. Tripp are giving themselves so completely to their yellow brethren.

On another occasion we visited the Nan Kai Middle School, passing on the way a military parade ground where a large body of recruits was being drilled. This became a very familiar sight all through our visit in China. And in most instances we found the Chinese soldiers a well set up and serviceable lot. Certainly the Chinese army of today would be able to give a better account of itself than ever in the past.

At the school we met Mr. Chang Po Ling, which to the western ear sounds like plain and simple "John Poling." And there I had one of the frequent sensations I experienced in China, of having a rather indifferent speech taken in hand by a translator and made brilliant and effective. Mr. Chang is a speaker of great power and eloquence. I tried to learn later from Mr. Hersey what it was that I had said that roused the students to such enthusiasm, and he mercifully let me down by saying that an interpreter, who knows his audience better than the speaker, has sometimes to rearrange the material and put in local references and bits of proverb, of which the Chinese are fond. I felt quite satisfied with the explanation!

Mr. Chang is a Christian, the president of the Chinese Y. M. C. A. in Tientsin, and yet not a member of any of the churches in the city. He wants to organize a new church, outside of denominational lines, to which he can invite the men of his own class, who, as he believes, are not being reached by the missions now in operation. As I talked with missionaries and the Y. M. C. A. men about this problem of the upper class Chinese, they confessed its difficulty and expressed keen interest in any plan that would carry the Gospel to the more influential members of the community.

One of the most interesting audiences I met was made up of the students of the Army Medical College and the neighboring Industrial College. It was a fine body of young men, the former group in uniform. Outside of the city two miles is Pei Yang University, and there I had the opportunity of talking to a more mature set of men, who could understand English, and followed with close attention. It is a significant fact that the leaders of the Y. M. C. A. in China are attempting as far as possible to reach the young men of the schools and colleges with messages that shall mingle the sentiments of patriotism and national unity with high moral purpose, and shall open the way for social effort and religious conviction. These leaders are in the fullest sympathy with the missionary work as it is being done, and they are aiding it in every way. But they are wondering if there is not a more effective method of reaching the best men of the nation than has yet been found. And they are making experiments, in faith and hope.

A Chinese Dinner.

One evening our party was invited to a Chinese dinner. The place was in the busiest quarter of the city, and with difficulty our 'rikisha men made their way through the press. The weather was cold, and we had little braziers with coal giving out a suggestion of heat. After the guests were all assembled, the attendants began to bring in the dishes. We were supposed to feed ourselves with the customary chop-sticks, and some of us regretted that we could not go out behind the place and practice for awhile, or that we had not sneaked a spoon along in our pockets.

Well, we had bamboo sprouts, and noodles, and meats of fantastic sorts, and eggs that had been boiled in the Ming dynasty and put to rest in a moist place, and strangely spiced fruits, and cakes that were not a bit good. All these were brought on by the waiters, and each one at the circular table was supposed to reach over and get what he wanted from the central dish. I understood why it was that they did not use a tablecloth!

When we had worried along with this sort of thing for nearly an hour, and were about ready for the benediction, imagine the dismay of the uninitiated among us when they began to bring on the dinner! Roast duck, more meats, vegetables of a dozen odd kinds, and rice that melted as you looked at it. Why had no kind friend warned us? Somebody asked me a day or two later if we had birds' nests as a part of the feast. I think so, for no one expressly denied that they were there, and I think nothing was omitted that ever went to make up a Chinese dinner. But next time I want a menu and a spoon!

New Uses for Old Truths

By Charles M. Sheldon

Christianity is a flexible religion, capable of adapting itself to all kinds of changes in the social order. It is not a set of hard and fast rules which must be obeyed in the same way in every generation; but it is as flexible as life itself. For this reason it is bound to be the dominant religion of the world and in time become the conqueror of all sorts and conditions of men.

The modern church, rightly understood as one of the agencies through which Christianity works, is also a flexible institution, both as to its ritual, its creed, its orders of service, and its methods of work.

In like manner the minister also is a man who has a right to an almost indefinite number of methods of doing his work, because his occupation is an undefined one. In putting together a flexible religion and a flexible church and, rightly understood, a flexible minister, certain very interesting conditions arise, at least are open to discussion, along the line of the right interpretation of the modern uses of old truths. This article will deal frankly with some phases of modern religious life as expressed through the modern church which have come within the range of the writer's own personal experience. In making these statements he does not expect to be received without challenge.

Use of Old Material.

The Sunday-school has been a part of the church organization for many years. At the same time it has not been recognized as the greatest force perhaps for the power of the church, because it has been so common. There are hundreds of churches, for example, in the United States where the Sunday-school membership outranks the church membership. The minister goes to his church in the morning and his Sunday-school, say of three hundred members, hard at work. After an hour's time this Sunday-school is dismissed and a majority of the boys and girls go out of the building and start for home, many of them playing along the way; and into the church building there come two hundred and fifty people, grown up, who have had preaching ever since they were born. The minister goes up into his pulpit and in many cases preaches a profound doctrinal sermon to these grown up people. There may be a dozen children in the entire audience. Hundreds of Sunday morning congregations which face the preacher have no children in them. The sermon in many cases is so profound that even the minister himself does not understand it.

What has happened? The best audience a man ever had, that is, boys and girls, has walked out of the building and an audience fewer in numbers and harder to reach has walked into it. The time has come in the history of the church when this order should be reversed. The preacher should do more teaching and less preaching. He should preach to his Sunday-school six months in the year. The grown up people do not need so much preaching. Why should any minister preach two sermons on Sunday to the same grown up audience? They do not live up to one sermon. Hundreds of ministers are preaching sermons to grown up men and women whose ways are hardened in political, commercial, and social ways. He cannot change their habits by anything he says. The only thing he can do for many of them is to bury them when they die. But the young people can be changed, or rather their habits can be shaped without being changed. If all the ministers in the United States would stop preaching so much to grown up people and preach half the time to their Sunday-schools and young people's societies, the church would begin to grow by leaps and bounds, simply by using the institution which is already made to hand for the minister's use. It is a tremendously hard thing to create any kind of a religious organization that will live. Hundreds of them are born and die. But the Sunday-school has come to stay, and it is the most astonishing absurdity to let such an institution which belongs to every church so severely alone. It ought to be used with tremendous leverage for the church of the future.

The Mid-Week Service.

The old prayer meeting, the old type of personal religious expression is practically dead in hundreds of churches. Man after man in the ministry when he tells the truth will confess to a broken heart over the mid-week prayer meeting. Whatever the reason may be, hundreds of churches are vainly trying to maintain some kind of a midweek service and it does not go. What is the remedy? Simply the injection into the time formerly given to the traditional prayer-meeting of some topic which touches life in a concrete way. The churches must be willing to let the minister strike out on lines which may seem to be entirely a departure and in some instances an upheaval. Why should not the church use one night between two Sundays to discuss all varieties of child development, including a series like this: The Child's Body, His Play and Work, His Reading, His Companions, His Home Training, His School, and His Religion, bringing in experts, either from the church or from the city to talk on these subjects. No matter what the reason may be, the time has gone by when the church can maintain a prayer service such as it used to maintain. That does not mean that the church is growing less religious, but that the expression of its religious life must take some concrete and practical form, or modern men and women will not go near it. Anything which has real life in it and touches live problems of the home, the state, or the market place is the church's business, and it will attract live men and women to it.

The Young People.

If the minister abandons the old traditional way of preaching two sermons on Sunday, he can spend half the week in shaping work for the older young people. The tremendous problem for hundreds of churches throughout the country is the Sunday evening service. The answer to that problem is personal and continuous work with the young men and women of the church. Three or four days in a week should be spent by the modern minister in preparing this evening service for and with his young people, counseling with them and working with them in a teaching way. The trouble with many young ministers is their attempt to be oratorical, to be great preachers, to draw great audiences. Not one preacher in ten thousand is an orator born. Only once or twice in a generation is a great preacher born. But the average minister who has any right to be a minister can expect to be a great teacher, if he is willing to let go his ambition for dramatics and sensationalism and do the common, unadvertised, unknown, but fundamental work of teaching. There is a vast amount of an attempt at preaching in the churches and vastly too little real teaching. The minister does not earn his salary unless he is teaching more and orating less; and the young people of his parish give him this constant opportunity to teach.

New Teaching.

The church must be ready to teach certain things which have not heretofore been considered a part of its work. For example, the Sunday-school should contain in its early curriculum a large place for the teaching of every day ethics as they touch the business and social life of the world. Three great truths have been neglected by the church in its specific teachings: (1) Teaching on the subject of sex. (2) Teaching the brotherhood—that is the causes for race antagonism. (3) Reasons for the establishment of peace and the abolishing of war between the nations.

The teaching on the sex questions has been relegated to nobody. During a week's conference with a great university a few years ago, hundreds of students in private conference with the writer over this question, confessed that no one had ever spoken to them on the matter of the sexual life. No instruction had been given them by any teacher in the university. The family physician had never said a word about it. Not even father and mother had broached the subject to their sons at any time. No minister or Sunday-school teacher had ever said a word to these young men on this great subject. Everybody had avoided it. If the home and the school and the professional doctors are going to avoid this subject, the church must take it up. Nothing finer could be done by a church Brotherhood than for a consecrated Christian doctor to call the boys of the parish together and give them instruction, and for the same kind of a consecrated woman doctor to do the same for the girls. This would be distinctly Sunday-school work. In the matter of teaching along the lines of reasons for race prejudice and reasons for war, no one teaches these things yet in the schools in any scientific way. It is within the province of the church to do this and enlarge the scope of its curriculum.

There is not a single good Sunday-school hymn book in existence. Our boys and girls get classical music in the High School and University, in the opera and theater, but very seldom in the church. The church tremendously needs some new music writers, who will make up dignified words and set them to dignified and worthwhile music. Our worship is thin. It is attenuated. We are ashamed of it but we are not altogether to blame, because there are no music books in existence yet which are really worthy of the name. Here is an opportunity for some musical genius to make his mark. The church of modern times is waiting for the inspiration of a musical service which it has never in all the ages experienced.

Religious Drama.

The church must not be afraid of the use of the dramatic material, to set forth religious ideas. The time will come when the dramatic instinct and its existence among Christian young people will be recognized and used as a tremendous power by the church. The modern minister could render perhaps no finer service than to encourage the instinct of dramatization among his best young people, both for acting and for the writing of religious dramas. Here is a field which is practically not used. The theater cannot be rubbed off the map. The histrionic ability is just as clearly marked in the Christian young men and women in the churches as it is among any young people. The church must give it an opportunity for expression. The church of the future will do so, and preach tremendous sermons through the dramatic form of expression.

More Hired Hands.

To do these new things, or to work old truths in these new ways, the modern church must employ more people. Hundreds of churches in this country which have grown from one hundred members to five hundred in the course of ten or fifteen years have added no more men to the working force. I can think of scores of churches in Kansas which have grown in just about that proportion and the church employs one man to take care of five hundred people, no more than they employed to take care of fifty. Banks and grocery stores do not do business in that way. They hire more clerks, add another wagon, get more hands to do their delivering, and expect to do it if the business increases. The church in its stupidity—to use a strong term—does not learn to do its business as it should. It is niggardly; it is stingy. It is not a question of money, for the church in most cases has enough money; it is simply a case of lack of vision and appreciation of the work the church is doing. The church is worth more than a bank, a railroad, a grocery store, or a skyscraper to any town. When people in the churches once believe this to be a fact, they will be willing to hire all the hands that are necessary.

The modern church is the most tremendous institution for shaping history known to mankind. There is nothing to compare with it. Society cannot be regenerated by what is called civilization. Civilization in itself has no more power to regenerate mankind than a man's bootstraps have to lift him over a fence. The only thing that can reform this old world is the living God, working among living men, employing living methods. The Men and Religion Movement will be directly forward when the rank and file in the churches catch the vision of the Kingdom of God in all its greatness and interpret the gospel in the terms of Christ. His gospel was simply more life. Whatever will bring more life to the people is the business of the church. Whatever will give more life to the world is the business of the preacher.

Congress Learning the Alphabet

We are getting farther into the alphabet. Under President Taft we learned about Schedule K in what the President declared at Winona was the finest tariff ever, but afterward considered the matter and changed his mind. The Democratic tariff bill has gotten us as far as N. This is making progress. To move from K to N is to help us in the nursery song which was intended to fix in mind the letters of the alphabet in the very act of wailing,—

"O dear me, O dear me!
When shall I learn my A, B, C's."

The Democrats have gotten down to N. But let them not too soon congratulate themselves. The Republicans will have no little fun before they are through watching the Democrats learn the rest of the alphabet. Their education is far from complete. It is much easier to criticize a tariff bill than to make one that is above criticism.

One thing we note in Schedule N, and almost it persuadeth us to be a Democrat. The bill aims a blow at the London feather trust, and prohibits entirely the importation of aigrettes, egret plumes or so-called osprey plumes, and the feathers, quills, heads, wings, tails, skins or parts of skins of wild birds, either raw or manufactured, and not for scientific or educational purposes. This prohibition does not apply to the feathers or plumes of ostriches or of domestic fowls.

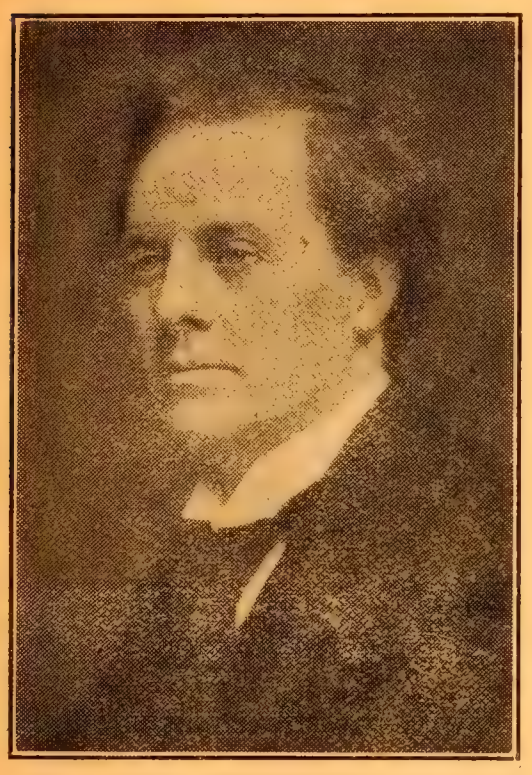
We have not learned the whole alphabet as it is taught in the Wilson-Underwood bill, but we vote for this part of Schedule N. And we shall be greatly interested in seeing how Congress learns the alphabet.

Religious Work at State Universities

By Edmund Janes James

President of the University of Illinois.

A feeling got abroad in the early days of state university development that somehow or other the state universities were, in any community, anti-religious, or irreligious—there is a slight difference in these two words,—at any rate non-religious. There was some justification for the prevalence of this idea, in the circumstances of the time, though very little for it in the actual conditions in and about the institutions themselves. In some states the church colleges were distinctly antagonistic, individually and collectively, to the development of the state university. This naturally forced them into the attitude, in order to justify their action, of presuming that the state institutions were Godless and of utilizing such evidence of that fact as might come to hand to spread abroad this idea throughout the community.



President Edmund Janes James.

It was also natural, as a result of such a situation, that those classes in the community which were not particularly interested in the church or church education, should send their young people by preference to the state universities when they offered anything like equal opportunities to those afforded by the church college.

The impression was of course naturally still further deepened by the undoubted fact that state universities did not set up a sectarian, denominational, or even religious test for appointments to office either in the board of instruction or administration, and as a result men were found in the faculties of state universities who were non-religious, irreligous, and even distinctly anti-religious.

But after all, these were exceptional cases, and such instances have been comparatively few.

The state universities,—the larger and better of them at any rate—have come to represent the whole community of men, in a very peculiar sense. And as our community as a whole is made up of men of all faiths and men of no faiths, and our young people have received all kinds of religious training and no kinds of religious training, the state university, which has become in a certain sense a microcosm of the life of the commonwealth, includes within its bosom all of these varied elements.

But after all is said and done and all allowances are made, the American people as a people are profoundly religious. American citizens as citizens are supporters of the church to an extent quite surpassing, in my opinion, the members of all other nations. Public institutions partake of the character of the people from whose midst they spring and upon whose support they depend. It would be quite impossible therefore, in my opinion, for a state university which had found itself at all, to be an anti-religious, irreligious, or even a non-religious institution. The young people who make up its student body, the men and women who constitute its faculty, come from the body of the people and partake of the views, feelings, emotions, etc., of the community which has produced them.

Our state universities, therefore, are, I believe, distinctly religious institutions, even if they do not in their formal organization recognize by formal exercises of any kind the place of religion in the life of the institution or the state.

Dean Eugene Davenport.

I have worked in four great American universities, either in the instructional or administrative staff or both. Two of them announce distinctly in their charters and in their programs a definite relation to religious work. The other two make little or no reference to this subject and give little or no formal recognition to religion or religious work But I believe sincerely that no one could characterize one of these institutions as any more distinctly religious than another, except that two of them have theological schools, and two of them have not

I believe that in the student body at the University of Illinois, for example, there are as many young people who regularly attend church, in proportion to the total number of students, as attend church in any of our large cities or smaller towns or even villages. There are as many students giving regular attention to the study of the Bible in one form or another, as would be found in a town containing the same number of young people as are enrolled at Urbana-Champaign.

All this, however, does not, of course, answer the fundamental question which rises in the mind of every thoughtful man and woman when he contemplates the condition under which young people carry on their work of higher education. We are really not concerned whether one institution is better than another, or one class of institutions is more fully doing its duty than another, as we are with the question, how can every institution do its duty in this respect, more fully and more satisfactorily.

Our American community has decided once for all, we hope, that church and state shall be kept separate, and that the public school system from the kindergarten to the university shall be so conducted that any reasonable parent, willing to extend to other people the same privilege which he claims for himself, can properly feel that the welfare of his child is secured, not merely physically and intellectually, but morally and spiritually as well. This has led us as a people, Catholic, Protestant, Jew, to establish and develop a common school system, that is a system in which we are all willing to have our children trained. It has also led, as a natural consequence, to the present situation at any rate, whatever may be the final adjustment in the future, in which our public school system declines to give specifically religious instruction. Now those of us who believe that every child should receive regular and effective religious instruction are compelled to seek some other way in which this work can be done, to look for some other agent through which this can be performed. And we find it in the voluntary effort of church, family and individual.

At the University of Illinois I think we may say we have reached a point in our development where, speaking generally, the parents of our students are beginning to feel that they themselves, and the church organization to which they belong, have some duty and responsibility for securing favorable conditions for the religious development of the young people who have left their homes to spend four years in this academic atmosphere.

Here at the University of Illinois, the Young Men's Christian Association and the Young Women's Christian Association, and corresponding associations for Catholic students and Jewish students, are doing an extremely valuable work in furnishing this element of training in the life of our students. The individual churches located in these twin cities and the larger organizations throughout the state which these churches represent, are beginning to bestir themselves as never before to supply this special need.

I have felt that great service might be done to the state if these religious denominations would organize their work in a more systematic and careful way; if they would see that means are provided for the employment of religious teachers in connection with these churches, who in their training and intellectuality would compare favorably with the best men to be found in the university faculties giving instruction in secular subjects and, if they would organize definite courses of religious instruction, open to students on Sundays and other days, provide facilities for the pursuit of these subjects in as serious and earnest a way as other subjects are studied in the university curriculum. Surely the study of the Bible in all its different ramifications calls for as full an equipment in the way of books, maps, charts, archaeological specimens, and other materials of instruction, as physics or chemistry. And the study of religious history and religious development, calls for as ample a training and as wide an outlook and as great pedagogical skill as agriculture or engineering. And surely the work of commending to these young people the religious life, calls for as much devotion and character and outlook and experience as is required to secure their attention and devotion to the scientific life.

I believe it would be a perfectly possible thing for the different religious denominations, either individually, or by co-operation in groups, to furnish as good facilities for religious instruction as the state provides for secular instruction in other subjects. I believe, for my part, that the interest of the community demands this. I have no fear myself, which I find some of my colleagues do have, that through the increasing attention of our religious denominations to this problem we are likely to excite denominational or sectarian antipathies or prejudices. The day for that has passed and there is little danger that it will return. But I do believe it would be perfectly possible to secure here a staff of religious instructors through the co-operation of the different religious denominations, which would compare favorably with the regular instructors of the university staff in science and economics and history. And I believe that a reasonable amount of attention could be secured for such work from all our students if such facilities were offered. I am quite confident moreover that a great service would be done to the state and the nation if such a consummation could be brought about.

It is perfectly evident that the state will provide ample facilities for the study of all secular subjects. It will do as much as it can to improve the conditions of life in a general way at these great centers of academic population. But after it has done all that it is willing to do, and all that it can be persuaded to do, and all that it can do even with all the facilities placed at its disposal, there will still remain a large territory, if we may call it that, in the life of the student which its agents cannot properly cultivate. If our religious denominations would take up this work, the combination would be something which could not help resulting in great benefit to the young people, to the state, to the nation.

If I were a younger man I should ask for no greater opportunity if my church would give it to me, than to be appointed the head of a student house at one of these great universities, equipped with all the means of instruction which modern education has developed, furnished with facilities for enriching the life of these young people, putting me in a position to do whatever I could to make their stay here in this center more valuable, richer, fuller than it would otherwise be. And any private individual or family or religious organization which would undertake to develop such an organzation as this here at Urbana-Champaign and equip it properly for the specific work which it might do, would certainly render a service to these young people, no whit behind that which the commonwealth itself furnishes in these great laboratories and libraries.

Jewish Bible in English

The Jewish Publication Society, while celebrating its twenty-fifth anniversary, received a gift of $50,000 from Jacob H. Schiff, the New York banker and philanthropist, to complete a translation of the Jewish Bible into English begun about 15 years ago. "The Criterion," a Jewish Pittsburg paper, comments as follows:

"It is useless to comment on the always-present need for a Jewish version of the Bible, and it is expected that the forthcoming translation will be a great stimulus to Bible reading on the part of the Jews. While it pleases our vanity to hear the Bible spoken of as the 'Jew's Book,' the 'Jews' Contribution to Civilization,' etc., etc., the cold and stern fact remains that the Jew is not much of a reader of his own Book. The average Christian, who is not a constant churchgoer, knows infinitely more of the contents of the 'Jews' Book' than does the average Jew. But a translation of the Bible by Jews will likely prove an incentive to thousands of non-Bible reading Jews to interest them more actively in its contents. Even a novelty has its value."

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

THE CHILD IN LITERATURE

III.

It goes without saying that the man who could write that classic of childhood, "The Jungle Book," knew the heart of a child. Even Mowgli, that strange little dweller in the jungle, part animal, part human, shows the touch of the child lover. And the many boys of his stories, (for he rarely attempts a girl) what vivid, real, often heroic little fellows they are! Kim and the old priest, that perfect and ideal companionship of youth and age, what a unique, lovable pair they are, tramping along the crowded, picturesque highways of India! But a long article might be written on Kipling's children alone, and the types and truths they represent.

And what shall I say more? For time and space would fail me to tell of Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verse," of Barrie's "Sentimental Tommy" and "Peter Pan," of Mrs. Burnett's "Lord Fauntleroy" and "Secret Garden," of the writings of Joel Chandler Harris, of Eugene Field, of James Whitcomb Riley, and of all the enchanting and pathetic children of fiction and story and verse of our day!

The Children's Century.

What does it all mean, this literature with the little ones flocking and thronging through its pages? Victor Hugo called the past century "The Woman's Century," because of the good fight that was fought, and is still waging, that she might stand forth, unburdened and ennobled, with the power of choice of vocation in her hands.

It might be as truly called a children's century, for if I am correct, the first voices that were lifted, pleading the cause of childhood in our literature, were in the nineteenth century. And so effective has been this plea, that now it is recognized that the child has its inalienable rights in the social structure as well as the man—the right to be happy; the right to its wonder world of play, that world wherein lie the beginnings of knowledge; the right to grow unburdened, unhindered; the right to an education, which shall equip it adequately for the coming duties of citizenship. The rights of the unborn child, even, are being studied, in the new science of eugenics. The criminal child has been given a chance to overcome mistakes and sins, by the establishment of juvenile courts, probation officers, and detention homes. Our National Government has at last awaked to the fact that childhood is as important an asset as our material resources, and has organized a Children's Bureau. That some of these rights are still infringed by greed and avarice seeking for cheap labor, by little children toiling in mills and factories, is no proof that many hearts are not awake to these outrages. Under the leadership of the Child Labor Committee, many organizations of men and women are striving for effective legislation, which shall wipe out this horrid blot and anachronism from our land.

A Day of Child Study.

A child's right to an education implies something more than that it should be given an opportunity to study and learn; it imposes a duty on the part of the teacher of making a study of the child, so as to be able to give it what it needs, and what it can assimilate. Child study is now elevated to the dignity of science; it engages not simply the attention of the mother and the poet but claims the interest of the profoundest psychologists and educators.

A distinguished evolutionist has said that his distinctive contribution to the science was the significance of the length of infancy in human beings. In the lower forms of animal life, there is no infancy, and therefore no possibility of development; heredity does everything for them, they are educated before they are born. The human race, of all God's creatures, is blest with an infancy of considerable duration; in that period, education is possible; then, the baleful blight of a vicious heredity may be weakened, and perhaps overcome. Thus childhood becomes the perennial opportunity for the uplift of our race.

Absence of the Bible from Our Public Schools.

When we speak of education, we should mean moral, as well as mental, training for the child. And just here we strike one of the rocks on which our educational system may suffer shipwreck.

Education in our land is more and more tending to public schools and state universities; it is commonly thought that these are a safeguard to the individual and to society, and so they are. Still we are coming to see that there is nothing easier than to exaggerate the moral value of school studies; something more is needed than science and mathematics to make good men and women.

We all sympathize with our government in its separation of church and state, and as things are now, it seems all but impossible to have religious instruction in those schools and institutions which are supported by public taxation. If we continue to eliminate the Bible, that purest code of morality in the world, from our whole public school system, then the problem of the moral training of our children becomes an increasingly difficult one. I maintain that one of the primary rights of childhood is moral as well as mental training; we should all bear this difficult problem on our hearts, and do all we can to prevent their being defrauded of this high heritage.

We should not only do this because childhood is weak and needs us, but because we are weak, and need the child.

I began this little series of articles with the child in the midst, as an example and rebuke for selfish, ambitious men; with the child, throned in the Saviour's arms, as an ideal of Christian character. I would close with the same thought. A prophet said long ago, "A little child shall lead them," and in a deep sense, the child is a leader of the race. Let us see to it then, for the sake of the world as well as for the love of the children, that the image of the heavenly on their earnest, innocent faces is not marred and blighted by ignorance and sin, for,

"The paths which lead us to God's throne
Are worn by children's feet." I. W. H.

Flow on, O Congo!

(Remembering Mrs. R. Ray Eldred.)

[When Mrs. R. Ray Eldred, missionary of the Foreign Society on the Congo, became so very ill she and her husband were alone on Longa Station. Mr. Eldred immediately dispatched a swift canoe with seven of his best native men for Monieka, a hundred and twenty-five miles up the Bosira River. They were to find Doctor Jaggard, our medical missionary, and bring him to Mrs. Eldred's aid. Mr. Eldred instructed them to rest neither night nor day until they had reached the doctor. These faithful canoe men, spurred on by the thought of their beloved and suffering "Mamma," toiled night and day for three and a half days against the swift Bosira current to reach Doctor Jaggard. Mrs. Eldred died long before they reached Monieka.]

Flow on, O Congo, to the sea,
Ye bore her hence from waters strange to your far land,
Ye bore her from her western home, her children dear,
Ye left her by your tropic strand,
Row, ebon hands upon the oar,
Row 'gainst the river current's mighty way,
Though muscles strain and drops stand on your brow,
You cannot bear her help today!

Flow on, O mighty river, flow,
As centuries between your peopled banks have flowed,
When you alone have heard the cries that no man recked, where no man thought
Upon your dusky ranks bestowed,
Row for the foreign doctor o'er dividing space,
Ah, though you row as no men rowed before,
You cannot reach her place!

Flow on, O River, she heeds not
As when her quivering heart knew that a tide of woe
Surged 'round her, knew and in her gentle womanhood
Dared still to deeply know.
Row, men of stalwart frame,
Bend to your task so speed you may as ne'er you sped before—
She came to help you o'er great oceans wide

She needed help, but needs no more.
Flow on, great Congo, flow,
Your crowding people will wait long for accents mild
In tongues they understand, to pass her lips
And hush their ravings wild.
Row as of old, dark men,
Slow, if you please, with lagging dip of oar,
It matters not to her—too late you come
She moans not as before.

Sound voice of wind and wave,
And let your sobs on Christian shores not cease,
Sound out abroad and call to those unheeding there
In bright, free lands of peace.
Sound with a strong, deep cry,
Call skill of hand and mind and rich, brave souls
That never more shall need in vain our own who toil
Where the wide Congo rolls.

Boom on our shores, O ocean waves,
Hush not the cry of Africa's vast need,
Till never more our few shall toil and die alone—
Oh, moan and cry until we heed!
Leap up, O waters, leap,
And voice the sob of Afric's own who mourn aloud,
Who weep to see their teacher bracing still to bear,
And still beneath his load low bowed.

Hush not, O voices, never cease
Until help speeds that never, never, it shall be
That one must stand alone beside his dearest, see her die,
With no physician at his door.
Beat on, O ocean waves, beat on,
Sob if ye will and moan, ye winds from that far shore—
We have been very deaf and slow to hear your cry,
And one has need of us no more.

Disciples Table Talk

Two Evangelistic Meetings in One Season.

Two revival meetings in one "season" led by special evangelists is the rather exceptional experience of the church at New Albany, Ind. In the meetings held by Herbert Yeuell in the early winter there had been a large ingathering. In April S. M. Martin held another meeting. Writing concerning it, the pastor, W. G. Walker, says: "The work needed reviving. The meeting was held with a view to strengthening the church in faith and practice." It seems to have been felt by some that the earlier effort was not sufficiently "doctrinal," although the former pastor, R. N. Simpson who resigned shortly after Mr. Yeuell's meeting closed denies that Mr. Yeuell's preaching was lacking in doctrine. "To those who think the church is a sort of spiritual quadruped," says Mr. Simpson, "on the four legs of faith, repentance, confession and baptism, there may be no other doctrines that a preacher ought to emphasize or a Christian hear. Yeuell has a few more texts at his tongue's end than Acts 2:38, Col. 2:12, and Rom. 6:4," he continues in defense of the earlier evangelist, and concludes thus: "I have heard many evangelists and ministers and in my judgment Herbert Yeuell is without a superior as a gospel preacher."

Disciples Active at University of Illinois.

As something more than a footnote to the authoritative article by President James on the status of religion in the University of Illinois, found on another page, the report of Mr. F. V. Stipp, student worker among the men of the university whose auspices and support are afforded by the Illinois Missionary Society is especially interesting. At the beginning of the year, Mr. Stipp called upon practically every man student expressing a preference for the Christian church. Then later, either he or some of the other men made calls where they seemed to be needed, not limiting themselves to those having Disciple preferences. In this way the men were kept closely in touch with the church and her various activities. The several departments of the University Christian church, in which the students are concerned, show considerable student interest. About seventy-five men students have been attending Sunday-school, five of these being Chinese. The church attendance is good. Fourteen have thus far been united with the church, ten by letter and four by confession. Two of the foreign students were of this number, one being a Dane and the other a Chinese. The foreign students have been given much attention. There is a vast opportunity in this field that it is felt must not be overlooked. These men will soon be returning to their home lands to wield a great influence. If they go back as Christians they will be a great force for righteousness.

Fruitful Year at Fresno, Calif.

A remarkable record has been written by First church, Fresno, Calif., during the year just closed, according to statistics quoted by Dr. H. O. Breeden in his anniversary sermon the last Sunday in April. He stated that there had been 230 additions to the church during the year, an average of about twenty each month, a large percentage being persons taking their first stand for Christ. In that time, twenty-six have been lost by removal and death, making a net gain of 204. This makes the membership of the church in round numbers 900. Over 3000 calls had been made during the year by Dr. Breeden and his associate minister, Shirley R. Shaw, and 2500 more by the members of the Women's League or a total of more than 6000. This is exclusive of calls made by other organizations. The Sunday-school has doubled, now running close to the 500 mark in average attendance. The women's missionary organization has increased 25 per cent. Dr. Breeden figured $10,278.29 as the income of the church through the various channels, without any pressing plea for money at any time during the year. Of this amount $1,500 has gone to foreign missions, $500 to home missions and about $1000 for benevolences, or a total of $3000. An old church debt of something in excess of $1500 has been paid in full. The Sunday-school home missionary offering was $186.15, and its foreign missionary offering $273.92. In the beginning of his discourse on this text: "And when they had come and had gathered the church together they rehearsed all God had done with them"—Acts 14:27—Dr. Breeden said, "And yet perhaps they did not tell all. Who can tell all? You cannot write all you want to write. Having written what you think is a compete statement you find it is only a table of contents, and not a statement at all. If it is difficult to elaborate merely intellectual statements, how doubly difficult it is to make appropriate religious representations. Whatever is spiritual requires all language for its expression. Puerile and insipid will every statement be that leaves God out of the account. Now, after the manner of this old church in the Syrian capital, we have gathered together to rehearse all that God has done with us during the year just closed. Quietly, happily and successfully we have toiled on together through the hurrying months and years, until at length another milestone has been reached, when it may be alike pleasant and profitable to pause a moment for a backward glance." Dr. Breeden presented his resignation to the church in order that he might carry out a long cherished plan to make a tour around the world, accompanied by Mrs. Breeden. The sentiment of the church against Dr. Breeden's removal from Fresno at this time was so vigorously expressed that he was persuaded to postpone his trip another year.

Benevolent Budget Proportions Adopted.

If the churches adopt the budget plan of making their offerings to missions, benevolence and education how shall the total amount given by each church be apportioned among the various interests? This was the delicate question committed to a committee appointed by President C. M. Chilton at the Louisville convention last October, and constituted as follows: Graham Frank, Liberty, Mo., chairman; H. H. Peters, Paris, Ill.; G. B. Van Arsdal, Denver, Col.; Hill M. Bell, Des Moines, Iowa; W. M. White, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; H. G. Murphy, Muncie, Ind.; F A. Henry, Cleveland, O.; W. D. Ryan, Youngstown, O.; Joseph Burge, Louisville, Ky.; S. H. Thomson, St. Louis, Mo.; V. H. Whaley, Hannibal, Mo.; W. S. Priest, Wichita, Kan. The committee held its first meeting in St. Louis, April 4. All members were present except Judge Henry, Joseph Burge, and W. S. Priest. Prior to this meeting the chairman had sent letters of inquiry to 125 ministers, asking their counsel and their answers to some questions. Others of the Committee sent similar letters. Each member present was asked to make out at once according to his best judgment based upon the reports and briefs of the secretaries, a table of percentages of offerings to be awarded to the recognized interests. From these individual judgments an average was then struck and discussed, and the following table adopted for recommendation to the churches:

F C. M. S.	35 per cent
A. C. M. S.	20 per cent
C. W. B. M.	5 per cent
State Missions	10 per cent
Church Extension	8 per cent
Benevolent Association	8 per cent
Ministerial Relief	7 per cent
Christian Education	5 per cent
American Temperance Board	1 per cent
Commission on Christian Union	1 per cent

The committee confesses frankly that it holds this apportionment tentatively. It invites discussion and improvement, if improvement is possible. The committee feels that its work is of vital interest and importance to the churches in helping them to a better and more systematic method of missionary work, and it has undertaken its large and difficult task with a deep desire to really serve the Church and help forward all her missionary enterprises. Mr. Horace G. Murphy of Muncie, Ind., has been especially active in gathering and organizing data bearing upon this problem.

Practicing Unity in the Baptistery.

The pastor of First Methodist Church, Des Moines, Ia., on a recent Sunday night brought two candidates for membership in his church to the service of Central Christian Church for the baptismal ceremony. Mr. Idleman, Central's pastor, also had two candidates awaiting Christian initiation that evening, and the occasion was interpreted by both pastors who went down into the water with their respective candidates as suggestive of the new day of Christian unity that is dawning. The congregation sang "Blest be the Tie That Binds," and it was announced that a similar service would be held the following Sunday night.

A GREAT AND POPULAR CHURCH MUSIC BOOK

The New Praise Hymnal

By GILBERT J. ELLIS and J. H. FILLMORE

The New Praise Hymnal comes as near being the ideal church hymnal for the present day as could well be conceived. It is a handsome book, dignified in appearance and make-up. It embraces in its contents as nearly everything demanded to-day as could be gotten into a book of 600 pages.

The New Praise Hymnal is practical in every way; everything in it is available for use in the average congregation. It contains what is used by the most advanced churches. The setting of the hymns and music is engaging to the eye and pleasant to read and sing.

It is a book that grows in favor as it is used. New beauties are discovered from time to time as its pages are tested. The hymns and tunes of the church universal are found in The New Praise Hymnal, also the best available Gospel Songs that the modern church has found to be necessary to its various activities.

The sales of The New Praise Hymnal are larger now than they have ever been. The sales are increasing day by day. This means that it meets the demands better than any other book. Sample Copies mailed for examination.

Prices: Silk Cloth Sides, Leather Back, at $70 per 100; Vellum Cloth, at $50 per 100.

movement is sociological in its workings. It will give attention toward securing clean and wholesome picture shows and places of amusement. Good literature will be included in the propaganda also.

Reassuring Word from American Secretary.

Following the earnest warning sounded by the American Society in last week's issue of The Christian Century, Mr. Lewis, the secretary, says that he believes there is a real and unusual interest prevailing among the churches with reference to the May offering. Though many congregations have been slow in sending for supplies, recent indications are that an unusual offering is being taken. The state secretaries are rendering magnificent service, he believes. It will gladden all hearts to hear these words of reassurance from the American secretary. The issues which this Society now faces are acute and pivotal. Every church in which The Christian Century is read will surely take the offering for American missions.

Local Brotherhood Backs Officials.

The sheriff of the county and the city marshall declared in the newspapers of Warrensburg, Mo., that they would "clean up the town" of its vice and law-breaking provided the citizenship would stand by them. That same evening the Brotherhood of the Christian Church met and voted eighty strong to not only stand by their public officials but to raise money to defray the expenses of a vigorous and earnest campaign. The men say in their resolution that they will back the officials in any measure they may propose. The president of the Brotherhood was appointed to convey this notice to the sheriff and marshall which he did bright and early next morning, informing them that it meant the personal and unanimous backing of eight of Warrensburg's most forceful citizens. The officers expressed their appreciation and declared that the fight would begin that very day.

Beautiful New Church for Memphis.

The sum of $54,000 was raised in about forty minutes at the morning services at Linden Avenue Church, Memphis, Tenn., for the building of a new house of worship. A rally service was held and the house was taxed to its capacity. H. Sheffer, the pastor, delivered an appropriate sermon and special music was rendered. The announcement was then made for pledges and in a spirit of gladness and good will the pledges were poured upon the finance committee. Within the next ten days a committee will leave on a tour of northern and eastern cities to secure ideas from churches of note. Active work will be undertaken within a few weeks, it is expected, and the tenants of the cottages now on the site have been instructed to be ready to move at short notice. With $10,000 in bank, the new pledges raised brings a substantial sum within the control of the finance committee without the sale of the extensive property of the church. The original idea was to erect an edifice to cost about $100,000, but it is now the sentiment of the church to build even more substantially and a home to cost, complete with parsonage, $150,000 will probably be erected. The first payment has ben made on the site, which alone cost $37,000. The new church will be known as the First Christian Church.

Tennessee Pastor Dies.

R. R. Hamlin, formerly pastor of the First Christian Church, in Fort Worth, died Thursday in a sanitarium at Battle Creek, Mich. Mr. Hamlin was a Tennessean by birth and was reared in that state. For many years he was a citizen of Texas. In 1903, he went from McKinney, where he was pastor of Central Church, to Fort Worth and was pastor of First Church there for several years. His work was eminently successful. He resigned to enter the evangelistic field. Later he again entered the pastorate, accepting a call to First Church Wichita Falls, and remained there until he went to Johnson City, Tenn., where he was pastor until his death. He leaves two sons and three daughters and his wife. Chalmers McPherson of Fort Worth, who was, for years, a close personal friend, spoke of him as follows: "Mr. Hamlin was every inch a man. Struggling in early life under difficulties which would have staggered many young men, he manifested a courage and energy and faith which led him to splendid victories. He was a pastor of very far more than average strength and success and among evangelists he ranked with the very first. His life was as clean as that of the purest woman. No tainted words passed his lips. In all the walks of life he was the embodiment of honor. There was a charity in his measurement of others which was an inspiration to those with whom he mingled, always placing the best possible construction on their acts and words. As a friend he was as transparent as crystal and as strong as steel."

Large Convention Expected.

Indianapolis churches are planning for the biggest and best state convention Indiana has had in many years. It is to be held May 12-14 in Central Church. Many special entertainment features will be given. The visiting pastors will be entertained at a banquet at Butler College Monday evening by the Sandwich Club of the college and Indianapolis pastors. A banquet for all delegates will be served Tuesday evening at the College of Missions in Irvington. It will be preceded by an automobile tour of the city. The local Sunday-school superintendents will tender a banquet in honor of committee is giving especial attention to the programs for each evening. A small fee of 50 cents will be charged for registration and this, it is announced, will entitle the delegate to lodging and breakfast in private homes. Indiana is on an expansion policy in the administration of state missions and the convention will mark an epoch, it is expected.

Pastor Dons Overalls to Help Raise Debt.

While the congregation at Anaconda, Mont., was engaged in raising a burdensome $4,000 debt the pastor H. F. Ritz gave his salary to the church fund and labored first as a helper to a boiler maker, later as a machinist and finally was promoted to a position in the office of a smelter. Many church members gave one-tenth of their incomes to the debt. Janitor services and organist's services were donated. The debt was finally lifted amid great rejoicing after more than a year of this sort of devotion.

Sterling, Ill., church will build a new house of worship. C. F. Stevens is the pastor.

Central Church, Warren, Ohio, will spend $18,000 in improvements on its church property.

First Church, Galesburg, Ill., has voted to build a new house of worship. H. A. Denton is pastor.

S. M. Martin celebrated the silver jubilee of his work as an evangelist, at New Albany, Ind., on the last night of his evangelistic meeting there.

W. P. Clark who recently removed from Eldora, to Liscomb, Iowa., was formally installed in his new pastorate by C. H. Morris, pastor at Marshalltown, Iowa.

Easterside Church, Lincoln, Nebs., has let the contract for a new church building the basement of which is to cost about $10,000. J. W. Hilton, formerly professor in Cotner University, is the pastor.

A. R. Liverett has begun the third year of his ministry at Jefferson City, Missouri's capitol. The debt of $10,000 upon the church when he began has been reduced by half.

A recent visit of A. W. Kokendoffer of Sedalia, Mo., to Kansas City, was made the occasion by Forest Avenue Church of a delightful "renewal-of-acquaintance-meeting." Mr. Kokendoffer founded this church. R. B. Briney is its present pastor.

Asking damages of $35,000 on account of change of grade in the street passing its house of worship, Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, went into a friendly suit against the city. The court allowed damages of only $3,000. The case will probably be appealed.

A "Debt Lifting Day" at Long Beach, Cal., church resulted in the removal of $15,000 of burden which had rested upon the property for several years. With a crowded house before him, the pastor, F. M. Rogers, unveiled a picture of the church house the outlines of which were but dimly visible through 305 notes in denominations varying from $5 to $500. The notes were one by one removed and assumed by individual members.

Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland, Ohio, held a reception for its new members on April 22. Since September 1, 114 new members have been received, thirty-one being by confession. On the occasion of a recent baptismal service, the pastor, J. H. Goldner, had the unique experience of baptizing two men, one a Jew and the other a Roman Catholic. Euclid Avenue Church will cele brate its seventieth anniversary in October. A week's program is being planned. Anniversary aims have been adopted as follows: A resident membership of 800 in the church; an attendance of 100 in prayer-meeting; an average attendance of 500 in Sunday-school.

Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Temple Seminary, Baltimore, writes as follows: "We are coming to the close of our ninth session at Seminary House and it always means several young women who have had training in the Scriptures and in practical church work who are ready to take up positions as pastoral helpers. Many of these young women are in a position to render the very best service. They are ready to take up any work that falls to them. If there are pastors looking for such help or churches desiring such workers, I shall be glad to put them in correspondence with some of these young women."

During the Western Pennsylvania Missionary Convention, which met at Bethany, W. Va., April 8 to 10, there was held at the college a very tender service. The unveiling of a portrait of the late Mr. T. W. Phillips occurred in the class room occupied by the Phillips professor, and the room was formally set apart to the object for which the foundation was made. Mrs. Phillips, who presented the picture to the room, was present, with many other delegates of the convention. Prof W. B. Taylor pronounced the invocation, A. P. Finley presided and unveiled the picture. E. H. Wray, a member of the senior class, accepted the gift on the part of the students, and Pres. T. E. Cramblett made an address. J. J. Morgan closed the service with a prayer. On the following Friday evening, Mrs. Phillips had an opportunity of meeting all the students enrolled in the department at the home of Prof. A. P. Finley.

United Missionary Campaign

Concerning the United Campaign of the Churches, which is now being much talked of throughout the country, it is reported that the following features of the campaign have been approved:

1. The campaign is in the interests of all the missionary work of the church and aims at the enlistment of the entire membership of the church.

2. A nation-wide simultaneous canvas for home and foreign missions in March, 1914, on the part of as many churches and denominations as can be led to undertake it at that time.

3. To prepare the churches of the whole country for such a canvass, missionary conventions or conferences will be held throughout the United States, at as many as possible of the cities and towns of 5,000 population or over. There are about 1,250 such centers. As these conventions and conferences will need to be held between September 15 and February 15, it will require twenty or more teams of speakers, holding conferences in as many cities or towns simultaneously, to cover the territory. At the request of the United Campaign Committee, the Laymen's Missionary Movement has consented to undertake the organization and general direction of these conventions and conferences. The leaders in the campaign will be divided into teams of four to six men each, each team cultivating a designated area. The conventions and conferences will begin with an evening session and continue through the following day.

4. Widespread deputation work by volunteer speakers, with the aim of bringing the inspiration and message of this united campaign to every community and every church.

5. The setting aside of the second Sunday of February as Missionary Day—for a nation-wide exchange of pulpits and for special missionary features in all departments of church life.

6. A special department of the campaign to be in behalf of the colored churches of America.

7. Special conferences for pastors, where they may study together the missionary operations of the whole church and the unique relation of the pastor to the world-wide extension of the kingdom of Christ.

8. The widest possible use of carefully selected and specially prepared missionary literature.

9. A still larger and more general assistance of the public press in securing religious and missionary news and in interpreting the spirit of Christianity as the spirit of individual and universal service and helpfulness.

10. This united campaign is not for this year only, but is to be "a comprehensive and sustained effort, with such developments as may prove necessary, to lead the whole church into the discharge of its total missionary duty, in this crisis hour of national and world history."

11. The campaign aims not only at securing larger missionary contributions, but at the development of the latent spiritual resources of the church. Prayer, personal Bible study, personal service and stewardship will all be emphasized in their relation to Christian efficiency.

Easter Offering Hindered

The wide-spread floods and storms that were prevailing throughout the country at Easter time have hindered and delayed our Easter offering. We are greatly encouraged, however, by the daily evidence our mails are bringing of the love and loyalty of the brotherhood toward this benevolent enterprise. This cause is deeply entrenched in the affections of our people and it is daily becoming more appreciated. If our schools that did not take the offering at Easter time will make an offering now the Association will be able to report its largest Easter offering and will be enabled to adequately care for the many dependent ones under its care. Friends, this appeal is the appeal of our indigent, aged brethren and sisters, of dependent, widowed mothers, of parentless little ones and of destitute sick—and it is the appeal of our Compassionate Lord. Will not our schools make their response unanimous "in His name?" Take an offering next Lord's Day in your school and send to The National Benevolent Association, 2955 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of I[illegible] is as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private [illegible] not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious educationistic brepresented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointed by churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

Beyond the Horizon

Far back in the mountains of Kentucky rode one summer day a visitor from the outside world. It was a time of drought, and the world seemed all to have dried up. The winding road lay deep with dust, which the visitor's horse kicked up into a cloud. The trees were dusty. The corn in the fields stood with curled leaves the color of the road. The stream had gone dry, exposing a dust-colored bottom. On and on rode the visitor till, at the head of a "holler" he came upon a house, standing in a clump of brown trees. In the dusty little barn-yard close by stood a mountaineer and a mule. He was clad in butternut-dyed homespun, and his color and the mule's matched the landscape. Not a breath of wind was stirring, and neither the man nor the mule stirred.

The visitor sat on his horse and endeavored to engage the mountaineer in conversation. He made some remark about the drought, its effect on the "crap," and other commonplaces, to which the habitant replied in monosyllables and without stirring from his tracks. The visitor wanted to talk, and wanted some one to talk to him, so he kept on. In a futile effort to break open a conversation, he asked, "Have you lived here all your life?" The mountaineer meditatively spat in the dust, and gave the laconic answer, "Not yit."

Not yet! It was a good answer. It is God's answer and ours. There are possibilities below the horizon, and the process of the suns will bring them hither.

You have not done in life the good you hoped to do? Not yet! Let there be no final answer, no reply that closes with a suggestion that there is nothing more to be done. You say you have made a failure of your life? No; you have not succeeded —that is, not yet!

Has the day thus far gone badly? The joy and goodness may begin just now. You have not had them—not yet!

The Bible is always saying "Not yet" and saying it both of God and men.

"We behold not yet all things put under His feet." Surely this ought to have happened long ago! So it would seem. But God is not discouraged about it. He has no idea of abandoning the enterprise. He has not fully succeeded—not yet!

"It doth not yet appear what we shall be." There are unlimited possibilities. Even the places at the right and left hands of Jesus are not monopolized by the Twelve. The competition still is open, if it ever was open. There is no possible good in life from which God arbitrarily shuts us out. We have not had it thus far; it is not yet ours; but it doth not yet appear what we shall be.

Those bad habits of ours; those hasty words, and spiteful acts—we have not conquered them—not yet! But we are on the way to do so. We are in process of doing so. We have confessed them with tears and repented of them, and done them over again. Never mind. We have not conquered them yet, but we shall.

And who knows whether God reckons success and failure just as we do? Yonder is a poor fellow who six months ago promised he would stop drinking, and there he is drunk again. God pity him, and his wife and children, his father and mother! But six months is six months, that is to say 180 days, and maybe some more, for some months have 31 days, and the extra day may have been to him one of cruel temptation and of heroic resistance. The recording angel will almost lose the index number of the page that tells of the one day he fell in joy that for one hundred and eighty, yea, for one hundred and eighty-FOUR days he succeeded. He has not fully conquered? So he has not—not yet!

"We behold not yet all things put under Him." We must be patient with God. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be." God will have need of patience with us. But both God and we are making progress, and we may well congratulate each other.

Again we ride up the dusty road as it winds through the dry ford, and between two brown trees on one hand and the fields of dusty and curled up corn on the other, and we seek out that lank and dusty mountaineer, as he stands rooted and uncommunicative beside his dust-brown mule.

"Salutamus in Nomine Domini!" we say to him. "None of us have lived here all our lives, neither you nor we nor even God—NOT YIT!"

The Creative Power of an Ideal

The ideal grows out of the actual. Men of vision see the world as it is and as it ought to be and will be. The visionary has the habit of ignoring whatever stands in the way of the realization of his dreams. The idealist accepts the aid of science. He aims to build upon solid facts. The builders of his kingdom of God are men like himself with all the faults of men. In his plans he takes account of the character of the workmen.

Men devoid of ideals drift. They are creatures of circumstances. If they improve in condition or intelligence, they are debtors to natural selection, like the animals. The idealist modifies circumstances by intelligent planning. The man without ideals knows when he is comfortable and when he is uncomfortable, but he is ignorant of causes and of remedies. The idealist knows why he is in trouble and he has some idea of the way out.

Ideals differ in value. The lover of pleasure has his ideal. The objection to it is that it is too narrow. It represents only a part of him. The same may be said of the ideals of the miser, of the tyrant, of the fanatic in religion, of the scientist who knows nothing of religion and ethics, and of partisans of all kinds. These ideals may develop mental and moral strength of a certain kind but they leave much that is human undeveloped. "Be ye perfect" was the word of the Master to his disciples. All human interests have a place in the world of the disciple.

Now and then one feels that narrowness justifies itself by its deeds. Men whose ideals include only a few of the great human interests are often more intense than broad-minded men. The loyalty of the savage to his tribe seems more admirable than that of the average civilized man to his state. Narrow-mindedness and effectiveness in religion sometimes go well together. It may be that the great God is ordering his world so that partisanship is made to contribute to the highest ideals. We can believe that this is so and at the same time we need not cultivate partisanship. The specialist must train himself for his particular work; he will do his work better if he is aware of the importance of what other men are doing. We have our organizations through which we serve God and man. We must be loyal to them. Our loyalty will be most worthy if we have the intelligence and generosity to recognize the place and power of other organizations.

A young man enters college. He is awkward physically and intellectually. He is the object of ridicule for the rest of the students. The teachers are doubtful about him. One thing, however, impresses them; the young fellow has a thirst for knowledge. He will not be laughed down. If he is sensitive, he endures with the spirit of a martyr. After a year or two the ridicule ceases. The awkwardness begins to disappear. There is respect for the student who is winning, and the kind-hearted have ceased to pity. Students more brilliant have fallen far behind because they had no ideal. They were always ready to leave study for pleasure. After college the student who has an ideal gathers about him his friends and helpers and by steady application he keeps on growing mentally and morally. The men without ideals grow less and less intelligent and worthy as they come to middle life and to old age.

The power of the ideal is seen in the life that grows up steadily and gracefully. The child of Christian parents when it receives through its parents the spirit of Jesus is one of the best illustrations of what an ideal can do. It learns to control its appetites. The temper is trained so that whatever is hateful is hated intensely and whatever is lovely is sought with all the energy of the soul. Selfishness gradually disappears. There is pity for the weak and admiration for strength rightly used. The mind is filled with knowledge of what the great and good have done.

A more striking illustration of the power of the ideal is that of the ruined life that is restored. The "twice-born" men gain power to overcome their evil habits when they have a vision of the life they ought to live. Men fall back into their old ways because their ideals become obscure and they have no motive strong enough to sustain them in the struggle against brute impulses and appetites. The man who wins has ever before him a picture of the man he ought to be. Friends help him to keep his ideal clear and living. Daily communion with Christ makes sure the victory. Not a Sign But the Thing Itself

"In a pedo-baptist missionary paper published in India I find a definition of baptism which I submit to you. It seems to me to be very much like your own. Am I right? The definition is as follows:

"'Baptism is the visible ceremonial sign of initiation into discipleship and introduction into the Church of Christ. It determines nothing as to the prior or subsequent condition touching the new birth.'" C. P. H.

Only if the two words which we have caused to be printed in italics are omitted will the definition be acceptable to The Christian Century or true to New Testament usage. Baptism in the New Testament is not a sign, it is an action, a function. It is ceremonial initiation into discipleship, not merely the sign of such initiation. The physical act of immersion [and for many centuries, sprinkling,] may be spoken of as the sign of the initiation, but baptism is the whole act itself. It is ceremonial, and necessarily so, because it is a social act, that is, it is the act of a social community, the church conferring membership upon a candidate, and it is his act of accepting membership. There is no other way to perform a social act of this sort except by ceremony.

Baptism is not the sign of initiation into the Church any more than inauguration is the sign of initiation into the presidency, or marriage is the sign of initiation into wifehood and husbandhood, or naturalization is the sign of initiation into citizenship. Inauguration is initiation, marriage is initiation, naturalization is initiation. And so likewise, baptism is initiation.

The error of the two great immersionist bodies has been to divorce baptism from initiation, to give it a meaning as a physical act by itself having no "pragmatic" function (if we may use a very modern term), an act to be performed because Christ commanded it or because it symbolizes certain things. The Disciples, wedded to a certain formula of the socalled "terms of pardon," have conceived baptism as a condition of admittance into the Church. The Baptists, more especially in England, have erected it into a "movable" individualistic ordinance to be "obeyed" whenever the Christian may elect to "obey" it. They therefore often "baptize" persons who have for many years been members of their churches. The New Testament knows nothing of either of these conceptions. It considers baptism neither as the condition of discipleship, nor as the sign of discipleship, but as the very act of becoming a disciple, of committing oneself in the eyes of the world to the Society of Jesus.

Baptism does "determine" something, therefore. It is not a mere symbol or sign. It makes a change. It does not make a direct change in character but it does make a change in status, and character is likely to be changed by change of status. Faith and repentance deal with character. Baptism deals with status. So long as there is a definite social status to be assumed in becoming a Christian, so long will baptism, or initiation into that status, abide.

The value of this view is that is obviates legalism, it makes baptism an ethical act and it enables a clear-eyed reader to live comfortably with his New Testament.

This is One Reason, Mr. Taft

We never sympathized with those who criticized President Taft during his presidency for attending the Unitarian Church to which he belonged. It seemed to us a place far more becoming to him than the Roman Catholic Church to which he did not belong, and where he attended quite as often as seemed to us necessary. If the Unitarian church was his church, the church whose doctrines he believed, the church in which he could worship and work best, we do not blame him for attending it, and letting his attendance count for what it reasonably might. But we noted at the time, and our interest has been rekindled since, as our attention is called again to his address on the last Sunday he was in Washington, in which he said he wondered that we were not all Unitarians, and that he thought a good many of us were.

A friend has called our attention to this remark of his, and a comment on it in Harper's Weekly. We reprint this quotation, containing first what Mr. Taft is reported to have said, and then something about it ourselves.

"On Sunday, March 2, President Taft went to the Unitarian church, where he has worshipped for the last four years, and addressed the congregation. The papers say that he said, among other things:

"'It always has been a wonder to me why all the world is not Unitarian. I think all the world is verging in that direction. We preach the doctrine of sweet fellowship, of love of God, of love of Jesus Christ, and tolerance for every faith which depends upon the great principle of liberal Christianity—and that makes for progress toward morality and higher religion. The one trouble we suffer from —if it be a trouble—is that there are so many Unitarians in other churches who do not sit in the pews of our church. But that means that ultimately they are coming to us.'

"No, Mr. Taft, you are going to them. The Unitarian churches throve best when the other folds were uncomfortable. Since the other folds have become more comfortable, the Unitarian company has ceased, we believe, to gain in membership. The American people, Mr. Taft, have a great and just regard for you, but they never would appoint you a committee of one to go out and ascertain which way the tide is running.

"We will not say, Mr. Taft, that if St. Paul had been a Unitarian, Christianity would have been known in history as a sect in Cappadocia. But we will say that if St. Paul had been a Unitarian, it would not have been necessary to collect his epistles. There would never have been enough market for them to warrant it."

Now we are of those who are frankly not Unitarians. We do not intend to be bigoted about it, but we are perfectly willing everyone should know that we are not, and know why. And this, among other reasons, is why so few people become Unitarians—they have seen the decay of a negative faith, and they want a faith that is vital.

Without a particle of bitterness, let us look back for a moment and see what a disaster it would have been if every one in this country had become a Unitarian.

The Unitarian Movement in America is nearly one hundred years old. It is alleged to have begun with Channing's celebrated discourse in Baltimore on May 5, 1819. What has it to show for its nine-tenths of a century of existence?

No denomination in this country started with such a heritage as did the Unitarians. They went out from the Congregational body in New England carrying with them some two hundred churches and many of the most distinguished ministers in the nation. The movement had its birth in a time of great intellectual activity, and inherited such an impulse in this direction that some of the greatest minds in the next two generations developed within its intellectual fold. The fine group of New England poets and philosophers belonged very largely to this fellowship. Harvard College, the oldest and greatest of American institutions of learning went over to the new denomination. No denomination in America ever had so promising a beginning. It is time for it to give an account of the talents entrusted to it.

After nine-tenths of a century of existence the Unitarians have scarcely more than twice as many churches as they had at the beginning, and these churches exist almost entirely in New England. Other denominations have multiplied their numbers in each decade, but the Unitarians are practically at a standstill. During the last decade the Unitarian church increased only about two per cent while the average increase in the churches of America is almost 60 per cent. New communities from the Hudson River to the Pacific have sprung up in these ninety years and in practically every one of them one or more of our orthodox churches, but the Unitarian churches are so few as to be a negligible quantity in the whole country outside of New England.

The Unitarian answer to this is that while the denomination itself has not grown greatly it has proved a leavening influence on other denominations. It is important to ask then what kind of a leaven it may have exerted in those churches which it believes itself to have influenced. Has it given to them a more earnest passion for the salvation of men? Has it kindled within their hearts a greater ardor for the extension of the kingdom of God?

The Congregational denomination, which the Unitarian Movement cut in twain, was greatly weakened by the Unitarian defection. Nevertheless it has more than six thousand churches and practically 700,000 members. It has planted colleges in nearly all of the newer states from Ohio to Oregon. It has sent the Gospel around the world through the agency of the American Board, the foremost foreign missionary organization in the world. The Unitarian churches have to their credit a single foreign missionary whose work was a conspicuous failure, and though they pride themselves justly on the intelligence of their membership, their work in the founding of colleges is not to be compared with that of the denomination out of which they sprang. Even on their own vantage ground of education and intelligence they have little to show of progress when compared with the churches nearest alike to them in organization and opportunity and different only in doctrine.

What then would have become of our country had it depended entirely on the Unitarian denomination for the evangelization of new communities? The Northwest territory was just opening and most invitingly when the Unitarian movement began. Into it rode the hardy missionaries of the Congregational and Presbyterian faiths, and not infrequently these found the Methodist circuit rider blazing paths through the woods when they arrived. Where were the Unitarian missionaries in those days? Where have they been since when new communities called for a sturdy gospel and a virile faith? Missionaries of the Congregational body founded colleges in Japan and guided the new nation when it burst its swaddling clothes. Others laid down their lives in China and mingled their blood with that of their faithful converts in the red dawn of Turkey's new morning. Where were the Unitarian missionaries? What would have become of our own country and of the multitudes to whom the gospel was sent forth in foreign lands if the Unitarian movement had absorbed the whole or the greater part of the church life in America?

We ask the question not unkindly and in no spirit of sectarian bitterness, and we ask it pointedly and plainly, first, Is it not manifestly a blessing to the country that the Unitarian movement has not grown to include any very large percentage of the religious life of America? and secondly, in so far as other churches are leavened by Unitarian influence are they likely to retain their spiritual earnestness? The standstill of the Unitarian Movement in an epoch of growth and progress is the result of the dry rot of the inactive faith.

This, Mr. Taft, is one reason why we are not all of us Unitarians, and why some of us have no intention of becoming so. There are other reasons, but this is one.

Progress Through Discontent

There is a vast total of foolish, impotent and utterly futile discontent. Many a home is rendered unhappy, many a pastorate is ruthlessly terminated, because of a reasonless, fretful and wicked unwillingness to accept things as they are and make the best of them. None of us live in wholly ideal conditions. That is probably an advantage. In any event it is a compulsory situation. Only within a limited range of choices can we create the conditions of our environment, and not in the least can we alter our heredity. We cannot drop one single rascal out of our million ancestors of the twentieth generation, nor hasten by a fraction of a second the rising of tomorrow's sun, and we may as well accept these conditions and make the best of them.

Yet no progress ever has come in human life through mere passivity. A noble discontent with existing conditions is indispensable to progress. Complacency is never to be commended in the face of conditions that need to be changed.

It is unfortunate that so much of the potential energy of discontent wastes itself in ineffective protests against what cannot be cured, and leaves unconsidered conditions easily within our control. Many people, it is to be feared, break the wings of their discontent against the bars of circumstances, and live quite content with conditions in their own lives which are sorely in need of change.

Of this spirit of self-content amid conditions where progress ought to come through protest, Kipling wrote:

> "Because we know we have breath in our mouth,
> And think we have thought in our head,
> We shall assume that we are alive
> Whereas we are really dead.
> The lamp of our youth will be utterly out,
> But we shall subsist on the smell of it!
> And whatever we do, we shall fold our hands,
> And suck our gums and think well of it.
> Yes, we shall be perfectly pleased with our work,
> And that is the perfectest Hell of it."

There is some sound theology in Kipling's lines. For what is hell but the acceptance of conditions intolerably bad, and a stolid refusal to make them better?

Some Objections to the Minimum Wage Law

Let us not concern ourselves with the superficial objection that the minimum wage law is contrary to the spirit of America, and that it leads to socialism. That is a bogy of which we are no longer afraid. A more serious objection is that if the state decrees that its citizens shall not be employed for less than a certain amount per week, the state is under obligation to employ its working citizens at such wages or maintain them in some other way. But a still more serious objection is that at the present time it would be next to impossible to enforce a minimum wage law. Professor Commons says, "We must have our administrative machinery perfected if this and other laws are to be enforced." Here is what he thinks is the proper order for progressive labor legislation: First, laws for the prevention of accidents; second, laws for protection against industrial diseases; third, laws for the restriction of the hours of labor; and fourth, "the minimum wage law to fill the gaps and round out the system of labor legislation."

Mr. Edward McSweeney of the Massachusetts Industrial Accident Board, declares "that the whole question of wages is a moral one, to be solved only by morals and not by social science." He fears that the minimum wage will become the standard wage, and to compel men to work for a minimum wage, he says is only a form of slavery.

The minimum wage idea has its defects and limitations. Social experts in Australia and New Zealand where the idea has been operative for a number of years acknowledged that it is a faulty law. But where is there a perfect law? The minimum wage law in the two countries named has helped to establish amicable relations between employers and employees. In both lands it has been a social gain. It has increased the health and the efficiency, especially of women workers. Our laws now recognize the right of the worker to a decent living. Our mechanics' lien law insists that the worker should be the first to be paid when a piece of property is in jeopardy. His tools are exempt from foreclosure sale. Our compensation-in-case-of-accident laws are also in the interest of the industrial worker. Our laws are trying to instruct our people to do justly and to love mercy. They are trying to instill into the hearts of our people those great principles of love and justice for which Christ stood. It is a great advance when the laws of our land preach some aspects of our Gospel.

Gulliver Among the Lilliputians

Gulliver was no liar. He merely told it in advance of its occurrence. The great Gulliver dropped last week into a strange land and found itself held down by a multitude of midgets with thread-like ropes. A German dirigible, five hundred feet long, and great proportionately in its other dimensions, lost its way, sailed over the frontier into France, landed on a parade ground and found itself in the midst of a regiment of French cavalry. There it stayed, while international explanations and negotiations went on, and the villagers held the ropes and good-naturedly jibed and joked their captives. All this illustrates that our dreaded dirigibles have still very manifest limitations. They are very terrible in the air, and this may be their greatest usefulness. The dynamite boat Vesuvius in the Spanish War was so dangerous a thing that a shot against its side might have blown it up, but it was a very terrible thing to think about with its two long tubes ready to blow dynamite bombs half way across the ocean. It was good for nothing except for its moral effect. It may be partly so with dirigibles. In any event they will have to learn with Darius Green that flying is often less perilous than lighting.

German military authorities say that the officers in the dirigible ought to have blown themselves up with their craft rather than have alighted and disclosed their secret. Possibly Gulliver should have done the same.

The New Hebrew Union College

The importance of Judaism in the United States is once more demonstrated by the recent dedication of the new $220,000 Hebrew Union College at Cincinnati. The ceremonies brought out the full theological weight of Judaism. Five hundred delegates were assembled on the occasion. For five days leading American rabbis re-voiced the appeal of the ancient prophets of Israel. A pathetic plea was made to the Israel of America to go back to Judaism, back to the synagogue and the congregation. This appeal was voiced preëminently by Rabbi Joseph Krauskopf. It was frankly conceded that the curse of modern Judaism was materialism. Defections in the Jewish ranks were more pronounced than ever. The statement was made that in Germany alone not less than 250,000 Jews had deserted the faith of their fathers, and that at least one-third of the free thinkers of Germany were Hebrews.

The Hebrew Union College is designed to stem the tide of Jewish defection in this country. The enthusiasm of the dedicatory exercises was pitched high as may be imagined by the fact that $200,000 was raised on the spot for the support of the college and the general work of the synagogue extension department, a department corresponding more or less to our familiar Home boards. The new Hebrew Union College is dedicated at a time when efforts are being made as never before for the conversion of the Jews. It may be the last flicker of a dim light in Israel. We cannot but wish the enterprise all success, knowing as we do, the growing atheism of that forlorn people, who are being captured almost bodily by the radical Socialists of this land.

An Anti Name-Changer's Dream of Union

In The Churchman (Episcopal, New York City), of March 8, Dr. Charles Lewis Slattery, the famous Episcopal clergyman and author, has some very positive things to say about the proposal to change the name of the Episcopal Church to "American Catholic Church" and its effect on American Protestantism. We present an extract from Dr. Slattery's sensible article, closing with his "personal dream" of a union between the Protestant Episcopal Church and the Presbyterian Church:

"It has long since been obvious that our hope for Unity is stronger with the virile Protestant communions than with the Church of Rome, exclusive and intellectually cautious. How, then, would our Presbyterian, Congregational and other friends regard our calling ourselves 'The American Catholic Church?' I do not see how they could fail to scent its presumption. They might be amused; certainly they would feel that we were not so eager to be one with them as we were to declare our superiority. And it would be more difficult to explain why we were 'The American Catholic Church' than we are 'The Protestant Episcopal Church' in the United States of America.

"The word 'Catholic' in any but its bald sense of universal has not had a sufficiently generous history to make us really desire it: if it means universal, it is too big for us. It belongs in the Creed: it does not belong to any single part of the Church. I believe that, since the Reformation, every Church which has adopted the name 'Catholic' as part of its title has been notable sectarian and exclusive in its spirit. I remember that one afternoon in London several years ago, after a service in the freedom of St. Paul's, I chanced to enter a building calling itself 'The Catholic Apostolic Church' in time to hear the sermon. Rome and Canterbury and Geneva and Moscow were all alike cast out; and a few souls, clothed with hard faces and shrill voices, were the Catholic Church. Even with a name intended to imply primitive origin and universal sway, the organization was evidently moribund. In a word, then, should we call ourselves 'The American Catholic Church,' our Commission on Faith and Order would probably have no further work to do among Protestant Christians, who would hardly take us seriously. They might be disappointed: they would at least believe that we preferred the feverish pursuit of a name to the patient quest of a great ideal.

"My own personal dream is that the great Presbyterian Church, with its dignity and history, its scholarship, its wonderful record of personal piety, strong character, and distinguished achievement, sharing with us a reverence for order and history, should draw nearer to us and allow our Communion to draw nearer to it, until at length, with little to separate and much to unite us, with magnificent positive contributions to accept on either side and nothing to deny, we might come together, daring to call ourselves by a name too large for either of us alone, too large for both of us together. We should have done something to deserve a new name; and we should have the right to invite others to join with us, till we might hope that in some future, near or remote, the Christianity within our nation should be united, to build up the Kingdom of God among our own people, and to carry the message of Christ to the uttermost parts of the earth."

To the Victors

Montenegro has won. By all the laws of war she deserves the fruits of her victory. War is a bad way to settle things, but diplomacy is sometimes more murderous. Austria holds it as her settled policy to keep Servia and Montenegro weak. Scutari, which we must always remember is not the Scutari on the Bosphorus across from Constantinople, but quite another city in Europe, belongs to the men who have captured it at the price of blood. Let Europe keep hands off. This is not the time for intervention. It is not the love of peace that animates Austria, but greed of the territory of small nations. Montenegro has won in a fair fight. How in the world she did it is past understanding, but she did it. Let Europe stand back and keep out of the fight. Montenegro deserves all she can get out of this war: let no hypocritical cry for peace cover the treacherous greed of Austria seeking to plunder a plucky victor.

Have Children Forgotten to Play?

Mr. Charles F. Weller of the Playground and Recreation Association of America, is spending the present month in Chicago. He declares that the American boy and girl doesn't know how to play. In the city of Richmond, Virginia, a recent careful investigation revealed the fact that of the children sixteen years of age, only five of them played. Too large a per cent of the children are doing nothing. At the home of Dr. Young, of the Health Department of Chicago, a dozen social workers discussed this matter. They remembered 26 games that they played as boys and girls. The next morning (Saturday morning) the dozen social workers asked groups of boys and girls in Chicago how many of these 26 games they knew and played. On Saturday night the social workers met again and reported. The boys and girls they had met on Saturday morning knew only seven of the old games, and played only five of them. Too large a per cent of the children in Chicago find their recreation in attending dramatic and moving picture shows. On a recent evening in Chicago over 86,000 young people were attendants at dance halls.

Mr. Weller's contention is that every town of any size ought to have a public playground, and, that that playground should be properly supervised. "Space," he says, "doesn't make a playground." The American boy and girl stand around too much. They loaf rather than play or work. They watch other boys play, but they don't play themselves. They need to be taught how to play.

Why Protestant Missions in Catholic Lands?

Roman Catholics have professed to be scandalized by the sending of Protestant missionaries into nominally Roman Catholic countries. Others have also attempted to make anti-missionary capital out of it. But the fact remains that there is scarcely a more necessary work. On March 12 and 13 in New York City, a conference was held by boards and missionaries doing Protestant work in Latin America, including Mexico, all the republics of South and Central America, Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. The conference issued the following document setting forth tersely the reasons for such work:

"While these lands contain a great variety of moral and spiritual need, we frankly recognize that, as a whole, Latin America presents a situation different in many respects from that presented by the non-Christian peoples of Asia and Africa. There we find ethnic faiths intrenched behind the sanctions of many centuries of national thought and practice. To lead these Asiatic and African peoples into the liberty and fellowship of our common Lord and Master is the aim of all Christian effort. In Latin America we find no great non-Christian religious system. In all these lands we find the representatives of the Roman communion. In all of them that communion has been the dominant religious influence of centuries.

"But we also find—for reasons into which we need not enter here—that the vast majority of the people of Latin America, especially the men, claim no vital relation, and acknowledge no allegiance to the Roman communion. Religious indifference, agnosticism and infidelity, especially in the more enlightened Latin-American countries, have laid a strong hand upon most of the 71,000,000 people who dwell in these lands. Moreover, there are several millions of unevangelized Indians and other native peoples. They are surely pagan as any tribes in the heart of Africa. Their need of the gospel is the same.

"We acknowledge gladly that the Roman communion has done useful work among these varied peoples. We would do nothing to detach sincere Christians from their allegiance. There are patent facts, however, which call loudly upon the Christian communions of this land to more worthy effort to aid the people of Latin America to meet their spiritual, moral and intellectual needs.

"1. Millions of people in Latin America are without the gospel today, either because they have never heard it or because they have rejected it in the form in which it had been offered to them.

"2. The percentage of illiteracy in Latin America is from 50 to 85 per cent.

"3. The percentage of illegitimacy is appallingly high, ranging from 20 to 68 per cent.

"4. Agnosticism, if not infidelity, almost universally prevails in all the universities of Latin America."

On top of this statement of the conference, comes the independent news of the possibility of an American Roman Catholic Federation, beginning from Canada and extending to the end of Patagonia, which would directly jeopardize the work of Protestantism in all these lands and ultimately result in mutual misunderstanding and distrust between North and South Americas.

Christian Union and Methodism

Rev. William E. Huntington was the Methodist representative in the Boston series on Church union reported stenographically by The Congregationalist (Boston). What the Methodists might sacrifice in the way of creed for the sake of Christian union, appears to Dr. Huntington as follows:

"The fundamental doctrines of the Methodist Episcopal Church are set forth in twenty-five Articles of Religion, taken for the most part almost without change from the Thirty-nine Articles of the Established Church of England. One can not read through these Articles without feeling that he is immediately transported to the hot and murky atmosphere of the sixteenth century in England, when the two ranks—Protestants on one side and Roman Catholics on the other side—stood with the drawn swords of fierce debate over questions of religious dogma. These Articles, some of them, are like cannon trained upon an enemy's bulwarks. They were aimed and shotted for the very citadel of the Catholic positions. The language is heavy with denunciation—almost damnatory. The Articles are polemic, not pacific. They meant war, not peace, separation, not reunion, for that century and the succeeding centuries. When Roman Catholics shall meet with representatives of the Church of England, the Protestant Episcopal and the Methodist Episcopal bodies in that coming conference, who shall lead in the disarmament of Christianity? Who will send their dogmatic guns to the rear and have them melted and molded into plowshares and pruning-hooks for the Lord's vineyard? When the time shall come that, from all sides, leaders of Christian churches are gathered to study the agreements and not the disagreements, between them in the substantive elements of the common faith once delivered, representatives of the Methodist Episcopal Church will not hesitate to yield in some dogmatic statements points that do not make for unity and peace, and which belonged to a bygone age."

Dr. Huntington further assures us that if the "Methodist order of church administration is found to be too cumbersome, if some other mechanism for religious work on a large scale is, by experience, discovered to be a better means of promoting the Kingdom of Christ in the world, it will then be a good time to reconstruct, to take to pieces the machinery, and let a new era adopt new instrumentalities. It would be only a small sacrifice and yet a profitable one if the General Conference should be reduced to half its number of delegates, for a body of four hundred would be far more effective for legislative functions than a body of eight hundred. We could also spare such legislation by this law-making power as intrudes itself into matters of personal conduct in church members in which the elements of right and wrong are not clearly apparent, as in the case in some recreative practices and amusements. In these matters the individual conscience may safely be left to do the legislating; every other kind is ineffective and 'a vain thing.'"

"Pastor" Russell Again Discredited

Evil days fairly have fallen upon "Pastor" C. T. Russell. This time a grand jury in Hamilton, Ontario, completely demolished the "Pastor's" suit for criminal libel against Rev. J. J. Ross, a Baptist minister of Hamilton. It seems that Brother Ross took a fling at "Pastor" Russell in a powerful little pamphlet, and it furthermore appears that the "Pastor" became quite peeved in his old age. Unmindful of a great number of reverses in civil courts in America, "Pastor" Russell rushed into court again, but this time on foreign soil. Last December he filed a criminal libel suit against the Baptist brother. It took a painfully long time for "Pastor" Russell to make up his mind to go voluntarily to Hamilton, since a citation to appear in court there was not enforcible upon a resident of the United States. But this was after a first trial, at which the sitting magistrate refused permission to the defense to cross-examine Russell. This point on appeal to an upper court was reserved. Then "Pastor" Russell graciously made up his "pastoral" mind to go to Hamilton. He went, he saw and he was conquered to a frazzle. For five hours "Pastor" Russell was given the third degree in a gruelling examination and cross-examination. Upon his return to dear old Brooklyn, he wrote a gracious letter to Brother Ross saying he was, of course perfectly willing to withdraw the case, asking Brother Ross merely "to apologize in a mild form" for the slight trouble, with another "merely" to boot, that Brother Ross would write no more anti-Russell pamphlets. But Brother Ross stuck to his guns, refused to offer any apologies in any degree of "mildness" whatever. The case went to the grand jury with a complete manuscript of the fake "Pastor's" testimony. What did the jury do, but throw the whole case out of court, and once more "Pastor" Russell stands discredited. The "Pastor" has spent a considerable portion of his time in the civil courts, and if he has ever once won a case of any sort whatever his press agents have so far failed to inform the public. Even his own wife gave him a good-sized trouncing when she secured a divorce from him.

American Baptist Publication Society Report

A. J. Rowland says in The Watchman (Boston):

The American Baptist Publication Society is very grateful to be able to announce that the year closing March 31, 1913, is the banner year of its history. The Publishing Department shows an increase of business of $27,206.10, and with all bills paid and donations made has a cash balance in bank of over $60,000, most of which has been appropriated for the reduction of the mortgage on the Roger Williams Building, and in the purchase of new presses in the printing house. The Missionary Department shows an increase of over $20,000 in contributions from churches, Sunday-schools, and individuals, and after meeting all obligations has a balance of about $2,400 to the credit of the new year. The Bible Department also closes the year with a small balance. The new Department of Social Service and the Baptist Brotherhood has made great strides during the six months of its existence, and the Educational Department has a remarkable report to make with regard to Teacher Training and work among the young people. Altogether the year has been an unusual one in the results secured in all departments, and offers occasion for much gratitude and hope.

Roman Catholic Avarice in Pennsylvania

The legislature of Pennsylvania by a narrow margin defeated a bill, which if passed, would have legally sanctioned absolute control of all Roman Catholic Church property by the diocesan bishop. All ecclesiastical property in that denomination is vested in the name of the bishop and as a matter of fact literally belongs to him in the sense that he can do with it absolutely as he wills. Among Protestant churches, title and control is vested in congregationally elected officers, usually trustees. In Pennsylvania some of the Roman Catholic parishes have had the nerve to say the church property which their money erected belongs to the members of those parishes, and they have first say about its disposition, according to law. In the interests of the bishops in the various dioceses of Pennsylvania, a bill was introduced to amend the law of 1855 and provide that "control and disposition of church property shall be exercised in accordance with and subject to the rules and regulations, usages, canons, discipline and requirements of the religious body or organization to which such church, congregation or religious society shall belong." This was defeated.

"Advance" Transferred to New Company.

From the Congregationalist (Boston), we learn that The Advance (Chicago) has been transferred to a new corporation, of which Rev. William E. Barton, D. D., is the president. Dr. Barton is a well known writer, and the pastor of the First Congregational Church, Oak Park, Ill. The Congregationalist says:

Another transfer of The Advance was made last week to a company of which Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., pastor of the First Congregational Church, Oak Park, is president, Rev. G. T. McCollum, superintendent of the Congregational Conference of Illinois, secretary, and Rev. W. W. Newell, D. D., treasurer. Dr. Barton, whose name has appeared for the last several months as one of the two editors of the paper, will remain and will have associated with him Pres. O. S. Davis of Chicago Theological Seminary and Rev. W. T. McElveen, Ph. D., pastor of First Church, Evanston. The responsibility for the business management will rest with Dr. Newell, hitherto identified with the Congregational Church Building Society as its Western secretary. We are informed by Dr. J. A. Adams, for the last ten years the editor of the paper, that he has resigned and withdrawn from all connection with the columns of the paper.

New Presbyterian Intermediate Catechism

In 1908 the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., called for an intermediate catechism to meet a growing need in systematic religious instruction in home and Sunday-school. The Assembly gave specific directions that the new catechism should conform to the Presbyterian system of doctrine and practice as well as "to the truth as taught in the Scriptures." Another Assembly requirement was that the new catechism should be simpler in language than the present Shorter Catechism. Last year the committee having the preparations of this catechism in charge supposed it had finished its labors and submitted its catechism to the Assembly for its O. K. The catechism was approved all right, but the Assembly brethren directed that a body of Scripture proofs should be added. History repeats itself. In 1647 the Shorter Catechism was sent up to Parliament with Scripture texts, and Parliament remanded the document with instructions to incorporate a body of Scripture proofs, which was done in the following year, 1648. Is it not remarkable that in both instances Scripture proofs should evolve out of the catechisms, and not the catechisms evolve out of Scripture proofs?

Episcopalian Progress in Massachusetts.

The election of Archdeacon Samuel G. Babcock as Suffragen Bishop in the Protestant Episcopal Church of Massachusetts, on April 9, in Boston, marked substantial progress. Bishop William Lawrence raised an endowment fund of $106,050, the proceeds of which will apply on the new Suffragen Bishop's salary. Bishop Lawrence has shown a rare statesmanship in his episcopal office ever since he was elected twenty years ago to succeed the late Phillips Brooks. He is a wealthy man. Not only has he given himself unstintingly to the great work of developing his church in Massachusetts, but he has given generously of his own private means. While a conspicuous representative of the Broad Church school of theologians in his church, Bishop Lawrence has managed with his rare tact to hold the affections of even the extreme partisans of other schools, (High and Low). The new Suffragen will divide with Bishop Lawrence much of the work that has grown so wonderfully under the latter.

An Example of Foreign Work in America.

What success awaits sympathetic work among foreigners in America, if lovingly approached and cared for, is clearly shown by the work of the Baptists in Scranton, Pa. In that mining region are many Russians and Ruthenians. Seven years or more ago, a conservative old Baptist church in Scranton decided to support religious work among them. The work was carried on by representatives of these races themselves. The work grew until the other day a $10,000 chapel was built and dedicated. Of the $10,000 the sum of $2,000 cash was given by the foreigners themselves. Best of all, out of this colony of Christian Ruthenians have gone some members whose enthusiasm has planted similar work among their countrymen in other parts of the United States and in Canada.

Woman Lectures To Seminarians.

Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, superintendent of Public Schools of Chicago, addressed the students of the Western Theological Seminary on Monday, April 7, on the work of the public schools, with special attention to the work among defectives. The schools of today are adapting themselves to a new standard, that not only pupils who can be taught by the ordinary class-room method shall be received, but also those who need special attention and special work because of some defect. Mrs. Young emphasized the need of keeping defectives in home surroundings wherever possible, rather than placing them in institutions. Conveyances are now used to carry crippled children to and from schools and thus make it possible for them to attend. Mrs. Young also stressed the work of the open-air schools.

Of London or of Cincinnati?

This is a page for interdenominational acquaintance. We take this opportunity to introduce to The Advance (Chicago, Congregationalist) the president of our own Christian Foreign Missionary Society with headquarters at Cincinnati, O. President A. McLean wrote a book entitled "Epoch Makers in Foreign Missions." This book, published by Revell, Chicago, is reviewed briefly in The Advance of April 24. The reviewer says that "It is a well written and strong book." But the reviewer is in error when it says "The author of this book is president of the Christian Foreign Missionary Society of London." Dr. McLean is not of London, but of Cincinnati, O., nor is the society of London. It is the Foreign Society of the Disciples of Christ, with headquarters at Cincinnati, O. Get acquainted!

Will Dr. Alexander Be The Next Moderator?

Despite a stinging editorial in The Continent (Chicago) of recent date, against log-rolling in the Presbyterian Church (U. S. A.) for the moderatorship of its General Assembly next May at Atlanta, The Presbyterian Banner (Pittsburgh) has come out with a candidate to succeed Moderator Mark A. Matthews. The candidate is Rev. Maitland Alexander, D. D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Pittsburgh, Pa. The Presbyterian Banner submits that it has been thirty-nine years since Pittsburgh had a man in the moderatorship, and it is about time that Pittsburgh should now have the highest seat in the gift of the Presbyterian Church.

Vanderbilts Give $300,000 to Y. M. C. A.

That the railroad Y. M. C. A. is a great boon to the railroad business interests of the country, is to say something that is almost trite. But the munificent gift of W. K. Vanderbilt, Frederick W. Vanderbilt and Alfred G. Vanderbilt is a forcible reminder of the sound impression this great work has made on railroad magnates. These three brothers gave the other day the sum of $300,000 to build a new structure for the railroad Y. M. C. A. within a stone's throw of the new Grand Central Station at Manhattan.

Annual Report of Baptist Home Missions.

The American Baptist Home Mission Society closed its year with a net debt of $50,743.74, which it is confidently expected will be reduced to $39,243.74 upon the receipt of its shares of Mr. Rockefeller's pledge. This will mean that all the obligations of the year have been met with a reduction also of $33,235.03 of the indebtedness of preceding years.

—The number of women in the world is approximately as follows: Christian, 238,000,000; pagan, 69,000,000; Confucian, 128,000,000; Hindu, 95,000,000; Buddist, 73,000,000; Mohammedan, 100,000,000.

—The religious denominational families in this country show followings as follows: Catholics, 12,907,189; Methodists, 6,905,095; Baptists, 5,894,232; Lutherans, 2,353,702; Presbyterians, 1,981,949; Disciples, 1,497.545; Episcopalians, 980,851; Congregationalists, 742,350.

Mountain Life in Kentucky

How Education is Helping to Solve a Vexing Problem

By Pres. Wm. Goodell Frost, of Berea College

It was the writer's privilege to be personally acquainted with his grandfather who was the first white child born in Broome County, New York. That grandfather related the stories which he had heard from his own father—the life at Valley Forge, and in the colonies before the Revolution. Nevertheless, it takes a tug of the imagination to conceive the life, feelings and appearance of one's great grandfather!

As an historical study, look into the present-day conditions in our southern mountains. Here is the terra incognita of the United States, a region impenetrable and silent, the mountainous ends of eight southern states. Each of these states forgets its mountain end and hides it away in the background. And the mountains are separated from the lowlands, not only by the barriers of rock, but also of prejudice. The mountaineers have kept, in large degree, that spirit of liberty and Americanism which characterized the colonies, and shared but little in the degenerate doctrines of state rights and slavery. In fact, the mountaineers held Kentucky in the Union and made West Virginia "secede from secession," besides making the confederates a deal of trouble in the mountains of Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama and even South Carolina.

HOME OF A MOUNTAIN MAGNATE.

The history of a mountain family would be about like this: The first progenitor was a soldier in Washington's army from Pennsylvania or North Carolina. After the war he went west and found what every settler seeks—good hunting and good water in some mountain valley. There was plenty of plow land for immediate needs. He carried his household belongings on two or three pack animals and easily constructed his domicile of logs with the proper outbuildings. The domain of a colonial farmer, or pioneer, was quite an establishment. We see it well preserved at Mt. Vernon where Washington's loomhouse and saddle pockets commemorate conditions long forgotten. Some New England homesteads may still be found where, in addition to the house and barn, there is a loomhouse, smokehouse, hoghouse, icehouse, corn barn, hennery and sheephouse.

The Early Settler.

Such a settler as we have imagined possessed in good degree the civilization of his time. He read the Bible, Franklin's "Poor Richard's Almanac," the "American Orator," and one or two simple books of travels or theology. And he wrote with his quill pen in a handwriting quite superior to Spencerian. He understood "points" in law, theology and forest lore.

But he did not bring into the wilderness any system of free schools. His children grew up under arduous conditions and were less intellectual than their sire. When the estate was divided each of the twelve or fifteen children got one book as a keepsake. The second generation were still prosperous people, though less intellectual, and their religion deterioriated when the first preacher of the region died and was succeeded by a man of inferior education.

A third generation in the mountains was quite cut off from those sources of culture which had belonged to the pioneers. They began to find good land growing scarce and their agriculture had deteriorated in the years in which hunting had been a chief resource.

It was from such households as these that Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson sprang, and they are typical of the three million people who are still living in these antiquated conditions. No one needs a friendly interpreter more than the mountaineer!

A word about our figure—three million. This was the number of mountaineers whom Berea College listed in its first general survey of the region more than twenty years ago. In the interval, many whole counties have been transformed from the mountain condition and put in touch with the marching world. But meanwhile the steady increase of population has been going on in the mountains so that the mountain region which is still inaccessible, contains as many people as the larger area did a generation ago.

An inconsiderable observer stamps the mountain people as rude and lawless, but the truer analysis shows they are by no means a degenerate people, but a people simply not graded up. Their peculiarities of speech are honest survivals from their Saxon ancestry. The past tense of help will be holp, as in the old version of the Psalms—"Thou hast holpen thy servant Israel." The careful observer soon notes the Shakespearian diction among all classes. We are leaving our hospital cabin for a "preaching" and are impeded by the dogs that throng about the stile. The young man who is conducting us, if he were a Yankee, would exclaim in something of a nasal twang, "Get out!" but he is not a Yankee, but a true Shakespearian survival, and with the utmost gravity he says "Begone!"

A Unique Sort of Entertainment.

The same night we are entertained by a magistrate in the far famed Breathitt County. The farm mansion consists of two rooms and there is only one lamp; but the housewife has resources. From the table she takes a large iron spoon and thrusts its handle in a chink of the chimney-piece. She then fills the bowl of the spoon with grease, twists a rag and places it in the grease and lights that rag with a splinter from the fire; and with this flambo we eat our supper of cornbread, string beans, pork, chicken, stack-pie, honey, sweet and Irish potatoes, preserves and hot wheat biscuit.

Now the educational and religious problem before one who attempts to befriend our cousins in the mountains is a remarkable one. We cannot go to these kinsmen of ours as missionaries, or impose upon them an outside and alien civilization such as now prevails in northern towns. Rather, there must be a development of those virile seeds which are already in their hearts and social life. In a word, our task is to lead them in one generation, or in two, through those steps of progress which our families have traversed in six or seven generations.

Berea College now has students in attendance from all the eight states, more than one hundred making their way from North Carolina. Every term students are called out of school to testify in court cases which illustrate all the rudeness and simplicity of mountain life. This winter more than a hundred were late in reaching school because they were detained by the rise of unbridged streams!

Their response to our efforts, as soon as we make ourselves understood, is most encouraging. We send "extension workers" with tents and wagons in summer through the remote counties, and count among our important forces a small army of teamsters and traveling men who, though wearing none of the appearance of "school men," are really missionaries of education and progress and enterprise through the regions which they traverse. We attempt the unusual task of providing for the total educational needs, with industrial work, a normal department in which a majority of the students are young men and other large adjuncts, in addition to the standard collegiate work.

The majority of our students go without tea, coffee, and butter, in order to reduce the price of board to $1.35 a week. Many must stay out during the fall term to teach school, and others during the spring term to work on the mountain farms. We are anxious to shelter as large a company as possible, because we can only affect this vast impenetrable region by the force of numbers. Half a dozen students returning to a backwoods county will naturally be submerged by the momentum of surrounding customs. But if we can send back thirty or forty they will change those conditions.

The value of such a population in the heart of the South is at once apparent. In this transition time, when we are deluged by emigration, it is good to find a great mass of Protestant American people who are still rearing large families and leading a comparatively simple life. They have their faults which are different from our faults, but they have the basal qualities in which we believe. As Woodrow Wilson said, "They are a part of the original stuff out of which America was made!" They are already overflowing from their mountains and exerting an ever-increasing influence in the South. If they can be kept from contaminating forces (Mormonism for example), and the corrupting influences which often go with mines and lumber camps, they will not only be brought over from the ranks of the doubtful classes, but will be surely ranged with those who may be counted upon for assistance in every good cause. If Berea, the American Missionary Association and other agencies can shelter and instruct a sufficient number of their sons and daughters now they will take the mountain problems off our hands in the next generation.

Missionary Statesmanship

How Missionary Leaders Are Becoming Wiser

By Wm. Remfry Hunt, F. R. G. S.

The impression grows apace and is expressed in the world's magazines and generally in the press that missions are growing wiser. There is a saner tone in the distinctly missionary periodicals. It is the promise of a more beneficial influence which, being exerted among the business men of the world, bids fair to put a new momentum into the business of missions. Under Lord Elgin's regime in India missions advanced in the ratio of their wise adaptation and adjustment to the peculiar settings of the environment. It has taken ten decades in Asia to convince some of the leaders of missions that there is such a thing as a psychological climate. Missions acclimate normally. It was so in the early days of religious propaganda in the Roman Empire. History is a serious and unrelenting judge. So it is that modern missions need to study the evolution of mission fields, and to analyze the facts and forces that have worked best and with the minimum cost produced the most salutary results.

The Continuation Committee of the World's Missionary Conference, held in Edinburgh in 1910, aims to be representative and catholic in its personnel as in its programme. It received the carefully edited reports of eight commissions, whose secretaries had gone into inner and outer sides of missions with practical common sense, and aided by the views of experts in the diplomatic and merchant service. The range, variety, and tremendous importance of the work of the Continuation Committee has made imperative the visit of the able chairman of the movement in the person of Dr. John R. Mott, whose itinerary in China covers the widest and most strategic area.

It is evident that the most comprehensive policy is to be pursued. Its charter is guaged to maintain in prominence the idea of the World's Missionary Conference as a means of coordinating missionary work, and of laying sound lines for future development, and of claiming by corporate action fresh stores of spiritual force for the evangelization of the world. Dr. Mott faces his duty as chairman with all seriousness, and has succeeded in enlisting the attention of some of the greatest business men of the world to the reasonableness of the programme to at least evangelize the world within the present generation. In the words of this modern apostle of the science of missions, the very evolution of missions and the development of the larger missionary statesmanship—in other words the perfection of the human plans, methods and agencies—will reveal as no other process the absolute insufficiency of man, even of the most effective and comprehensive combinations of men, and will give a realizing sense of the indispensable need at every point in the missionary enterprise of a wisdom, a leadership, and an energy far more than human.

The one growing and insistent idea in the great mission fields of the earth has been for some decades in the direction of unifying interests. Missions, disunited, sectarian, with local findings and creedal bindings, have utterly failed to impress the awakened masses in the provinces. In the face of the unique changes that have come over China coterminous with the present political renaissance, and of the expressed desire of the student bodies in the nation to secure and adapt a new religion for the people, anything less than harmonized, co-related and unified forces would have been a diversion of wisdom and a wicked waste of force. The Bishop of Oxford stated the conditions tritely, when he said, speaking of the valuable results of mutual coöperation between the various forces at work, "It is important to preserve the atmosphere in which men loathe to differ and determine to understand." The economy and common sense requirements of the business of missions demand that its problems and activities be henceforth treated as problems are treated in applied science. When this day fully dawns the wealthy laity and the merchant princes of the world will give their financial and moral support to missions and expect of its business the issues commensurate with the confidence so reposed in the same.

The Continuation Committee will continue to select its experts in the science of missions, paying special attention to the delicate questions arising in the political conditions in Asiatic countries. This is the ground where angels might fear to tread, but fools would flurry in and write up its apparent flush of achievements before even the first wise adjustments had been made. He is a wise man who can keep his head in the flush of victory and stand well on his feet when reverses come. An occasional glance at the leaders and notes in the modern native press shows at once that missions are on trial as well as on exhibition. The moment is a decisive one. Leadership without egoism, zeal controlled with restraint, care exercised to consider all opportunities and at the same time to discriminate between mushrooms and blighted fungus, these may sum up not a few of the essential prerequisites of success in the missionary enterprise. We congratulate Dr. Mott and Dr. Campbell Gibson upon the wide and deep impression that their conferences with the business men of Shanghai and other important commercial centers has not only upon these places, but upon the most thoughtful po leaders in Asia. Some of the best plans for an advance n ment embrace language schools for the new missionaries, mittees on education, medical missions, expert evangelistic m ods, a new attitude to the child-problem in mission fields, in a word the sanest and best which will ensure the realization the aims and hopes of the business of missions.

The Church's Business

Religious Education Head Says It Is To Preach Love

By Shailer Mathews

[In this recent expression of the President of the Religious Education Association, it will be noticed that there is no talk of numbers, or methods, or organization, but of the purely inner need of churches.—The Editors.]

The supremacy of the spiritual order is the fundamental idea of the church. The church sets forth the elements of the spiritual order and then tries to get those elements to operate in our life. The church is fundamentally more than an ethical orphan asylum. It is an institution trying to socialize the spiritual ideals of Jesus.

Among these ideals the giving of justice, rather than the getting of justice—or, in other words, love—is the most important. What other institution is there which is trying to teach men to give justice rather than to obtain it? The church insists on giving justice or on sacrifice. It does not preach sacrifice as an end in itself, but simply because it is necessary for society.

Individuals in the churches must practice this and the churches must minister to the social needs. Anything really fundamental, service which a social settlement, a civic center or any philanthropic organization can render, a church can render, but the main business of the church is not to ameliorate conditions; the important task is to educate men to a realization that this betterment is necessary.

Jesus, properly understood, is the cornerstone of the church. We are in the midst of a great process. Which way are we going? Speaking in terms of evolution, we have first the vegetable and the lower animal order. Later we have the present human order. Is this the end of the process, or is there to be another step forward to a spiritual order? Has the relentless process ended?

A spiritual order doesn't necessarily mean a dual universe. It doesn't commit one to dualism or to monism. It simply outlines great motives and makes their appeal to men. Here are the great motives of faith, honor, altruism. Does an animal experience them? Does an animal have any motive which is not the product of some immediate want? Does it have any faith or honor?

These qualities are not dominant. Arrayed against them are the great motives of the time, the desire for gain, the appetites. Which is to conquer? At this point again I repeat that no other organization except the church is urging love, the giving of justice, among men.

The church must have God, because without God the universe is impersonal and less than man. We can't treat the universe as impersonal; it may be super-personal. When we say we must have God in the universe, we mean that reason and purpose are universal. The fact that here and there we can read the purpose of the universe, that the relations can be expressed in the mathematical laws of the scientists, is one of the bases of the faith that God is in the universe. If we look at the world from the point of view of the injustices which now bind men as in the lines of William Vaughn Moody:

> God, dear God! Does she know her port,
> Though she goes so far about?
> Or blind astray, does she make her sport
> To brazen and chance it out?

things seem very bad, but the Christian believes that God, the creator, is, like Jesus, a God of Love.

The Object of Supreme Desire

From The Presbyterian Examiner.

God is the object of supreme desire, as well as the ground of religious security. Out of everything which has not God in the heart of it or at the root of it, the charm is gone as soon as one's nature falls completely under the influence of the cross of Christ. After the objects of secular desire a worldly heart pants, not because in it tastes something of Him who is the former and the giver of them all, but for their own poor sakes alone. It pants after created good because it has lost the better—the best of all—which is God Himself. That ceases by degrees when God begins to fling around the heart the net of His own love. Then that only will please which is His and is seen to be His; that which He made for us to enjoy and which comes to us from His hand; only that in which the soul descries a little of His own goodness. Just in the proportion in which God is discerned in little things desirable are they to be desired by the perfect love of God. It is a small matter to say that this robs impure pleasures of their fascination. It makes far better things than these seem poor and unattractive in comparison of holier joys. All things lovable fall sorts after a new standard of value. Whatever fair or sweet things of the earth can be linked with His dear name who is the soul's chief good, especially whatever wins in him the promise of an eternal worth, that borrows from the cross a tenderer grace and touches in the devout heart a holier joy. Thus it comes about that while on all things evil Christ's blood is set for a brand, that the soul may think from them in horror, on all things good it rests for a consecration, that the saints may find in them a keener, if a soberer gladness.

Perhaps it may signify yet more, this glorifying in the cross. Meanwhile, God our Saviour is to be to us the chief object of desire, in whom all other good and perfect things delight us. More and more must He not become to those who know Him the satisfaction of desire and the object of their proud possession? By and by, long after the possessions of the world have passed out of use or memory, shall not this sole treasurer abide for the imperishable heritage of the saints—the love of Him who died for love? When a day comes in which all that this world holds precious shall have lost its value, nothing will be left for any of us to be proud of save only this: that He is ours who on the cross laid down His life to win us for His own. O proud soul that hath learned to glory in the cross of Jesus Christ!

"Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? . . . I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

The State and Religion

By W. O. Thompson, Pres. Ohio University.

Speaking from the standpoint of the State I should say that there has been a steady drift of thoughtful public sentiment toward a recognition of the importance of religion and the State's vital interest in the religious development of society. Students are simply one section of this society, temporarily separated from the ordinary conditions and brought under the jurisdiction of the State for educational purposes. There is no good reason why, during this period, the State should be indifferent to the religious development of these younger members of society. It is equally true that the State will not actively engage in the propaganda of any form of religious belief, nor will it in any way be associated with denominational religious activities. The State is comprehensive enough to recognize the freedom of religion but has never taken the position of antagonism toward it. The Ordinance of 1787 in saying that religion was essential to good government declares the fundamental principle which has obtained throughout the Northwest Territory. We are now recognizing the legitimate fruit of that sentiment and declare that the State is interested in the religious development of its citizens.

From this position it is easy to see that the State will not take an attitude of antagonism to the Church. The separation of Church and State does not mean the antagonism of either toward the other. It ought to mean co-operative helpfulness without any partisan entanglement. There is no good reason, therefore, why the citizens of the State co-operating for the purpose of education, should not be as legitimately under the care and jurisdiction of the church for religious purposes, as the same people would be in other relations. In a plain, business-like way, therefore, the State universities recognize that their students are legitimately the field for religious endeavor on the part of the several churches. The university would not take any partisan interest in these religious movements, but it surely could not justify itself in taking an attitude of hostility toward religious movements for the betterment of the students. The field of American students, therefore, is hospitably open for such voluntary religious work as the churches may support.

Work is a guardian angel. Work turns the wilderness into a garden. Work does sometimes what even love cannot do; roots a man firmly in his place in the world and gives him the blessed sensation: This plot of ground in the wide immensity of earth was meant for me to grow in.—Robert Hichens.

If you are unhappy, it is probably because you have so many thoughts about yourself and so few about the happiness of others. —Mary Lyon.

Three Book Reviews

THE DAY OF THE COUNTRY CHURCH, by J. O. Ashenhurst. Funk & Wagnalls Co., New York.

The rural church faces some difficult adjustments to changed conditions just as the city church does. It is fortunate that our social students have turned their attention to this problem as well as to the problem of the city church. The book deals with the methods and ideals that should be found in the country. Especially fine is the chapter on the "Rural Prophet," where the ideal is set forth for a real career on the part of the country minister. Probably no one thing so hinders the country church as the fact that there are but few country ministers. Most of the ministers come out from towns to sell the labor of one day in seven, engaging in secular work the rest of the time. We welcome this volume as an invitation to think upon one of our urgent ecclesiastical problems.

SOCIOLOGICAL STUDY OF THE BIBLE, by Louis Wallis. University of Chicago Press, $1.68 postpaid.

One of the significant results of recent Bible study has been to make clear that it is far easier to interpret the book from the standpoint of theology. Even so conservative a writer as Davison says there is no theology of the Old Testament, properly speaking. The books treating the theology of the New Testament treat the theologies of the New Testament writers. When one approaches the Bible with the social interest, it is clear to him that social forces are to the fore from first to last. Louis Wallis finds the key to the Old Testament history in the mishpat struggle. This was a contest between primitive and advanced types of life over government and the ideals of social justice. It is shown that though the prophets espouse the cause of the common people, the Jews in the end reject the social question. Jesus espouses the cause of social justice but his point of view was rejected by both Catholics and Protestants. The history is traced up to the modern social awakening. The work is carefully and scientifically done and will repay the study of all those with social interest.

PURE FOODS, by John C. Olsen. Ginn & Company, Boston.

The values of the various kinds of foods are but little known by most people. This book shows the nourishing qualities of the different foods and in these days of the high cost of living helps in the selection of the right diet. The care and preparation of the different foods are discussed. Especially valuable are the chemical tests by which the presence of the various adulterants may be detected.

Will Study Missions in Egypt

(The following item which is clipped from the Philadelphia North American, gives an interesting sidelight on the development of missionary enthusiasm among strong laymen. Mr. George C. Shane, a grain merchant of Philadelphia, and a member of the United Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, pays his own expenses on a mission study trip to Egypt.)

George C. Shane, a well-to-do layman of the United Presbyterian Church in this city, will sail early Wednesday morning for Egypt and Palestine to study the mission fields.

The trip will be made on his own responsibility and he hopes to obtain material which will act as a stimulus to the simultaneous "every member canvass" to be made by the church for increased contributions to benevolences.

Mr. Shane, who is secretary of the Shane Brothers & Wilson Company, grain and flour dealers in this city, will be accompanied by the Rev. Dr. Thomas C. Pollock, also of this city, who will go as Mr. Shane's guest.

On his arrival in the mission fields Mr. Shane will send cablegrams telling of present-day conditions as he finds them, and these will be used as arguments in carrying on the canvass. The trip will include Syria, Egypt and the Egyptian Soudan as well as Palestine, and it is likely that it will be extended to India before the travelers turn their faces homeward. The United Presbyterian Church has a strong organization in India, and the leaders there will make an effort to get Mr. Shane to visit them.

One of the features of the trip to be taken by the two men will be a shower of "steamer letters" which will be given to them from all parts of the country. About 800 letters, telling of the trip have been sent to members of the denomination by George Innes, association secretary of the board of foreign missions. Many of the letters were sent to members of the church in this city.

"Mr. Shane is impressed with the opportunity that is before the church now," said Mr. Innes recently. He has felt for some time that it would be a great thing if people could appreciate more deeply just what the task is. He has been studying missions himself for the last few years, and has decided to go to Egypt to see the bottom of this thing.

"Mr. Shane is going on his own initiative. He is not a member of the board or an officer in the church at all, and neither the board nor the church is bearing any part of his expense, so he is perfectly free to write and speak as he thinks."

From Near and Far

The joint conference of the Methodist Protestant church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, which has just been in session at Columbus, O., unanimously adopted a basis of union for the two churches, forming a new denomination to be known as the United Protestant Church. The report of the commissioners must be ratified by the general conferences of their respective churches before it becomes effective. A new creed was adopted, constructed out of the old doctrines put in modern language. With the act of union, the membership of the new church will become 500,000. Other denominations which have signified their intention of joining will bring the total membership up to 1,000,000, according to the commissioners.

One hundred speakers representing twenty-five denominations in the United States, Canada, Australia, England, China, Japan and India, will furnish the programme for the twenty-sixth international Christian Endeavor convention, to be held in Los Angeles July 9 to 14. It is expected 20,000 delegates will attend. Because no hall is large enough to accommodate all the delegates the convention leaders representing the commercial and religious interests of Los Angeles have leased Fiesta Park, covering a city square, and will roof it over with a canvas covering, making two large auditoriums. The auditoriums of twenty churches will be used for the sectional and denominational meetings.

The headquarters committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America has announced that Columbus, Ohio, has been selected for the biennial convention and celebration of the twentieth anniversary of the organization to be held November 10 and 11. The event is expected to bring to that city 2,000 delegates from all parts of the United States. An extensive program on which will appear the leading temperance workers of America is being arranged. All religious congregations and temperance organizations will be asked to send representatives.

The parish of Trinity Church, often described as the wealthiest in the world, is now paying taxes on property valued at $15,171,024, an increase of nearly half a million during the year, according to figures given in a 500-page yearbook covering the activities of Trinity Church and the nine chapels of the parish. It is said to be the most voluminous yearbook ever printed by a church. Reports show that the church corporation now owns 366 houses in which between 3,000 and 4,000 persons are living.

A one-time fashionable residence on La Salle avenue, Chicago, has been leased by the trustees of Moody Church and converted into a home for working girls.

"We plan to give the lonely young woman of small means in Chicago a real home with every social advantage, surrounded with Christian influences," says Miss Content Patterson, president of the home.

"There are three classes of citizens," Vice-President Marshall said in a recent address on "The Modern Puritan," "those who respect the law for fear of punishment, those who obey the law because it is law and those who are true Christians and are automatically law-abiding. Without Christianity America could not live."

June 29 to July 6, 1913, is the date set for the second World's Christian Citizenship Conference, to be held in Portland, Oregon. The first convention of this kind to be held was in Philadelphia in 1910. A six-month campaign was inaugurated, resulting in the bringing together of thirty-five thousand delegates.

If one can keep sweetness of thought and calmness of poise when bitter and rebellious feelings press hard and close upon the tortured soul—that must be the victory of overcoming; that must hold its own reward, somewhere, by adding strong fiber to character. That is the time to remember, to the exclusion of complaint, that to be overcomers we must have something to overcome. Ay, and they must be hard things, which press severely on a weak point, in character or temperanment, in order that the weakest link in our chain may be fully tested.—Eliza M. H. Abbot.

I will try this day to live a simple, sincere and serene life; repelling promptly every thought of discontent, anxiety, discouragement, impurity and self-seeking; cultivating cheerfulness, magnanimity, charity and the habit of holy silence; exercising economy in expenditure, carefulness in conversation, diligence in appointed service, fidelity to every trust, and childlike trust in God.—J. H. Vincent.

Isaiah has described personal influence on so grand a scale that it is not surprising that the Church has leaped to his words as a direct prophecy of Jesus Christ. They are indeed a description of him, of whose shadow advancing time has not been able to carry the children of men, who has been the shelter and strength of every generation since he was lifted up.—George Adam Smith.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

Divorce in England

A few months ago the Royal Commission, appointed to investigate the divorce laws of England, submitted a majority and minority report; this has drawn general attention to what George Meredith calls "the rough marriage laws" of that country.

The English marriage laws seem but a step removed from those of the Roman Catholic Church, which holds that marriage is a sacrament which cannot be dissolved. The English law acknowledges but one statutory ground for divorce, and that is adultery; a husband can secure a divorce from his wife, if it can be proven that she is unfaithful to him.

But the same law does not obtain for the woman as the man; in her case, there must be "coupled causes," as the phrase goes; she must not only prove infidelity on the part of her husband, but desertion and cruelty for a period of two years as well.

And these laws are not only more unjust to the woman than the man, but they are harder on the poor than the rich. The necessary legal proceedings and court costs are so expensive that none but the well-to-do can afford to be divorced.

Dickens on Divorce.

This is illustrated by Dickens in "Hard Times," when he tells the tragic story of a poor working man, Stephen Blackpool, who has been married for nineteen years to a depraved and drunken woman; when, finally, he goes in desperation to his employer to see if there is any way to be released from his intolerable bondage, he is told,

"You'd have to go to Doctor's Commons with a suit, and you'd have to go to a Court of Common Law with a suit, and you'd have to go to the House of Lords with a suit, and you'd have to get an Act of Parliament to enable you to marry again; and it would cost you from a thousand to fifteen hundred pounds."

No wonder the poor man, whose only living was his daily wage, said despairingly:

"Then I'd better be dead."

Another manifest injustice in these laws is the legal proof required. A divorce cannot be procured by the confession of the guilty party, and with the consent of both parties; there must be a third person as witness, otherwise, it is claimed, there may be collusion between the husband and wife to annul the marriage tie. John Galsworthy puts this phase of the law very concretely in his recent novel, "The Country House." A husband desires a divorce from his wife, who does not deny that she has been unfaithful to him; when a lawyer is consulted, he says:

"Two unhappy persons must not seem to agree to be parted. One must be believed to desire to keep hold of the other, and must pose as an injured person. There must be evidence of infidelity, and, in the case of the woman, of desertion and cruelty . . . . A woman must not ask for divorce because she is miserable and placed in a position that no woman should be placed in, but only, if she is offended in certain technical ways. To get a divorce (in England) you must be as hard as nails and as wary as a cat."

Bernard Shaw's Views.

Bernard Shaw, in his recent drama, "Getting Married," gives a brilliant study of the marriage laws of England, and reduces this law of evidence to an absurdity. An elderly Englishman finds that his young wife is unhappy; they agree to part, and he goes systematically to work to produce the required evidence. In order that she may be able to prove cruelty, he knocks her down on a flower bed in the garden—having previously removed all stones and sticks, so that she may have a soft place to fall in; he also plans for the gardener to be present, so as to have a witness. And then, to establish desertion and adultery, he arranges for a woman of the town to register with him at a hotel as his wife—loathing the whole proceeding as a clean man of unblemished character must.

How often English fiction and drama make these hard conditions their theme, every student of literature knows. In "Jane Eyre," the story turns on the indissoluble marriage of the hero to a woman whose vices have brought on violent and hopeless insanity. A somewhat similar situation is painted by Gertrude Atherton, in "Julia France and Her Times," where a young and innocent wife is in constant danger of her life from an insane husband. The unfortunate chapter in the lives of George Eliot and George Henry Lewes, two of the brightest lights in English literature, was brought about by these "rough marriage laws." Mr. Lewes could not secure a divorce from his wife, though there was every reason that he should.

Perhaps George Meredith has shown the injustice of these laws, especially to women, more often than any other of our novelists of today. His most thorough study is in "Diana of the Crossways," where a beautiful and blameless woman cannot secure legal divorce from a contemptible and unworthy husband, who has heaped every outrage and indignity on her in his power.

These examples might be multiplied many times, but lack of space forbids. But they are enough to show the need for a commission to study these laws, and advise changes in them.

The majority report of the commission recommended five new grounds for divorce: Desertion for three years, cruelty, incurable insanity after five years' duration, habitual drunkenness continuing for three years after the first order was entered, and imprisonment under commuted death sentence. They argued that where any of these five causes existed, marriage in any true sense was destroyed and the law should take cognizance of the fact. That sounds very reasonable.

The minority members, with true English conservatism, are in favor of leaving the law as it is. Make desertion a ground, they say, and many couples who have grown tired of each other, or whose fancies have strayed elsewhere, will separate by collusion. If you make cruelty a ground, you must include mental as well as physical suffering, and the wife whose husband scolds her because breakfast is late, will fly to a lawyer. With one accord, these minority members point to the United States, with their lax divorce laws and frequent divorces, as an awful warning to virtuous England.

Where the English Err.

It is strange that they always point to our country as an example of easy divorce, when they have a more thoroughgoing illustration so much nearer home. Norway has the freest divorce laws of any civilized country; if a husband and wife are agreed in their desire for divorce, they may have it, without any statement of reasons; but there must be a year of separation between the application and the final decree. And this is within the reach of the poor as well as the rich, for the maximum cost for all legal proceedings is twenty-five dollars. Conditions there go a long way to disprove the frequent assertion that easy divorce means frequent divorce, for the Norwegians have a very small per cent of it; in 1910 there were only 390 divorces out of 400,000 existing marriages, or a rate of about two and one-half per cent a year.

Perhaps we deserve all the contumely that is being thrust upon us, because of our high divorce rate; perhaps our laws are as much too lax as England's are too rigid, but I am not sure of it. At any rate I shall say something of our divorce record next week, and I hope to find some light in the picture of unrelieved gloom that is usually painted about it. I. W. H.

"The ideal life, the life of full completion, haunts us all. We feel the thing we ought to be beating beneath the thing we are," says Phillips Brooks. Sometimes its beating inspires us, and we strive to be our best and utmost; sometimes it irritates and discomforts us, because we want to be left in peace on a lower level with some sin we are unwilling to give up. But however it is—whether aspiration or conscience—so long as it will not let us rest, we know that it is the voice of God calling us to higher things. It is the "love that will not let us go."—Home Messenger.

Worldiness does not consist in distinct acts, nor in thoughts of transgression, but it is the spirit of a whole life, which hides all that is invisible, real, and eternal, because it is devoted to the visible, the transient and the unreal. Christ and the world cannot exist in the same heart. Men who find their all in the world—how can they, fevered by its business, excited by its pleasures, petrified by its maxims, see God in his purity, or comprehend the calm radiance of eternity?—F. W. Robertson.

Plant patience in the garden of thy soul!
The roots are bitter, but the fruits are sweet;
And when, at last, it stands a tree complete,
Beneath its tender shade the burning heat
And burden of the day shall lose control—
Plant patience in the garden of thy soul!

—Henry Austin.

"James Russell Lowell says truly: 'The first lesson of life is to burn out our own smoke—that is, not to inflict on outsiders our personal sorrows and petty morbidness, not to keep thinking of ourselves as exceptional cases.' Have we learned that lesson?"

Disciples Table Talk

East End, Pittsburg, Prospers.

When the present pastor, John Ray Ewers, came to the East End Church, Pittsburg, four years ago, there was a membership of 278. With fifteen more, there will be just twice as many—556. In the four months of January, February, March and April there were fifty-three new members received into the fellowship. In these four months there were only two Sundays without decisions for Christ. Since last autumn seventy-six new members have been received and this in spite of the fact that the minister spent the month of November in Kansas City, where eighty-six were added to the church. Mr. Ewers attributes this success to the fact that he has a working membership. A series of six Wednesday evening studies of the Social Teachings of Jesus was carried through April. The following themes were discussed: Mar. 26—"What Jesus Taught About the Family;" April 2—"What Jesus Taught About Social Life;" April 9—"What Jesus Taught About Politics and Property;" April 16—"What Jesus Taught About the Dynamics of Reform;" April 23—"What Jesus Taught About Himself as the Answer;" April 30—"What Would Jesus Think of the Modern Church?" By request these lectures were repeated on Friday noons before a luncheon class at the Central Y. M. C. A., Pittsburg.

E. L. Powell as Louisville's Mayor.

"That there will be a fusion or citizens' ticket of some kind in the field at the November election in Louisville, and that this ticket will be supported by practically the solid Republican vote, 80 per cent or more of the Progressive vote and a large element of Independents and Democrats, is now believed to be certain, and the movement is only halted because of a failure so far to agree upon a candidate for Mayor to lead the fight." So does the "Evening Post," Louisville, sum up the political situation in that city. "In connection with this movement toward fusion," this paper continues, "which almost every one believes in the end will take definite shape, the name of E. L. Powell, pastor of the First Christian Church, is being mentioned as frequently as any other for head of the ticket, and candidate for Mayor. Dr. Powell is in no sense a candidate and the men back of the fusion movement, many of whom are considering Dr. Powell's name, realize that his services could only be secured by some spontaneous movement in the city which would appeal to him as a call for public duty. On the other hand, it is known that Dr. Powell is intensely interested in the problems of city government, and many of his friends say that the work of Mayor of Louisville would appeal to him very strongly." The Courier-Journal, of Louisville, is advising Mr. Powell, editorially, not to accept the nomination, should it be offered him. In connection with this news item the following from a recent address of Mr. Powell on "Smokestacks and Religion," is of interest. Appealing to the business men of the city the preacher said: "You shall help to bring in for this city of ours a praise higher than that of being the 'Gateway of the South;' you shall help to bring in the day when a city in the way it conducts business, in the way it administers its civic affairs, shall be the pacificator between cities and cities, and lands and lands. I know of no city that is trying harder to do this; I know of no city the majority of whose activities are along ethical lines and social lines; I know of no city seeking an inter-penetrating business with the very spirit of Christian service, and in so doing, my brethren and friends, we are making true the declaration of the old prophet that righteousness exalteth a nation and sin is a reproach to any people, and, furthermore, it is industrial suicide. Smokestacks and religion are the best way to boost a city. Isn't it true that religion broadly constructed, the religion of the temple and of the synagogue and of the church, is foundationally the sine qua non of material prosperity?"

S. H. Zendt on "The System."

"What is Wrong With the System?" was the theme of S. H. Zendt's second sermon of his series on "Why People Do not Attend Church," at Second Church, Bloomington, Ill. "Many people of generations past have not attended church—have given religion no essential place in their lives. We have laid a part of the blame on the preacher, some on the church, some on the people. But it is not all dispensed. We lay the remainder on that impersonal, much-criticised force sometimes designated 'The System.' We are all subject to the influences of environment. Some are its victims, others its masters. But whether masters or victims we cannot evade or destroy its influences. They are beginning to receive the social attention they deserve. Divers phases there are of the system. The first is the commercial. We use the system as including present business as organized and carried on—the laws recognized and obeyed in its program." Other phases of "The System" treated were "social extremes," "bad politics," "false standards of dress and social life." Insisting on active relations with the church in spite of "The System," Mr. Zendt declared that "In the early ages of the church the believers came in touch with a system vastly worse than any known in our day. They loved their lives not unto the death. They believed that contending with evil gave them moral fibre. They did not seek a path of no resistance. Nor have any prophets foretold a time of ease. 'In the world ye shall have tribulation' is the Master's prediction. 'The System' is to be faced, understood and its influences overcome."

Des Moines Church Observes Birthday.

Throughout the month of May, at the University Place Church of Christ, C. S. Medbury, pastor, is being celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its birth. Every Sunday during the month emphasis will be placed upon the anniversary celebration and on May 25 the celebration will be brought to a climax in a great Homecoming day. The University Place Church of Christ was organized June 24, 1888. At that time 300 members of the Central Christian Church detached themselves from that institution and established the University Place Church. Since then the church has passed through rapid periods of growth until it has now the largest church and Sunday-school membership in the city. A personal touch with every member of the church is to be the ideal of the anniversary month. Every Sunday will be a recognition day. Competition for a good attendance record is to be instituted and the church will strive to set a new standard in attendance and promptness in arriving at the services. The children of the church are to be brought into the church services by placing emphasis on the family unit. Parents and their families will be urged to sit together, particularly in the morning services. The parents will be encouraged, too, to attend the Bible School with their children. Every Sunday will have a special programme bearing upon the observance of the anniversary. May 25 is announced as "the great day of the feast." Word will be sent to many not now members of the congregation asking them to attend the homecoming day services. In the afternoon a great union communion service of all congregations in the city will be held. The "reminiscence hour" promises to be one of the most interesting features of the meeting. The day will also be decision day and a special appeal will be made to secure confessions of faith in Christ. The programme of the month as announced by the pastor is as follows: May 4—10:30 a. m.: Sermon subject, "The Church and the Individual." 12 m.: Joint session of adult and chapel departments of the Bible School. 7:30 p. m.: Special praise service; Rossini's "Stabat Mater," by chorus and orchestra. May 11—10:30 a. m.: Sermon subject, "The Church and the Home." 12 m.: Bible School. 7:30 p. m.: Sermon subject, "Current Events in Relation to the Kingdom of God." May 18—10:30 a. m.: Sermon subject, "The Church and the Community." 12 m.: Bible School. 7:30 p. m.: Sermon subject, "The Mission of the Disciples of Christ." May 25—Special anniversary services. Homecoming day. 10:30 a. m.: Sermon subject, "The Church and the World—Decision Day." 12 m.: Bible School. 3 p. m.: Union communion service and reminiscence hour; letters from former pastors and others related to early work will be read. 7:30 p. m.: Closing service; musical programme by the chorus.

B. A. Abbott on "Peace."

Many of the St. Louis ministers followed the Peace Conference which closed, May 4, in that city, with sermons on the subject of peace. B. A Abbott of the Union Avenue Church had some interesting things to say. "Jesus' doctrine of non-resistance," he declared, "has been very much misunderstood. What he really taught was to resist evil, but to do it with spiritual forces—that is, with reason, love, truth, right. Christianity's way is to overcome evil with good. I dare say there is not a national or personal problem in existence so vexing that it cannot be settled without even estrangement if all parties concerned will seek to find the right and not try to gain a selfish victory over one another." "The central doctrine of Christianity is the cross. This means to suffer rather than do wrong. It is not belief in the cross as a theological dogma that saves us, but the practicing of it as the dynamic of life. It means to set out to conquer the world by suffering love instead of by proud power."

Evansville Church Dedicates.

Bethany Christian Church, Evansville, of which L. F. Drash is minister, dedicated its new building on Columbia street April 20. G. L. Snively leading in the dedication services. This church began as a Sunday-school mission in 1891, while Neil MacLeod ministered at First Church. A three room cottage was soon erected to house the school. In 1897, Bethany Church was organized with a membership of fifteen. The old church building was erected in 1898-99, being dedicated by C. R. Scoville, who also held a meeting at that time, bringing in a membership of 250. In 1897, W. A. Bellamy was called as pastor, serving for five years, and being succeeded by Allen T. Shaw, who served for one year. L. F. Drash was called in 1905, and still ministers to this field. The first step toward the new church was ten years ago, when three lots were purchased for $2,300.

Good Singing A Power in Church Work

HALLOWED HYMNS NEW AND OLD

Edited by IRA ALLAN SANKEY,

Will demonstrate the book's value in YOUR SERVICES.

Grant L. Bice, Sec. Treas. N. Y. S. S. S. A., Albany, says: "I have examined Hallowed Hymns and I believe them to be of great value to all departments of Sunday-school work and would recommend their use. The best of the old songs are found in this book as well as the new ones. The songs are all singable and bring forth the gospel story in a way that reaches the hearts of all.

"One of the most important features of an up-to-date Sunday-school is good singing."

R. G. Frank "Dissects" Judas' Soul.

Speaking on "Judas Iscariot," in the evangelistic services being held at First Church, Sedalia, Mo., R. G. Frank asked the question, "Why was Judas selected by Christ?" "Three answers have been given to this question," he declared. "First, he was chosen because Christ wanted to have all possible human experiences and hence needed a false friend among his Apostles. Second, he was chosen for the deliberate purpose of having him carry out a previously determined plan. Both of these seem to be too wooden, too mechanical. I think God never thus sets the stage for himself and then acts a part on it. A better reason seems to be that he was chosen in the hope that the evil tendencies of his nature might be overcome and he be made into a good man. None of the Apostles was perfect. Judas may have been no worse than others in the beginning."

Church Becoming Uplift Center.

That the church is coming to be, even more than in past years, a center for the promotion of uplift movements is illustrated every day. It is interesting to note from a few newspaper clippings, the following items: (1) That "the most inspiring audience ever gathered in Warrensburg, Mo.), was assembled at the Christian Church in answer to the call of the Civic Improvement League." (2) That "the Leavenworth branch of the International Anti-White Slave Association was perfected at a very enthusiastic meeting at the First Christian Church," in that city. (3) That Mr. Joseph B. Bates, editor of the Bloomington (Ill.) Pantagraph, addressed an audience that filled the large auditorium of the First Christian Church, on the topic, 'Birds of My Boyhood.' The occasion was under the auspices of the Audubon Society and the Woman's Improvement League."

Bloomington, Ill., Pastor Resigns.

Milo Atkinson, for three years pastor of the Centennial Church, Bloomington, has announced his resignation from that field. Mr. Atkinson is to take up religious work elsewhere, but has not yet made a statement regarding his plans. The resignation becomes effective August 31. Mr. Atkinson came to the Illinois field from Covington, Ky., where he enjoyed a successful pastorate of 1,000 members. While in Bloomington, he has been honored in many ways, having served one year as president of the Central Illinois Christian Ministerial Association. During Mr. Atkinson's pastorate at Bloomington offerings for the local work have been doubled, while gifts to missions have shown even a greater increase. In addition the original building fund has been reduced from $12,500 to $4,000. The Centennial Boys' Club and the Primary Mothers' Circle have had marked development during the past three years.

J. H. Craig, formerly of Logansport, Ind., has begun his work in the Troy, N. Y., church with much encouragement and enthusiasm on the part of the entire membership. The audiences are steadily growing in numbers, especially the evening audiences, which, in this neighborhood, are difficult to maintain. A reception was tendered Mr. and Mrs. Craig April 30, with between four hundred and five hundred in attendance. Mr. Craig lost in the Indiana floods a very valuable library and most of his furniture, which had been stored in Logansport preparatory to moving. At the reception the church presented Mr. and Mrs. Craig with a purse of gold of $120 to assist them in replacing needed household goods.

G. W. Alford, pastor of the South Hutchinson, Kan., church, was elected president of the district association, which was in session at Stafford, late in April. The other officers elected are: J. E. Raines, Macksville, vice president; J. T. Sapp, Stafford, secretary and treasurer; John H. Connaughton, Kingman, superintendent of Sunday-school work; D. F. Cross, Greensburg, superintendent of C. E. work; C. D. Purlee, Stafford, delegate to state convention; E. A. Taylor, Kingman, alternate. Anthony was selected as the place of holding the convention next year.

At the district convention held at Lawton, Okla., April 24, 25, A. R. Spicer, of Lawton, was chosen president for the coming year. Other officers chosen are: W. W. Phares, Anadarko, vice president; Mrs. D. E. Heacock, Waurika, secretary; C. R. Donart, Altus, treasurer. Resolutions were adopted during the session strongly endorsing Governor Cruce's stand in the fight for "clean legislation," giving special mention to the anti-gambling bill and Sunday closing statute. The 1914 convention will be held at Hobart.

J. M. Barnes, one of Montgomery, Ala.'s best known ministers and educators, died at his home in Cloverdale April 28, the result of injuries received in an automobile accident. He was 77 years old and was a graduate of Bethany College. For many years he taught school, after which he entered the ministry. For a number of years he was pastor of the church on Catoma street, but lately confined his work principally to the factory district in West End.

The annual convention of the churches of the Third District of Missouri was held in Greenfield, Mo., May 5, 6 and 7. Mrs. J. R. Blunt, superintendent of the Junior Congregation of the South Joplin Christian Church, was one of the most important speakers on the programs. Mrs. Blunt told of the work of the Junior Congregation of which she has charge. This congregation is the second largest in the world and is steadily growing.

The following officers were elected at the close of the three-day session of the southwest Iowa District Convention, held at Logan, Iowa: President, W. A. Crewdson, Logan; vice-president, F. D. Ferrell, Shenandoah; corresponding secretary, Edgar Price, Council Bluffs; superintendent of Sunday-school work, T. D. Corbet, Cumberland; superintendent of Christian Endeavor, C. B. Biglow, Henderson.

Included in the annual report of the church at Anaheim, Cal., C. A. Moore, pastor, are the following facts and figures: increase in enrollment, 100 per cent; sermons preached, 108; calls made, 780; number of additions, 42; net gain for the year, 39; present resident membership, 72; money raised, $17.40 per capita for every man, woman and child of the congregation; $2.65 per capita for missions and benevolence.

Henry W. Hunter, pastor at Higginsville, Mo., was ill and out of his pulpit during April. He is at his work again. The churches of Higginsville will enter into a union evangelistic meeting with Dr. Lincoln McConnell as evangelist. This meeting will run through the entire month of May. The Christian churches of Lafayette County met at Higginsville, recently and organized for better work.

Walter M. White, pastor at Cedar Rapids, Ia., said in a recent sermon that the best way to fight Sunday baseball is for the employers to give their employes a holiday one afternoon a week. Mr. White is an admirer of the national game, and is striving to put it on a clean basis in his town. His sermon was heard by several members of the city council and other officials.

R. L. McQuary, pastor of the Tecumseh, Ia., church, has been granted a scholarship at Yale University. In exchange for the scholarship he will give three years to religious work in the slums of New Haven. Mr. McQuary will graduate from Cotner University, Bethany, Neb., in June, and enter Yale in the fall.

The congregation at Allison, Ill., (Lawrence Co.) is rejoicing in the fact that J. E. Moyer is now giving them full time service. A parsonage is being erected in appreciation of his work. A remarkable feature of all this is that the Allison Church is a country church, being seven miles from any town.

I. J. Spencer, pastor of the Central Church, Lexington, Ky., has just returned from a tour of the Mediterranean and the oriental countries upon its shores. He visited Egypt, Greece, Turkey, Italy, Spain, France and England but reports that he found the greatest interest in his journeyings through Palestine.

At the meeting of the congregation of the First Church, Norfolk, Va., Sunday morning, April 20, Dr. Bernard Walker was made an Elder Emeritus of the congregation. W. B. East and J. G. Holladay were made life directors of the Foreign Missionary Society. R. E. Steed presided at the meeting.

T. H. Capp, pastor at King Hill, Mo., has been notified by the executive committee of the National Reform Association, which met recently in Pittsburg, Pa., that he has been selected to represent his community at the annual convention of the association in Portland, Ore., June 29 to July 6.

The Sunday-school of the University Place Church of Christ won state honors for highest attendance during the month of February. This school had an average attendance of 849 scholars. The Central Church, Des Moines, came second, with 613. A Methodist church of that city came third.

At the annual convention of Second District, Ia., which met at Burlington, May 7-9, the following were some of the speakers: J. D. Zimmerman, Davis Owen, Geo. E. Lyon, H. J. Corwine, C. A. Finch and Mrs. J. E McDaniel, all of Topeka; J. T. Shreve, Ottawa, and E. T. McFarland, Lawrence.

J. C. Creel, pastor at Princeton, Mo., observed with his congregation what he called Roll Call Day. The sermon subject at the morning service was "The Final Roll Call," and at the close of the service the names of members were read and responded to by scripture quotations.

A resolution was adopted by the congregation of the First Christian Church, St. Joseph, Mo., at the conclusion of the service April 27, authorizing the official board to arrange a plan for a campaign for a new church building on a lot owned by the congregation.

An interesting feature of the recent contest just closed between Walnut Street and Jackson Street churches, at Muncie, Ind., was a parade of men representing manufacturing concerns of the city, together with lodge organizations and the Travelers' Protective Association.

The Fifth District, Kentucky, held its convention May 8-10, at Shelbyville. Among the speakers were R. H. Crossfield, of Transylvania University; H. W. Elliot, State Secretary of Kentucky Missions, and Mrs. W. L. Beardsley, district C. W. B. M. superintendent.

The churches of the Third District, Kans., met in annual convention April 28-30, at Chanute, where G. G. Horne ministers. Among those on the program, were G. G. Horne, Chanute; Sam I. Smith, Pittsburg, and F. E. Mallory, Parsons.

A new church at Minneapolis, Minn., was dedicated May 11. This work is situated among about 100,000 Scandinavians, and will attempt to serve their religious needs. A two months meeting is now being conducted in this field by D. E. Olson.

On the program of the annual convention of Seventh District, Neb., held at Clay Center, the first week in May, were L. C. Oberlies, of Lincoln; William Oeschger, of Cotner University, and Mrs. Garst, of Des Moines, Iowa.

At a Sunday-school rally at the Central Church, Anderson, held April 27, an attendance of 971 is reported. The aim was 1,000. On April 28, the old members of the congregation held a reception in honor of the new ones.

C. M. Ridenour dedicated a $5,000 property May 4, at Eureka, Mont., where C. E. Cobbey is pastor. This church has been organized only two years. Mr. Ridenour is now conducting an evangelistic campaign.

A. B. Philputt, pastor of the Central Church, Indianapolis, delivered the ministerial lectures at Eureka College from April 29 to May 2. He also preached in the Eureka church each evening.

On the program of the district convention held at Conway Springs, Kan., were the following: O. L. Smith, Wellington; W. S. Priest, Wichita, and J. D. Zimmerman, Topeka.

Dr. B. A. Abbott, pastor of Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, will deliver the baccalaureate sermon for the graduating class of the Texas Christian University this year.

Chas. S. Early is now in his second meeting with the Hoxie, Kan., church. In June Mr. Early will be at Hill City, for his eighth meeting with that congregation.

The Indiana Sunday-school Convention of all religious bodies will be held in Evansville, early in June. The best Bible School specialists of the country will be present.

During the first quarter of this year the mid-week prayer meeting at Puyallup, Wash., was attended by one-fifth of the entire active membership of the church.

Athens, Ga., reports $15,000 raised by G. L. Snively for the new church building. Over $9,000 had been previously raised by Stanley R. Grubb, the minister.

The Sunday-school of the First Church, Atlanta, reports an attendance of 4,129. May 4, L. O. Bricker, the pastor had 1,282 in his adult class.

Edwin Priest, pastor at Ottumwa, Iowa, addressed the Y. M. C. A. of that city, April 27, on the theme, "Is Life Worth Living?"

Harold Bell Wright, of literary fame, recently addressed the Baraca class of young men in the Pomona, Calif., church.

The church at Webb City, Mo., is planning to auction off its old building and erect a new structure on the old lot.

The Central Christian school at Youngstown, is trying to reach 800. The attendance on a recent Sunday was 711.

The 1914 convention of the Fourth Kansas District will be held at El Dorado, where H. James Crockett ministers.

By the will of the late A. K. Moore, Franklin, N. H., the Disciples Church of that city will receive $5,000.

The Missouri State Convention will be held at Fulton June 16-19.

The South Idaho convention will be held at Rupert June 5-8.

The new building at Ardmore, Okla., is nearing completion.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointed by churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

Character-Building Literature

The greatest problem America is facing today is that of the right training of its young people. What is the key to the formation of character? Without doubt one key is CHARACTER-BUILDING LITERATURE. Every Sunday there are placed into waiting hands millions of pieces of literature of one sort or another. Is this literature CHARACTER-BUILDING? Or is it simply printed matter published to sell? Are pastors, superintendents and teachers giving adequate attention to the examination of literature used, and to a search for the best that's published? . . . In Memory

There are still living among us something like half a million men who have personal recollections of having worn blue clothing and carried guns in a war that was fought and finished nearly half a century ago. They do not stand as straight as they did then, and they carry canes instead of guns. Some of them carry crutches. One day in the year they put on the blue again, and they march as they did in other years.

No, not as they did in other years. One cannot see them march now, and remember how they marched in other years without a touch of emotion. They do not march as they did. They limp, and they do not carry guns. Things have changed.

Yonder in the seventeen states that smile toward the South are men who wore the gray. They are just as old and just as far from carrying guns. They too, have their memories.

One day in the year we devote to remembering the men who were boys fifty years ago. Some of them are old men now, and others lie beneath the flowers. The flowers are memories.

The nation has its memories. Fifty years is a long time, but the nation remembers. Still on May 30 it hears the beat of the drum. Again it hears the news that Fort Sumter has fallen and that Abraham Lincoln, no longer seeming to halt between two opinions, has called for seventy-five thousand troops for ninety days. Seventy-five thousand! What can he want with so many? Ninety days! Why should he need them so long? The nation remembers now how the ninety days became four years, and the seventy-five thousand became a million.

"We are coming, Father Abraham,
Three hundred thousand more!"

It was a jaunty song they sang, fifty years ago. The nation remembers it now with a chastened smile. Three hundred thousand and then other three hundred thousands marching in the wake of John Brown's soul!

It was two dead men who led the throng. One of them was hanged on a gallows in Virginia, and the other was whipped to death in a story book.

"Still through the conflict, up and down
Marched Uncle Tom and old John Brown;
One face, one form ideal;
And which was false and which was true,
And which was mightier of the two,
The wisest sybil never knew,
Since both alike were real."

They led the hosts, those two men who had died, the visionary and the slave who never was free. And when it became necessary to add a third name to these in the vision of those who led, it came in the martyrdom of Abraham Lincoln. The nation remembers that.

No more of bitterness; no more of strife. We are one nation with one flag. These men who line up next Friday and who try to stand straight when the commander calls "Attention!" are thinking no thoughts of bitterness. They have no hatred in their hearts. We can have memories without resentment. Our memories are flowers, not thorns. We plant no briars on any grave, north or south. We have flowers enough for both.

God is extravagant in the matter of flowers. When Beecher was asked why God made a hundred blossoms for every fruit, he answered that it signified the extravagant joy of God in the doing of beautiful things. God knew we needed flowers for memories as truly as for fruit. There are flowers enough, and the earth will grow more of them. Even cemeteries will grow flowers. They root well in holy dust and sacred memory.

Each home has its own memory days. There are days in life's calendar when we live our memories over again with God and those whom He has taken. Each heart knows its own memorial days.

The heart's memorial days are not the saddest days of life. A sorrow is on the way to comfort when it can be covered with flowers. Earth's bitterest sorrows are those which may not be buried.

Are the flowers ready?

Comrades, salute the dead!

An Enlarged Vision

While his disciples talked about eating, Jesus discoursed on the opportunity of service that was before him. They were probably uneasy because they were in the territory of Samaria. He was rejoicing that men were ready to hear his message. They had been taught to think in terms of religious prejudice. He thought in terms of human need and divine compassion. With him it was a question of ability and willingness to receive the truth. Popular judgments were set aside.

Enlargement of vision is what we all need. Class ideas are common to us all. The scholar often thinks he is discarding them when in fact he is merely amplifying them and discovering reasons for not taking into account truth that is distasteful to him. The minister may preach fervently upon the need of vision and rebuke his congregation for near-sightedness when he is the man whose work is most seriously hindered by a circumscribed view. The missionary secretary and the returned missionary have still to discover a few things that concern the evangelization of the world.

The gospel is being preached in many lands through the agency of many boards of missions. What shall be the relation of these boards to each other? What shall be taught to the converts concerning the church of Christ? These are questions which must be answered by the members of the churches in Christian countries. The boards represent the churches. They can do just what the churches allow them to do. It becomes therefore the duty of the individual disciple to have a world view. He cannot pronounce wisely upon the obligation of a missionary in China or India unless he looks at Christianity through eyes that have seen the whole world. Denominational pride is a good thing until it gets in the way of men and keeps them from doing their duty. The time has come when we must think as Christians and not as members of any particular body of Christians. What ought a Christian to do at this time? If we think as Disciples or Presbyterians or Methodists, we shall have a narrower vision than we ought to have.

What of the Negro? Is he to be just tolerated? Shall we turn him over to the tender care of the politician? We cannot get anywhere in our treatment of him if we simply think of him as a necessary evil. There must be men of vision who will show us what the Negro may be expected to do and how we can assist him to do his work. Men who despise him should not have the encouragement that comes from the knowledge that the nation does not know what to do with him. Instead of indulging in unkind criticism or sentimental laudation, we should try to discover his possibilities from those who know him best and have the deepest interest in him. The leaders of his own race are entitled to be heard in his behalf. His work should be studied in the light of his opportunities.

Are we satisfied with the condition of the churches in America? No one seems to be. But that is not enough. We must know what is to be done. Perhaps it is wise to have a modest program. To announce that we intend to turn the world upside down may mean that we are trouble makers. But there are several things we can do if we have a mind to work. It is not necessary to be a sociologist in order to know these things. If the country church is deteriorating, if the young people are losing interest in it, we know a few things to do that will add strength to the church. It may be that there are many things we cannot do but that is no reason for sitting down with folded arms and complaining about the evil days that have come upon us. We can have an ideal for the church as a social and religious center. We can find out what others have done to make the church a living force.

What is our opinion of the church as an educational institution? Are we sure that the Sunday-school is as organized as it ought to be and that it is teaching what it ought to teach. Is it not time that we have a vision of a church in which there is no member wholly without interest in religious education. The Sunday-school is the place to study the Bible. We must study the history of the church, missions, ethics, church organization, music, everything that pertains to religious culture and work. If our plans are not great enough, let us enlarge them so that we can have a reason to give to every man whom we invite to come and study in our Sunday-school. We can make our Bible study vital by relating it to the life of the present. [Midweek Service, June 4. John 4:32-38; Acts 2:39; Prov. 29:18.] S. J.

"Thou Hast Not Fainted"

In a record of events immediately following the French Revolution, we are told of an exile who finding himself again in the city—wrecked as it was it was still his home—met there an old-time companion whom he scarcely recognized, so haggard he had become. His cheeks were sunken, his hair gray and his knees bent. As he heard from his friend a recital of that "Reign of Terror," he asked in amazement. "Mon ami, what did you do during that dreadful time?" To which the man replied with firm voice, "I lived!"

There are times when that is all God asks of a man or a church, the mere enduring things without murmuring or despairing.

Few persons realize how tenderly God deals with men who have never scored a victory but simply "stood it through." The commendation to the much tried church at Ephesus was, "Thou hast not fainted." It was all that was asked.

The great battles of the world have been defensive battles, Thermopylae, Marathon, Leyden, Derry, Lexington, Sumter. A hundred years ago everybody expected to see the dashing Gaul crush Europe with his spurred heel. Today the Teuton stands triumphant. In the long run nothing counts like dogged resistance. It is the anvil that wears out the hammer. It is the man who never knows when he is whipped that comes at length into the kingdom.

There are in the United States twenty suicides every day. That means so many men and women who wholly give up the battle and lie down to die. Among them are millionaries and tramps, drunkards and ascetics. Some of them are scarcely more than children fresh from the warm cradle and some are octogenarians trembling on the edge of the damp, cold grave. Life is not without its tragedies to each age and every class.

Let us remember that God does not require of us to laugh and jest and dance and make merry under afflictions. Not at all. But what he expects is that we shall not give up. We may never know the reason of our tears this side of heaven, but we can at least wait. We may not understand all his dealings now, but we can trust. We can not answer all the arguments of the infidel—Paul could not—but like him we may be able to say as life draws to its close, "I have kept the faith." Where we can not solve the problem we can commune with our own heart and be still.

Fortune may be swept away. Faith need not go with it. Hard work and ceaseless grind is all that many of God's servants know in this world, but they hold fast their integrity like Job. And when they come to die, God will write as their epitaph—"I know thy works; thou hast not fainted." That is enough. Heaven is opened by that word. Not to faint in this world is to conquer.

The Human Factor

There is insistent demand that the kingdom shall come by schedule. We have implicit faith in machinery. This is the bane of our politics and the cause of many of our disasters in the industrial world. We are always forgetting that no machine can make up for the lack of human vigilance; that no mere system or method can save the world. Interlocking switches and automatic signals have their place, but never can be a substitute for human fidelity and alertness.

We are forever making this mistake in the political life of the nation. We labor to obtain direct primaries, or the initiative and referendum, and having gotten it we calmly sit down and wait for the automatic coming of the political millennium, while evil-minded men work the machine we have invented, and profit by the spoils.

This is one of the vices of our modern church life. There are so many men who are willing to undertake contracts to bring in the kingdom of God by program. If we will build a tabernacle of specified dimensions, raise so much money, do so much advertising, organize a chorus choir of given size, we may have a guaranteed revival tied up in a package and delivered C. O. D. For any possible ill within the church the remedy is a new kind of a machine, another form of organization, an apparatus into whose slot we have only to drop a nickel, or a dinner, or a speech, or a constitution and by-laws, and behold the millennium is ground out, securely packed and labeled. There is a demand for ministers of the type who can produce these results, men who can "get the business," men who "get out and hustle for results." Except we see signs and wonders we will not believe.

Nevertheless, the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, nor constitutions and by-laws, nor machinery, but love and joy and peace and righteousness in the fellowship of the spirit of God.

Machinery is valuable and necessary, but what we need at present is not more harness but more horse; not more machinery but more manhood. God give us men.

Starvation Wages

The reports on the condition of women and child wage-earners in the United States issued by the department of Commerce and Labor show that starvation wages are paid to many men workers and to more women and child workers. In Pennsylvania mills 67.8 per cent of all employees are women, and 23.2 per cent are children. The majority of these are underpaid. In the "throwing" mills of New Jersey, 8.7 per cent of the women over sixteen years of age receive less than $4 a week, and 15.8 per cent receive between $4 and $5 a week. An investigation made last year into conditions in four industries in Massachusetts in which over 10,000 women are employed, showed that a very large percentage of these women workers were receiving less than $6 a week. Of about 500 girls under eighteen years of age employed in retail stores over 96 per cent receive less than $5 a week. One woman who had worked sixteen years in one department store in Boston never received more than $5 a week. This agitation in behalf of the minimum wage scale is an attempt to express the thought of our time that no worker be paid less than will enable him or her to live decently and comfortably. It isn't very long ago since economists talked and wrote about the law of supply and demand determining a worker's compensation. Adam Smith well expressed the view of the old economists when he wrote "a man must always live by his work and his wages must at least be sufficient to maintain him." Our day declares that a man's wages must do more than maintain him; his wages must maintain him "in health, comfort and efficiency." In days gone by employers interpreted that hard and fast economic law that Adam Smith states by paying their workers the wages the market conditions required. If there were more workers than there was work to be done, they paid them less than a living wage. If there was more work to be done than there were available workers to do it, they paid their employees a little more than a living wage. Employers are now recognizing that they must pay those who labor for them a compensation that will enable them not simply to exist, but really to live.

The Rag Carpet and the Rug

Did you ever sew any carpet rags? Do you remember how in the winter evenings not only the girls but the boys had to sew them? Do you remember the friendly rivalry to see whose ball grew fastest, and the admonition to wind the rags hard and not to pretend to be making a bigger ball than you really were making? Do you remember the sorting out of the rags and the selection for the portions that were dominated "stripe" and those called "hit-or-miss?" Do you remember that wonderful day when the white rags were dyed in the four kettles of dye, that colored logwood, blue, yellow and red? Do you remember how the green was made by successive dipping of the rags into the yellow and blue, and how at length the bunches hung dripping and resplendent at the close of the day? Do you remember when the carpet came home and was nailed down in the best room, a thing more glorious than Joseph's coat, almost too good to walk upon, and compelling unwonted care in the matter of the cleaning of boots before they were set upon it?

There were many differences between that rag carpet and your Oriental rug and they are not wholly in favor of the rug. The essential question of the value of either of them is not to be discerned by the feet, but by the answer to the question, which contributed more to the making of a happy, unified home life?

The Garage First

Spending an hour with a clerical friend in the suburbs, we noticed not far from the parsonage a curious residence which did not appear to conform to any known type. It was one story in height, entered by a broad double door, lighted by a row of square windows and covered by a nearly flat roof. In response to our enquiries our friend told us that his neighbors were young married people who two or three years ago purchased the lot intending to build a home. But as coming within their means they built first the garage in which to store their limousine, yet to be purchased, and so they placed it at the rear of their lot reserving the fore part for their future mansion. They fitted up the garage in which to spend the first winter—and they are there yet. The mansion is still "in nubibus" and the motor car is yet in the shop.

We proffer the picture to our readers as a parable of the age. It is no longer "first things first" but let first things wait. Before the house is erected we will provide the stable and before we can own a car we build a garage. We skip tedious and bothersome processes of proof and dwell in the conclusion whose logical right to be is assumed. Some day we shall find and possess the "missing link," but not waiting for that we sit down in the positive conviction that man is surely descended from him, and we mean to summer and winter in that low-roofed creed whether we ever get hold of the missing link or not. We can not wait for the motor. What is the use? Have we not the garage? We read a book the other day written to prove that the Bible was all wrong in its historic statements and on a single page we counted fourteen suppositions, such as "it is probable;" "if this be so;" "when all the proof is in," and at the conclusion the author sat serenely down and took possession of a garage to reach which he had only an imaginary motor. For our part we prefer a shed with a wheelbarrow in it to a garage with no car.

On the Book Table

LIFE OF G. L. WHARTON, by Emma Richardson Wharton.

In her "Life of G. L. Wharton," Mrs. Emma Richardson Wharton has shown biographical blood in her veins. She is the daughter of Dr. Richardson, whose biography of Alexander Campbell is still the classic "life" of the Disciples of Christ. The art of biography is one she learned at her illustrious father's library table. That Mrs. Wharton has well absorbed this art, may be seen at a glance almost on reading this latest of Revell missionary publications. In writing so noteworthy a life, Mrs. Wharton has forgotten that she is her hero's widow. Sentiment is admirably subordinated to fidelity to the facts of her subject. She is first and last, a biographer. This is clearly seen, for example, in her wise choice of epistolary material, which throws a clear light on the struggles of a great soul who so substantially assisted in starting the work of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society in India. The author uses throughout the work a running, narrative style that makes it highly readable. There are many noble passages that sink deep into the reader's heart.

Such works as these will go very far towards advertising the Disciples of Christ as a missionary people. The Disciples have been notorious in the past for debate. Missionary work as carried on under the brilliant secretaryship and presidency of Archibald McLean, is resulting in rectifying an impression of the Disciples that was only too well warranted by the facts. Such books as Mrs. Wharton's will do incalculable good in assisting the work of rectification. Revell's have recently published a number of missionary works for the Disciples of Christ. Such a literary arrangement must have a mutual reward in the end. In the present work under review, the publishers have distinguished themselves. Let the good work continue. Mrs. Wharton's life of her famous missionary-husband should be on the library table of every Christian home. It is a great, inspiring story of struggle, of real heroism, written in a splendidly simple style that materially adds to its high effectiveness.

President McLean's foreword is a notable introduction in itself. He rises nobly to the fact that Greene Lawrence Wharton was a member of the first group of missionaries sent by the Disciples of Christ to India. His tribute to the memory of the missionary is like all his tributes, simple and sincere.

CROSSING THE CENTURIES. The Educational Associates, Springfield, Mass.

This is a successful attempt to bring within the covers of a single volume the sweep of events of all times, from Creation to the administration of W. H. Taft. The searchlight of time is here thrown upon the pathway of man, down through the ages. The great events of history; the story of Earth's master leaders; the origins of literature, religion and philosophy; discoveries, inventions, arts and sciences—all are amply treated in this voluminous work. Among contributors to the work are: Lyman Abbott, J. H. Vincent, David Starr Jordan, Woodrow Wilson, Theodore Roosevelt, Albert Bushnell Hart and scores of others of high standing.

ONE HUNDRED PRAYER MEETING TALKS AND PLANS, with introduction by F. B. Meyer. F. M. Barton, Cleveland, O.

The prayer-meeting is the "power house of the church and ought to be occupied with doing definite business with God," says F. B. Meyer in his introduction to this valuable work. And yet in most churches the prayer-meeting is a dead letter! For such churches, let us recommend a weekly dosage from this volume of tonic. Here is more material, more carefully selected, and more usable, for your prayer-meetings than you will find between any other covers. There are included, besides a mass of devotional material, Topics for a Year, One Hundred Suggestions, Twelve Detailed Plans, and one hundred and five complete services laid out for your convenience.

Presbyterian Pentecost at Atlanta

About 5,000 commissioners to three different Presbyterian General Assemblies, meeting simultaneously at Atlanta the latter part of May, succeeded in making the power of Presbyterianism felt from coast to coast and from the gulf to the Canadian line. Things verily hummed. So notable was this unique event that unusual space was accorded it by the leading dailies of America. It was a front-page event of the vastest significance. It must have been thrilling to see veterans of the Civil War, Federal and Confederate, gathering around the Lord's Table, there unite their hearts and renew their allegiance to Christ, in a common observance of the Passion of the King of Kings, to the solemn music of the United Presbyterian psalmody. War separated the Northern and Southern churches, but on that impressive day the Prince of Peace triumphed. It was a Presbyterian Pentecost. The Commissioners surrendered for a day to the workings of the Holy Ghost. It was a foretaste of what Presbyterianism might become.

Doctor Mark Matthews, the picturesque retiring moderator, supplied the first thriller with an electric appeal for Presbyterian Union. "By the exercise of Godward faith," he said during his address as retiring moderator of the Northern assembly, "organic union would be the product of conviction. I am not in favor of a mechanical organic union but I am in favor of the organic union of all the branches of Presbyterianism in this country if brought about as the result of conviction. The only thing that keeps us apart is the paralyzing influence of unbelief. By faith the Church could disarm the world. The disarmament of nations is the duty of the Church. By faith and the works thereof the Church could free America from the accursed liquor traffic. The Church will some day exercise her power, and when she does this, in twenty-five years from that day America will be free from the saloon." Doctor Matthews' other notable utterance was his sweeping attack on candidates for the ministry who doubt or deny the deity of Christ. He said: "We should change the ground of our objections to candidates for the ministry who doubt or deny the deity of Christ. They ought to be rejected not alone because they doubt or deny per se the deity of Christ, but because their denial is prima facie evidence that they have never been regenerated. No unregenerated man should be permitted to preach." Wild applause punctuated various portions of the address, which Doctor Matthews read from manuscript for one hour and ten minutes.

The Union Theological Seminary matter goes over to the next General Assembly. The majority of the committee appointed last year to bring that troublesome seminary back into the orthodox camp, reported that charges of heresy against members of the Union faculty may be amicably settled by 1914. The secular dailies carried a story to the effect that President Brown of Union made a speech in which he boldly told the commissioners of the Northern assembly that it was a matter of indifference to the seminary what the Atlanta Convention proposed to do about the matter. It took great quantities of nerve to say that, but President Brown evidently had nothing to fear as he looked the commissioners square in the eye.

Union between the Southern and the United Presbyterians was assured by a unanimous rising vote which greeted the recommendations of the United Presbyterian committee's report, though no action was recommended prior to 1914 in order to permit of a year's reflection and discussion. Rev. Doctor J. G. McClurkin of Pittsburg read the report, which was followed by a wild outburst of enthusiasm. The psalm-singing question, the only practical difference, was handled as follows:

There is a difference in the historic faith and practice of the two Churches touching the matter of praise in the worship of God. The one Church holds the belief that the Book of Psalms is the perfect and divinely accredited manual of praise, and as such is to be used in worship to the exclusion of all devotional compositions of uninspired persons. The other, while believing that the Psalms of Scripture were designed for permanent use in the Church, and should have a large place in Christian worship, yet hold that other compositions that are in harmony with the teaching of Scripture may, with propriety and profit, be used in congregational singing. This difference is frankly recognized, but holding our respective views, in the forbearance of love we suggest the following as a practicable basis:

We believe that the Psalter of the Bible, the Psalms of David, is an inspired manual of praise and that the Spirit of God indited these songs to be used in the worship of the people of God to the end of time. The united Church will, therefore, take immediate steps to introduce to all its congregations, by endorsing and recommending, the Psalms of the Bible in the best metrical version as a divinely accredited book of praise. But while strongly commending the use of the Psalms, it is agreed that each church in our respective Synods shall be allowed in the matter of congregational singing the same liberty which it now enjoys.

Finally, recognizing that it is impossible to make specific provision for all points of difference that may arise, it is understood that these Churches enter the union in the spirit of mutual confidence and Christian love, and with a sole view to the honor of Christ and the extension of His Kingdom. It follows from this that the law of Christian charity as expounded by the Apostle Paul must be our guide: "Let us not therefore judge one another any more; but judge ye this rather that no man put a stumbling block in his brother's way." "Let each of us please his neighbor for that which is good unto edifying," "doing nothing through faction or through vainglory, but in lowliness of mind each counting other better than himself; not looking each of you to his own things, but each of you also to the things of others."

Doctor R. M. Russell, president of Westminster College, Pittsburg, was elected moderator of the United Presbyterian assembly, while Doctor J. S. Lyons of Louisville was honored by a similar election in the Southern assembly.

The Associated Reformed Church was represented at Atlanta by a commission appointed by a recent general synod of that church. Thus, four clans of Presbyterians gathered in convention at the same time and the same place. How the world does move sure enough!

Southern Baptist Convention at St. Louis

The Southern Baptists met in convention at St. Louis during May 14-19. The spirit of this convention will be best appreciated by the fury created by A. Y. Napier, a young missionary from Yangchow, China. Three committees on foreign missions had made their report. Napier was programmed to stir up Baptist zeal for foreign missions. He did, but not exactly as calculated. The union Bible School at Nanking, in which the Disciples are interested, was brought in by the innocent missionary in a most innocent way. He favored the project, because it was a splendid testimony to the spirit of Christian unity in China and also because of its economy. Young Napier had hardly gotten the words out of his mouth, when he was hissed and hooted down. The uproar was so uproarious that Napier was forced to retire. Napier declared the Baptists would lose their leadership in China, unless the movement at Nanking was entered into. Scores of voices cried out "Let it go." In other words, the delegates went on record against interdenominational co-operation. "When a later speaker made a play to the galleries," according to the Standard (Baptist, Chicago) "by saying that interdenominational co-operation was not needed in Brazil, he was rewarded by a chorus of Amens."

This spirit of Baptist exclusiveness again betrayed itself in another important number on the programme. The question of interdenominational co-operation in Sunday School work came up. The feeling displayed showed that the delegates were about evenly divided on the question, with perhaps a shade against co-operation. Despite giants like G. W. Truett of Dallas and John E. White of Atlanta, the convention was palpably exclusive and insular. Occasionally, the Northern Baptists came in for a scoring. The southern brethren think the northerners are tainted with Unitarianism, while the northerners fancy the southerners to be about the next thing to Roman Catholicism when it comes to their spirit of fanatic devotion to denominational exclusion and denominational orthodoxy. And yet, brotherly love was shown towards the accredited fraternal delegates from the Northern Convention. Still, it was a typical pow-pow and a tom-tom.

Presbyterian Politics Rebuked at Atlanta

When the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A. at Atlanta, came to choosing a new moderator to succeed Dr. Mark Matthews of Seattle, the politicians of the assembly got a jolt from which it will take years to recuperate. Doctor Maitland Alexander of Pittsburg was slated for the honor by the log-rolling group of the assembly. His name was duly presented and seconded. What seemed to be a foregone conclusion was rudely upset when Doctor William R. King of Monmouth, Ill., placed in nomination the name of Doctor John Timothy Stone of Chicago. Doctor King, in a speech, said that Doctor Stone did not know that his name would be presented, and he (Doctor King) thought it about time to call a halt on assembly politics. William T. Ellis, the Presbyterian journalist, seconded Doctor Stone's nomination with a speech that was red-hot with righteous indignation. When the vote was taken Doctor Stone was declared the next moderator.

Sixty Years a Sunday-School Teacher

On May 5 Miss Margaret Miller died in Paterson, N. J., at the age of eighty-five. The reason that fact finds its way into these columns is that she is believed to have been the oldest Sunday-school teacher in the United States both in age and in length of service. Think what it means to have influenced the young morally and religiously for sixty years as a devoted Sunday-school teacher. Such was her service in the kingdom of the Lord.

From Near and Far

"By faith in Christ we could bring about organic union of all the branches of the Presbyterian church in America," declared Dr. Mark A. Matthews of Seattle, retiring moderator, in his sermon at the opening session of the Northern Presbyterian General Assembly, at Atlanta. "The only thing that keeps us apart is the paralyzing influence of unbelief. By faith the church could disarm the world. The church will some day exercise her power, and when she does, in twenty-five years from that day America will be free from the saloon."

Efforts of the Chicago Christian Endeavor union to have Chicago named as the meeting place for the International Christian Endeavor Convention, to be held in 1915, have received the active support of the Chicago Association of Commerce, whose convention committee will send a representative to the Los Angeles convention in July to urge the advantages of Chicago for the meeting. Twenty thousand delegates usually attend such a convention, but Chicago Christian Endeavor leaders anticipate a delegation of 30,000 if it is held in this city.

Delegates to the nineteenth annual Lake Mohonk conference on arbitration heard Dr. Lyman Abbott, chairman of the opening session, assert that disarmament was yet a Utopian dream. "The blow of the fist, the gleam of the sword, the bark of the cannon," he added, "will continue until some other power greater than that of armed man is found to protect innocence from injustice." Dr. Abbott's address was interpreted as a reply to the American Peace Society, his fellowship in which recently was abolished.

W. J. Calhoun, former minister to China, recently arriving in Chicago, says whisky is now a great peril to China. "The government is honestly fighting the poppy growing industry," Mr. Calhoun declares. "It is making a decent effort to kill the opium trade. That is one of the menaces of China, I take it. You see, they have no saloons in China. No whisky at all. It is my fear that if the government succeeds in crushing out the opium habit among its citizens they will turn to whisky."

Every disreputable house in Atlanta, Ga., has been closed. Two young men, Marion M. Jackson, lawyer, and John J. Egan, capitalist, are largely responsible for this achievement in public morals. These leaders, inspired by the Men and Religion Forward Movement, secured advertising space in the newspapers and made such startling exposures of vice conditions and such moral and religious appeals that they aroused powerful public seniment and drastic official action.

More respect for the American flag was urged by D. L. Pierson, historian, at the convention of the Sons of the American Revolution, which recently met in Chicago. "Reading of light fiction has lessened ardor for the flag," he asserted, "while its use in advertising has lessened respect for it. We must stand firm for what the flag represents if we would progress." Resolutions were adopted urging Congress to pass a bill prohibiting desecration of the flag.

The further extension of the juvenile courts system was urged by Mrs. Frederic Schoff of Philadelphia at the recent convention of the national congress of mothers and parent-teacher associations. Mrs. Schoff recommended that every county have a definite arrangement for separate hearings of offenses committed by children.

Daniel A. Poling, for several years Field Secretary of Ohio Christian Endeavor, has been appointed National Christian Endeavor superintendent of temperance and Christian citizenship. A broad, unifying, nation-wide inter-partisan temperance and civic campaign will be carried on at once.

Dr. G. Campbell Morgan of London, well known in America as a Bible expositor, will visit Chicago next fall to deliver a series of lectures, according to an announcement issued by the Moody Bible Institute. Sir William Ramsay, archaeologist, will also lecture at the institute.

German Evangelical ministers all over the United States will constitute part of a nation-wide financial reporting system to protect members from land swindles and other frauds worked in the shadow of the church. Such swindles are said to have aggregated $1,250,000.

After a long discussion in the Chamber of Deputies, Paris, an amendment to the gambling law of 1907 was adopted by a vote of 454 to 55. This provides for suppression of gambling casinos in university towns or within sixty-two miles of Paris.

Under a bill approved by Governor Tener, May 20, ten verses of the Bible must be read daily without comment in the public schools of Pennsylvania. Teachers who violate the law are subject to dismissal.

F. E. Higgins, known as the "Sky Pilot of the Lumber Jacks," was one of twenty-three speakers at the celebration of "Presbyterian Day" at the World in Chicago.

Count Okuma recently declared that although Christianity has enrolled less than 200,000 believers in Japan, yet its influence has poured into every realm of Japanese life.

In Japan 95 per cent of the people can read and write, while in India, 95 per cent of all the people can neither read nor write.

In New York one man out of every five of 180,000 men engaged in sixteen industries, works on Sunday.

National workers for the "down and outs" have just met in convention in New York City.

Our Readers' Opinions

AN APPEAL.

Many remember the time when women, largely in the majority in the church, sat quietly during the service, taking no part in the public worship, except in the singing. The missionary and temperance work depended so much on women's labors and offerings that they brooked custom and became familiar with the sound of their own voices, in audiences composed entirely of women, at first, and later of women and men in conventions. Many pulpits were denied them, and in some where they spoke, they were requested by literalists to speak with their heads covered. I blush to relate it, but it is a fact, that about twelve years ago an article headed "Dolly in the Pulpit" was written by one of our ministers and published in one of our papers. This article urged the "subjection and silence" of women in the church and "obedience in the home." The writer was consistent for he pleaded against the toleration of women's work; this toleration he believed was an express violation of the will of God. Such views are not entertained by any minister today who recognizes that we are not under the old dispensation of law, but under the new dispensation of love. The person who loves Christ and humanity so well that his life is spent in making the best application of the principles of Christianity under existing conditions, is a true disciple, male or female it matters not, for there is no sex in religion.

Under the blessed spirit of Christianity men and women have equal rights, equal privileges and equal blessings. There is no claim of moral superiority for women under similar conditions. Many women may not enter the pulpit, but if prohibited, every moral message they utter elsewhere suffers depreciation. The liberty of the gospel recognizes the liberty of every creature; and the New Testament reveals Christ as the emancipator of women. The conditions of salvation are the same for women as men; the standards of character given by Christ are the same. Christ is no respecter of persons. All of this is taken for granted today. And no one is now discussing woman's place in the church. But we are discussing woman's place in the state.

About thirty countries and more than that number of states have granted women limited suffrage. Six countries and nine states and one territory have unlimited suffrage. The legislatures of many states are now struggling with this question. Strange that there should be any confusion in a democracy said to be of the people, for the people and by the people.

What would we think of a father who bequeathed his property in such a way as to question the wisdom of God in the creation of woman? What do we think of Uncle Sam collecting our taxes and exacting penalties by laws that we had no voice in making? By a long and tedious route, Massachusetts women worked fifty-five years to get an equal guardianship law. In Colorado the first legislature after women were enfranchised enacted that law. So if women had the ballot in all the states they could more speedily serve the true purpose of popular government—guard and improve the home. The state has only those morals that the home makes effective. The home is the basis of government and therefore the women must help the men conserve its highest ideals. The good men ought to realize this fact, since all evil men grasp it readily and vote against it every time. Woman needs the ballot and man needs woman's ballot.

The ministers will certainly see that women, church women, will become a large factor in the solution of all human problems. The women look to the ministers for support and encouragement; for their endorsement from the pulpit and the lecture platforms. No thoughtful man will treat the subject lightly or with ridicule.

The women of England have been criticized for the use of militant methods regardless of the fact that reforms generally come there by militancy. The American suffragists have been patient and peaceful. They have petitioned and implored. They have agitated and educated. President Wilson said "The firm basis of government is justice, not pity."

A Statesman's View of World Progress

Secretary of State Bryan on "The Signs of the Times"

An Address Before the Union League Club, Chicago

IN TAKING AS MY SUBJECT "The Signs of the Times," I thought I might bring to your attention the general progress of the world, and not only point out the things that have been accomplished, but the direction in which the people are going; and I feel that if I do attempt to speak of the future, I will have more willing hearers now than I had some two decades ago, for the things accomplished have enabled us to measure the tendencies of the times.

I desire to bring before you evidence in support of three propositions: First, that the world is advancing in intelligence; second, that it is advancing in morals; and third, that it is advancing in the study of the science of government. And if I can convince you, as I am sure I can, if you need convincing, that the world is making progress in these three important directions, there ought to be no room for pessimism in any heart.

A World Growing in Intelligence.

First, as to the world's advance in intelligence. Every year finds a larger percentage of the people of the world able to read and write—able to study history, and knowing the past, judge the future. Every year finds more schools, more students in attendance, and a higher standard of education; and this is not true today only, but every day; and not in one place only, but everywhere.

I have made the statement as strong as language can make it, and the evidence supports the statement. If time permitted I could bring illustrations from every land, but a few must suffice. Fifty years ago comparatively few of the people of Japan could read and write. Now they boast that among the rising generation 90 per cent can read and write, and the study of our language is so universal in the higher classes that you can speak to college students in that country in our language without the need of an interpreter.

A few years ago they had no schools in China but private schools, and not many attended them. Now public schools are springing up all over China. Seven years ago Yuan Shih Kai declared that in his district he had established 4,000 public schools during the preceding five years. You will find that China has already felt the influence of this intellectual awakening. The viceroy at Nanking, who had just before our visit to that country laid the corner-stone of the first school for women established in his district, told me that they had at that time some 7,000 Chinese students studying in the schools of Japan, not to speak of those studying in other countries. And those of you who are acquainted with what has taken place recently in China know the prominent part taken in the establishment of the republic by those who have obtained their education outside of China, and then carried back into that country an enthusiasm that is permeating the entire country.

The Filipinos are so anxious to secure an education that one American official in the islands told me that the people in the country communities would build schoolhouses more quickly and more rapidly than they could furnish teachers for them; and one American told me that the desire for education was so widespread that in his district the attendance at the schools was 50 per cent above what the school census would indicate, because of the number of parents who attended school with their children.

In India while education is backward the desire for it is so universal that every meeting of the native congress results in the demand for larger educational opportunities; and only a few years ago the people of India reached the conclusion that the viceroy was not sufficiently encouraging higher education, and they raised money by private subscription and sent young men to study in the colleges of other lands. At Calcutta we attended a farewell reception given to forty-four of these young men, some of them starting for the United States.

In Africa there are 17,000 students—ten thousand boys and 7,000 girls—attending schools and colleges established by missionaries, not to speak of an increasing number attending the government schools.

If you cross the ocean you will find the same is true on this side of the Atlantic; it is true in Canada on the north; it is true in every state of the union; it is true in the republics to the south of us. I think I can safely say that there is not one state among our sisterhood of forty-eight in which there is not some movement on foot and growing that has for its object either the extension of the area of education or the raising of the standard.

When you come to the Spanish republics to the south of us you will find that while they vary in the percentage of illiteracy, and while in some of them the percentage of illiteracy is large, yet everywhere it is decreasing.

The American ideal is that there shall be an open school door before every child born into the land, and that every child shall be urged to make the largest possible use of these opportunities freely furnished. And this is not only our ideal, but it is the ideal toward which the whole world is marching, our nation leading the way. We have such faith in education, desiring it for ourselves and providing it for those about us, that if there was no other evidence of the world's advance than was to be found in this advance in intelligence, even then the future would seem bright with hope. And yet it would be a very risky thing if we were strengthening men's minds and making those minds more powerful, more powerful for harm as well as for good, if we were not putting behind those stronger minds a heart development that would assure society that those larger mental powers would be employed for the advancement of the common weal.

Moral Progress.

I am glad, therefore, to advance the second proposition, that the world is making progress in morals as well as in intelligence. And if I had to decide the question I would be compelled to say that at the present time the evidence of a world-wide moral awakening is even more abundant than the evidence of the world's intellectual advance. And here, too, I am embarrassed by the very abundance of the evidence.

Some fourteen years ago the great Frenchman, Dumas, wrote a remarkable letter. He said he thought he saw the signs of a coming new era, which he described as the era of brotherhood. And I venture to say that this era of brotherhood, foreseen and foretold, is not merely coming, but that it is here. [Applause.] There is a better understanding of the doctrine of brotherhood than there ever has been before. There is more of a sense of kinship among men. There is more altruism on this globe than the globe has previously known, and more in the United States than in any other country in the world. [Applause.] Yes, with all our worship of the almighty dollar, there is more altruism in this country today than any other nation can boast, and our nation is doing more today, in an unselfish and altruistic interest in all the people of the world, than any other nation now existing or that has ever been known to history. [Applause.]

Let me call your attention to a few of the organized efforts that are being made to raise the moral standards of the world. Let us begin in this country. Within the last ten years more than a million men have been brought together in men's clubs and Bible-classes in the various churches. There is scarcely a church of any size of any denomination that has not a men's club or Bible-class. I have had occasion to visit some of these Bible-classes taught by prominent men in the community; Bible-classes that within the last three or four years have sprung from nothing to a membership of several hundred. After these individual clubs had been organized they were brought together in national brotherhoods. We have great societies, some within single churches and some interchurch. Take the Christian Endeavor Society, for instance. The Young Men's Christian Association has a brotherhood of over a million; more than half of that membership in the United States. The Christian Endeavor Society was born in this country and the idea was exported. The Y. M. C. A. was born in Great Britain and the idea was imported, and if you will let me digress for a moment, I will take this opportunity to say that I am glad that there are things as valuable as ideas that can be imported without having to go through a custom house. [Laughter.]

You may not know how large an amount of money is spent through these various organizations that are today charged with the elevation of moral standards. Take this one organization. Do you know how the expenditures of the Y. M. C. A. compare with the expenditures of national politics? Do you know that we spend more than twice as much every year on the Y. M. C. A. as we spend in a presidential campaign? People complain of the expensiveness of our national campaigns, and yet if you will take the expenditures of the last national campaign you will find that they were not all together equal to one-half as much as we spend annually on the Y. M. C. A. And when you remember that we only have one presidential campaign in four years you will see, that in order to understand the proportion, you must multiply the two by four and that gives you eight times as much spent on this one organization working among men as in national politics. Isn't that a good showing? But it is even better than that, for with publicity we are likely to spend less in national politics, while the Y. M. C. A. work goes on increasing every day, so that it will not be long before the ratio of eight to one increases to sixteen to one. [Laughter and applause.] We have the Young Women's Christian Association, a companion organization. Not only that, but outside of the churches you find organizations ethical in character, like Hull House, that is known now all over the world, established in this city by Jane Addams, some twenty-three years ago, and now nearly 600 organizations of that character have sprung up in the United States.

The Progress of Temperance.

Go outside of the United States and the same is true. Not a nation with any degree of civilization but you will find an awakened conscience addressing itself to some ethical question. In China, for instance, it has been the opium question. They have made a tremendous fight against opium, and now, at a tremendous sacrifice of national revenue, they have about won their fight. And before waiting for it to be entirely finished they commenced on China's second vice, the vice of gambling.

In most of the countries of Europe you will find that the liquor question is the moral question of paramount importance. I was in northern Ireland some two years and a half ago and met the man who organized what is known as the "Catch-my-Pal" Total Abstinence Society. It began with a meeting on the street between a minister and five drunken men, and one of them asked the minister to get the other four to sign the pledge. He invited them to come to his house when they were sober and to sign, and they came, and when the five had signed they went out and got five more, each man bringing his "pal," and five more signed, and then the ten went out and got ten more, and they organized this society, which, when I was there had reached a membership of 120,000 and had changed the lives and habits of whole communities. And a Belfast lady told me a story that was the outgrowth of the work done by this society. She said that many drunkards had been reformed, and that a minister speaking to the wife of one of these reformed men, said, "Your home life must be more pleasant now since your husband has quit drinking," and she said "Oh, yes, yes, he is more like a friend now than a husband." [Laughter.] And such a change can be accomplished and can take place under favorable circumstances.

France, one of the greatest wine-producing countries in the world, has decided to teach in the schools the effect of alcoholism on the system. But the most startling piece of news comes from Germany. Some two years ago the emperor, speaking to the naval cadets, dared to attack what he described as the traditional beer drinking habits of his people, and told these young men that in any contests that might arise the country must depend upon them, and that it could not do so unless their brains were clear and their nerves steady, and then he warned them that alcohol would rob their brains of clearness and their nerves of steadiness and in the name of the Fatherland he appealed to them to join total abstinence societies, and held up for their example the total abstinence societies of the British navy. And when I read this appeal of Germany's emperor to the young men of that country to be strong for war, I asked myself "May we not appeal to the young men of this country to abstain from the use of alcohol, that their brains may be clear and their nerves steady for the battles of peace and progress that lie before us?" [Applause.]

Taking Conscience into Politics.

As I have traveled through the land I have met an increasing number of men who are looking at the questions of reform from something more than a personal interest. The first one of this group was a Chicago business man. He told me that until within two years he had not studied public questions, but that recent investigation had convinced him that there were some men in this country who had more money than it was safe for the country for them to have. He said he had been looking for a remedy; that he had considered several but they did not seem sufficient, and he asked me if I could suggest any other. I told him that he interested me; that I had been talking to men who had been fighting for their lives, but that he seemed to look at the question from a different standpoint. He said yes, that for many years he had had an income of $15,000 or $20,000 a year and that he was not worried about himself, but that he was worried about the future of the country. I told him I was not afraid that any man by his own unaided effort, giving to society a reward commensurate with that which he collected, could ever collect enough money from society to make his fortune a menace to those around him; that the only thing that need alarm any one was the fact that in some cases we had allowed men to gather where they did not sow; that we had allowed men to take from society a recompense out of proportion to the service they rendered, and this necessarily left to other people a reward that was less than they had earned. This was one of the first. I asked him if he knew anybody else like him in Chicago. He said he knew a hundred men among his personal acquaintances who were looking at the question from the same standpoint and reaching the same conclusion. And my observation since that time has convinced me that it was a conservative statement he made. I have found all over this country a political independence such as we have not known before, and I believe the reason of it is that men have commenced to feel that they have to take their consciences into politics and that they have to weigh public questions by moral standards in this country. [Applause.]

I say to you that there are more people in this country today, independent in wealth, who are looking at these questions from the standpoint of the public good and not from the standpoint of their own selfish interests than we have ever known before in this country. [Applause.]

In fact, if you ask me to name the one influence more potent than any other in the producing of the conditions which all now recognize, I should say to you that in my judgment this world-wide awakening, this stirring of men's consciences, is the largest factor in this revolution, for after all the conscience is the most potent force of which man has knowledge. Tell me that it is the law that makes men honest! For one man made honest by law a hundred are made honest by conscience. Tell me that it is the fear of prison walls that keeps men in the path of rectitude! For one man kept in the narrow way by fear of prison walls, a multitude are kept righteous by those invisible walls that conscience rears about us—walls that are stronger than walls of stone.

In every part of this country, in every section of our land, aye, in every civilized nation on this earth you will find an increasing group of men who have learned that the highest satisfaction that life can give is not to be found in the counting of money nor yet in the pleasures of society, but is only to be secured from an approving conscience and from the consciousness that they have made an unselfish contribution to the welfare of their fellowmen. [Applause.]

World Progress in the Science of Government.

And now I am ready to advance to the third proposition, namely, that the progress of the world in the science of government is as remarkable as the world's progress in intelligence and in morals. And it would be strange if with a larger intelligence there was not a better understanding of the science of government, and it would be humiliating to us if with a better understanding of the science of government there was not a larger faith in the principles of popular government, and it would be strange, too, if with a better understanding of brotherhood there was not a clearer recognition of the rights of man.

If I want to find out whether a man is a democrat or an aristocrat, I take him off to one side and I gradually get him around to a point where I can discuss the Bible with him. Then I lead him to that story of Lazarus and Dives, how Lazarus ate the crumbs that fell from Dives' table, and when I have told him that story I listen to hear what he says. If he is a democrat he says, "How bad it is that we have anybody like Lazarus, who has to live on crumbs;" and then he organizes a movement to increase the number of tables so everybody will have a table of his own and no one will have to live on the crumbs that fall from the tables of others. That is what he does if he is at heart a democrat. But what does he say if he is at heart an aristocrat? There is just one thing he will say and he will say it every time without fail: "What a lucky thing it was for Lazarus that there was a Dives near." [Laughter.]

The Democrat and the Aristocrat.

This distinction, I repeat, is fundamental. There are just these two points of view from which people view all things that affect human progress. The democrat believes that society is built from the bottom; the aristocrat believes that society is suspended from the top. And because they differ in their point of view, they differ just as much when they come to consider questions before the public. The man who believes that society is built from the bottom will tell you that you must legislate for all the people, and he has confidence that the prosperity of the people will find its way up through every class that rests upon the masses. But the aristocrat will tell you—and just as honestly—that you ought to legislate for the well-to-do and then be patient and wait while their prosperity leaks through on those below. This is the one great issue that has to be met everywhere in this world. You can go into any city or any country and the great issue is between the few who ask for special privileges and the many who ask for equal rights and opportunities. [Applause.]

It is a very pleasant part of my subject tonight to call your attention to some of the evidences of the growth in popular government in this country, and I commence with the best evidence of it, the election of senators by direct vote of the people. [Applause.] I regard this reform as the most fundamental in character of any national reform accomplished in a hundred years, and I have great faith in the effect of this reform on the character of the United States Senate. I believe that it will elevate the character of that body, that it will bring that body nearer to the people and make it the most illustrious legislative body in the world.

But that is not the only thing that the people have been doing in the last two decades. Great reforms do not come singly. When a great idea is launched even the man who launches it cannot set limits to its application, and it is not strange that while the people were securing control of the United States Senate they should also attempt to secure control of their government in other ways and by other methods. Why, I can remember when twenty-three years ago we did not have the Australian ballot in Nebraska, and I can remember that back in those days you could tell a polling place a half mile off by the crowd out in front, and I know that in some cases nearly half of the men were out in front hired to peddle tickets, until a man had to fight his way up to the polling place through these paid men. And back in those days the boss could bring up his men and vote them. Now we have the Australian ballot, and elections are so quiet that you have to get a policeman to tell you where the polling place is.

Waking from an Iridescent Dream.

The people have been taking hold of their government, and another means by which they have been getting control of the instrumentalities of the government is through publicity. A few years ago a great senator said that purity in politics was an iridescent dream. It is not many years ago that if you asked where a campaign contribution came from they told you it was none of your business, and then you apologized for asking an impertinent question. But now everybody understands that an election is a public affair, and when it was found that great predatory interests were subscribing to great campaign funds and were then controlling the officers elected the people demanded a remedy. And it came in a law which the parties joined in passing, that made it a criminal offense for any corporation to contribute to a national campaign.

But when we got that law it soon became apparent that that was not sufficient. That some men had so large a pecuniary interest in policies of government that they would contribute a sum so great as to indicate other than a patriotic interest in the result of the election. [Laughter.] And so the demand arose for publicity, and by 1908 we had reached a point where both of the great parties demanded publicity.

Now this is what has been going on and all this publicity has been in the direction of putting the people in control of their government; and at last we got to a point where we decided that we ought to know who owned the newspapers of the country. I do not know of anything stranger than that the people should so long tolerate a condition under which those who provide publicity should be able to avoid publicity. Some of our great newspapers were like dark lanterns that threw light on all in front but concealed the man who held the lamp. [Laughter and applause.] But at last we have applied the pure food law to our newspaper diet and now if a predatory interest buys a newspaper it must put the poison label on the outside of the can. [Laughter and applause.]

Our nation is leading the world in all of these departments of activity, along all these lines of progress—intelligence, morals, government. Go into the Orient and you will find that they are watching what our nation does; and I believe that the action of the president the other day in the utterance on the Chinese loan means a long step in advance toward winning the confidence of the people of the Orient. [Applause.] They have been looking to our nation as their only friend and when our nation stands out and insists that the aid we render shall be rendered without the destruction of their political independence, we speak not only for this nation but for the world, for we have now reached a point where the influence of America's example will have a molding influence on public opinion everywhere.

I shall not forget an experience I had at Sao Paulo, Brazil. It is the second city of that republic. There is a great normal school there that was built and is conducted on the plans taken by an American woman from the state of New York. They showed me through the various rooms. They were proud that the idea had come from the United States, and after they had shown me through the rooms they conducted me to the assembly hall where the students of the higher classes had gathered. Every seat was occupied, the aisles were full, and young men stood back in the door and out in the hallway. Over the windows of that room were draped two flags, the flag of Brazil and ours. A professor spoke for the school and spoke in English. He said their constitution had been modeled after ours, and that even their flag, like ours, had a star for every state. After he was through a young man spoke for the students. He was twenty or twenty-one and he spoke in English. His voice trembled with emotion as he told how our nation had been an inspiration to Brazil and how it was their ambition to make Brazil like the United States. And then a young lady recited a poem in English; and then to my amazement that entire school rose and sang in English, "My country, 'tis of thee; sweet land of liberty, of thee I sing."

And then it was my time to speak. I told them that those who laid the foundation of our nation were anxious that our nation should conquer the world, not with its arms but with its ideas. And I told them that our people would be happier to know that they sang our songs and were grateful for our example, happier far than they would be to have them as sullen subjects under a flag they did not love.

What a glorious mission God has reserved for our nation; to be the pathfinder among the nations—the torch bearer for mankind. What a responsibility comes with American citizenship!

And this is the question that I would burn into your minds and hearts and would carry with me ever; the world is moving forward, our nation leading the way. It is advancing in intelligence. Have we done all that we might have done to advance the world's intelligence? It is moving forward in morals. Have we done all that we might have done to lift the moral standard of our communities, our states, our nation and the world? It is moving forward in the application of the principles of popular government to government. Have we done all that we might have done to make this government each day more nearly a government of the people, by the people and for the people?

And if we have not lived up to our great opportunity, and if we have not fully met our great responsibility, will we listen tonight to the pleading voice that comes to us from the battlefield of Gettysburg? In that wonderful oration on that memorable occasion Lincoln spoke of the unfinished task, and appealed to them to consecrate themselves to that task. And our coming together will not result in the good that ought to follow unless each one of us here highly resolves that as far as we have power and that whatever opportunity comes, we shall so use our influence in the deciding of every question as to maintain our nation's primacy among the nations, and help it to lead each generation unto higher ground. [Applause and cheering.]

The Little Blue Squad

A Memorial Day Poem

By Benjamin Wade Burleigh

What noise is that far up the street?
What halting tread of limping feet?
Who are those old gray-heads in blue
So slowly coming into view?
I saw a star-lit flag o'erhead;
I heard a sob and I heard a sigh;
I heard a tremulous voice which said:
"The little blue squad is marching by."

The looks are those of the soldier's face,
Though a crutch is held in the musket's place.
A bit of bronze on the breast is pinned,
And the wavering ranks are scarred and thinned.
But I see through the mists of the years that speed,
I see by the flash in the veteran's eye
A nation saved by a soldier's deed,
When the little blue squad is marching by.

With blossoms red and white and blue,
As thick as ever the bullets flew,
The children pelt the old flag now
And place Love's wreath on the soldier's brow.
A grateful people kiss the scars
Of the men who fought and dared to die,
And they dip the flag that is full of stars
When the little blue squad goes marching by.

The little blue squad is marching by.
Ah, men must live and men must die!
God grant that their mantles on us may fall
As they answer, "Here!" to the last roll-call!
O long be the love-lit path that they tread
Or e'er it shall turn and lead to the sky,
Or e'er the last sad words shall be said:
"The little blue squad has all marched by."

The Sunday School's Significance

The Bible as a Text Book in Religious Education

By Woodrow Wilson

[We are indebted to the Expositor for the following message from President Wilson. It is the substance of an address Mr. Wilson delivered while Governor of New Jersey.—The Editors.]

I take it for granted that the significance of a Sunday-school lies in this circumstance: That it is an attempt to carry along the religious education of the nation with its secular education. Almost all my life I have been engaged in educational work. I have always had the same conception of it, from the beginning until now, namely, that education is a fundamental part of progress, that you can't make progress unless you tie one generation in with another. Any disconnection between one generation and another will be a break, and may be a fatal break in the continuity of progress. You can't make progress in disconnected groups and, therefore, with each generation you have to take the younger people as they come on and supply them with those conditions of thought which have sustained the progress of the generations that have come before them. You have to see to it that the light that has been accumulated by scholars and sages and men of profound experience shall not be dissipated, because the next generation knows nothing of it.

There is a sense in which education may be said to be the memory of the race—recollecting its experiences, building upon the things that it has done, not forgetting its successes and always remembering its mistakes; throwing aside the things that have not borne the test of time and of thought and discovery, and going on to those things which are more and more sanctioned from generation to generation by what is known and thought and discovered in the world. You know that one of the experiences of the Christian Church has been that from time to time it has feared the effect of discovery and the effect of scientific thought—the effect of the thought based upon the mere phenomena of nature—upon the teachings derived from the Bible. It has turned out to be an idle fear, because there have never been any fundamental discrepancies between the teachings of the Bible, which is God's written Word, and the teachings of nature, which is God's cipher—which we make out more and more distinctly from generation to generation. Religious education is education in this very Word of God; not the Word of God written in nature, for that is the study of the schools on week-days, but the Word of God written in His Scriptures.

President Woodrow Wilson.

The only book that can have any possible significance as a text-book in the Sunday-school is the Bible itself, and as we must train our children in the rest of the thought of the world, we must, if we are to make progress as a nation, ground each generation as it comes along in the established and tested moral judgments of the world.

The beauty about the Bible is that it is the most wholesome, the most perfectly symmetrical, the least morbid picture of life and motives of men in the world. Almost every other book has a streak of morbidness in it, but this book is wholesome and sweet and natural from cover to cover. Here are no dull moralizings; here is the life of man set forth as it was simply lived from generation to generation. I take it that the problem which you would all study for the Sunday-school is the biographies and the histories of the Old Testament and of the New. I suppose that the Epistles of the New Testament are for the perusal of those who are mature, because in the Epistles is set forth, as it were, the philosophy of the whole thing, the thoughtful reflection based upon the providence of God and the revelation of his Son. The Epistles constitute the theology of the Bible, and the rest of it constitutes the experience of mankind in contact with Divine Providence.

How often does the Bible eulogize the man who masters his own passions? In every circumstance of life, for the child as well as for him who is grown, in every day and in every turn of every day, the question is: "Shall we rule our own spirits?" and here, set forth in such simple terms that the child may understand it, in the annals of the Holy Scripture, are written the histories of men of every kind, whose glory was that they did master their own spirits, and through the whole thing lies what the Greek tragedies were never able to supply—the key, the thread to the labyrinth, the solution of the problem, the answer to the eternal question.

He alone can rule his own spirit who puts himself under the command of the spirit of God, revealed in his Son, Jesus Christ, our Saviour. He is the captain of our soul; he is the man from whose suggestions and from whose life comes the light that guideth every man that ever came into the world. If we can make our Sunday-schools the blazing centers of that light, then indeed will the darkness of the world be dissipated. The happiness of seeing a great company of people gathered together in the interest of the Sunday-school is the happiness of knowing that there are they who seek light and who know that the lamp from which their spirits can be kindled is the lamp that glows in the Word of God.

Every Sunday-school should be a place where this great book is not only opened, is not only studied, is not only revered, but is drunk of as if it were a fountain of life, is used as if it were the only source of inspiration and of guidance. No great nation can ever survive its own temptations and its own follies that does not indoctrinate its children in the Word of God; so that as schoolmaster and as governor I know that my feet must rest with the feet of my fellow men upon this foundation only; for the righteousness of nations, like the righteousness of men, must take its source from these foundations of inspiration.

I am sorry for the men who do not read the Bible every day; I wonder why they deprive themselves of the strength and of the pleasure. It is one of the most singular books in the world, for every time you open it, some old text that you have read a score of times suddenly beams with a new meaning. Evidently the mood and the thought of that day, bred by the circumstances that you cannot analyze, has suddenly thrown its light upon that page and upon that passage, and there springs out upon the page to you something that you never saw lie upon it before. There is no other book that I know of, of which this is true; there is no other book that yields its meaning so personally, that seems to fit itself so intimately to the very spirit that is seeking its guidance.

There are great problems before the American people. There are problems which will need purity of spirit and an integrity of purpose such as has never been called for before in the history of this country. I should be afraid to go forward if I did not believe that there lay at the foundation of all our schooling and of all our thought this incomparable and unimpeachable Word of God. If we cannot derive our strength thence, there is no source from which we can derive it, and so I would bid you go from this place, if I may, inspired once more with the feeling that the providence of God is the foundation of affairs, and that only those can guide, and only those can follow, who take this providence of God from the sources where it is authentically interpreted.

I congratulate you that you have a part in the development of the great Sunday-school work. I sometimes wish very candidly that there was more simple reading and interpretation of the Bible and fewer elaborated Sunday-school lessons. I want to say very frankly that I never saw a Sunday-school lesson that yielded the meaning of the text that it was trying to interpret. If you will only give these little people the pure bread itself you won't have to ask some inexpert chemical analyst to tell them how the bread is made up. There is no man with insight enough to see how the bread of life is made, and I wish sometimes that we could strip off these superficial explanations and get down to those things that sustain our spirits.

I want to urge that we get down to hardpan again, that we regard the whole business of the Sunday-school as the familiarizing of the children with the Word of God.

Give it to them unadulterated, pure, unaltered, unexplained, uncheapened, and then see it work its wholesome work throughout the whole nature. It is very difficult, indeed, for a man or for a boy who knows the Scripture, ever to get away from it. It haunts him like an old song. It follows him like the memory of his mother. It reminds him like the word of an old and revered teacher. It forms part of the warp and woof of his life.

"Unknown, 4900"

Suggested by the Graves of the Unknown Dead at Chattanooga

From "Epworth Herald"

"Unknown," says the record, and just to be accurate, the count is made and the figures are given, "Unknown, 4900." That's all.

But is that all? Is it even true? Of course it is true, in the record-making, bookkeeping sense; here are graves, 4900 of them, and nobody knows the names of those whose bones here crumble into dust. So the record must be, "Unknown, 4900."

But these unnamed dead were known well enough once. Once they were boys going to war; they answered to their names in the roll call; the home paper had the tale of their company and the farm or village or town which sent them forth to the field.

And in the homes whence they came at the call of their country they were known, never fear! Most of them were yet mothers' boys; they had not attained to homes and families of their own; they were still keen for play and fun and the good eating which mother provided, and not overeager about the school or the farm work from which war offered a holiday.

And then in a day they became men! They were a nation's defenders, guards of freedom, champions of a mighty cause. They were known then! Grant knew them; and Meade, and Thomas; Lincoln himself knew them; if not by name, then by reason that they were comrades in arms.

For a little moment the mark of their identity was lost. These men were so busy in the field of death that they had no time to save the letter or the Bible with a word on the fly leaf that told what name they bore. And so, when the men came after the battle to get them ready against their burying, they became brothers in death more than they had been comrades in life, for each bore the same name, "Unknown."

But that is only for a little while. The most persistent of all forces is personality; and every one of these graves holds the body of a soldier who is not dead. So, because somewhere in God's wide spaces he knows himself, and God has always known him, and the mother who bore him never forgot him, to say that he is "unknown" is to be careful about a very little thing, and careless about the greatest things that pertain to the soldier.

He who dies for his country, for truth, for God, cannot be hidden or lost. Eternity will discover him again.

Modern Soldiers of Peace

A Practical Meditation for Memorial Day

From "The Congregationalist"

The tenderest of all the public anniversaries of the year is at hand. Memorial Day stands for the lavish outpouring of life and the due recognition of that sacrifice by those who have profited by it. Had there not been men in all parts of the land ready to spring to the defense of the country, to leave behind them their dearest ones, to endure the hardship of forced marches, the ordeal of battle and weary days in hospital and prison, this nation would have become dismembered. How different, then, the history of the last fifty years would have been! In these days of peace and comparative plenty we do well not only to lay garlands on graves of those who have fallen and to look reverently upon the furrowed faces and bowed figures of the surviving "Boys in Blue," but to think of the immense debt we owe them, a debt shared by all parts of the civilized world.

The passing of nearly fifty years puts a new face upon the world; totally new issues, like those relating to the tariff and the rights of labor, have come to the front, concerning which the division cannot be wholly on sectional lines. Men are absorbed as perhaps never before in the scramble for riches, in the development of industrial resources. The call to youth today is not to the battlefield but to the service of the state and mankind through peaceful vocations. Oh, that the same valor and self-forgetfulness that led striplings in the early '60s to do battle with bullets and bayonets, would take possession of the young men and women of today and make them veritable soldiers of peace!

The country wants men of sterling yet fighting honesty in public positions, from senators and representatives in Congress down to the humblest letter carrier. We need also soldiers of peace who will persistently and courageously strive to substitute in the minds of all the people ideals of peace for ideals of war. In a store window the other day I noticed the picture of a mother sitting beside her boy before an open fire. The artist had contrived to give a kind of dream effect to the scene. The mother was gazing through the firelight at the shadowy outline of a gowned preacher in a pulpit. But the boy was looking in another direction, his gaze riveted by the outline of a soldier decked out with sword and buckler and in a very militant attitude. The boy and the mother were cherishing altogether different ideals concerning what he would be fifteen or twenty years hence.

How can we make it clear to young minds and hearts that military glory is not the only thing worth striving for, that boys and girls who grow up into men and women ready to serve their country in prosaic ways and to serve mankind, are just as much heroes as men who grasp their muskets and hurry to the battlefield. The valiant missionaries who within recent years have suffered martyrdom in China and Turkey deserve monuments for their valor quite as much as if they had helped to sink the Spanish fleet.

Oh, yes, there is fighting work enough to do in the world without setting foot on any of the battleships whose multiplication is burdening taxpayers the world over today. As Charles Kingsley said, "The age of chivalry is not past so long as one wrong remains unredressed." He deserves to be called a good soldier of Jesus Christ who like him will bear witness to truth and righteousness, even at the cost of his own life, and who like him illustrates each day the heroic virtues called by the old-fashioned name of gentleness and unselfishness.

Heart-Keeping

Heart-keeping is much like housekeeping. There must be continual sweeping out of dirt and clearing out of rubbish—a daily washing of dishes, and a perpetual battle with all sorts of vermin. If heart-cleaning could be done up once for all, then the Christian might discharge all his graces, and have an easy time of it. And just because the assaults of subtle temptations are so constant, and the uprisings of sinful passions are so frequent, and the task of keeping the inward man what it ought to be is so difficult, many a one who begins a religious life gets discouraged and makes a wretched failure. The question with every Christian is: Shall these accursed Amalakites of temptation burn up all my spiritual possessions and overrun my soul? Shall outward assaults or inward weakness drive me to discouragement and disgrace me before my Master and before the world? Or shall they drive me to Jesus Christ, who will give me the victory?—Theodore L. Cuyler.

How We Grow

Growing out of sin is not a part of true Christian growth. Yet to many of us it is to be feared, the seeking to lay aside one sin after another seems to be of chief importance in our growth. But sin is a foreign element, which has no true place in the growth of a Christian; for the Christian ought to be one who has "died to sin." No man can grow out of sin; there is but one thing to do with it; let the omnipotent power of the blood of Christ blot it out, and then let true growth commence and go on, unhindered by the disease. Our example in Christian growth, as in all else, we find in the Lord Jesus. Sin had no part in His life. He was the one child that received all teaching perfectly, taking the real worth out of each experience, and turning the truth into life. While we cannot here be like Him in His sinlessness, we can nevertheless be freed completely by Him from the power of sin; and the growth He would have us know is growth that is free from the power of sin. Shall we let Him purge out the disease, and give up trying to grow out of it? Only thus shall we be ready to use aright our privilege of growing in grace.—Sunday School Times.

"The most manifest sign of wisdom is a continual cheerfulness; her state is like that of things in the regions above the moon, always clear and serene."—Montaigne.

Disciples Table Talk

N. S. Haynes and Illinois Disciple History.

John R. Golden, of Springfield, Ill., writes as follows concerning the annual meeting of the State Historical Society, which has just closed at Springfield: "The Disciples were well represented on the program by Prof. O. B. Clark of Des Moines, Ia., and N. S. Haynes of Decatur, Ill. Mr. Haynes read a most excellent paper on the early history of the Disciples of Christ in Illinois and their attitude to slavery. It was one of the best papers presented and proves the writer to be a historian. Mr. Haynes is now preparing a history of The Disciples of Christ and their work in Illinois which will be completed and ready for the market early in the next year. As a member of the committee on history I have read a part of the manuscript and can say it will rank with any history of a religious people. This most excellent paper will be presented in the book, somewhat revised. There are some churches that have not given their history. Much of the early history is in the minds of the older members and if not secured soon will be lost forever. I urge on every Disciple in the state to see that the history of the congregation where you are a member is reported, or if you were a member of some early church and know the early history give your information to N. S. Haynes, Decatur, Ill."

Bowling Green, Ky., Church Dedicates.

The new First Church, Bowling Green, Ky., of which B. F. Cato is pastor, was dedicated May 11. E. L. Powell of Louisville, delivered the dedicatory sermon, taking as his theme, "The Meaning of High Experience." In the afternoon a memorial service was held at 2:15 o'clock, and at 3 o'clock a congratulatory service, when addresses were delivered by ministers of the various Protestant churches of Bowling Green. Dr. Powell preached in the evening on "The Significance of the Cross." Monday evening Carey E. Morgan, of Nashville, preached. Tuesday was college night, and addresses were made by Dr. H. H Cherry, president of the Western Kentucky State Normal School, and Prof. J. S. Dickey, president of the Bowling Green Business University. Wednesday the dedicatory exercises closed in the evening with a union prayer-meeting.

W. H. Book on Non-Missionary "Churches."

The church is not a church, or at least not a Christian Church, if it is not missionary, according to W. H. Book of Columbus, who strongly denounced all opposition to missionary enterprises in a toast at the banquet held at the College of Missions in Irvington during the annual convention of the churches of Indiana. "A church that does not have in its midst a miniature Christ lacks an acquaintance with the real Christ," declared Mr. Book. "A church that does not have human saviors has yet to come in contact with the real Savior. When Christ comes into the church and the church gets into Christ, the fact will be known, it will not be a mere state of being, for the church will hold its missionary endeavors above all else."

Central, Spokane, in Home Mission Work.

The following clipping from a Spokane daily tells of some praiseworthy work that is being done by the Central Church of Spokane for the uplift of foreigners in that city: "A Chinese mission is to be opened under the auspices of the Central Christian church, Sunday afternoon at 503 Third avenue, the first door west of the Central Christian church. Classes will be started in English, bookkeeping and music to meet at 7 o'clock each evening. The instructors will be volunteer workers from the congregation of the Central Christian church. A reading table and literature are to be supplied. Every Sunday afternoon J. E. Davis will hold a service at the mission, speaking through an interpreter, Wying Ho, a student at the Lewis and Clark high school. This work is being started at the request of local Chinese, who are giving it financial support. Among those backing the enterprise are Henry Chow, a Trent avenue tailor; William Eng, a barber; Thomas Wing and Yuck Lee. A Russian mission is also to be opened for night classes which will be held in the parlors of the Central church. The instruction will be much the same as given in the Chinese mission, and by the same instructors, on alternating nights. The Chinese mission, it is expected, will open with an attendance of twelve or fifteen and the Russian with an attendance of five. The instruction will be principally in articulation and pronunciation. There will also be instruction in penmanship and the keeping of simple accounts and in the singing of hymns."

Joseph C. Todd Sees City's Challenge.

"The city is rising as a challenge to the church and the church must meet the challenge," said Joseph C. Todd, president, in his annual address at the Indiana Missionary Association at Indianapolis. His subject was "The Disciples in Indiana." He outlined the responsibilities of the church to its membership and to its proportion of the unchurched population of the state, urging the need of high grade and better paid men in the ministry and the church organization. President Todd recommended a social and rural life commission to investigate and recommend action to meet these problems demanding the attention of the church. "There are about one hundred and forty thousand members of the church in Indiana today," he said, "representing a population of men, women and children of no fewer than 200,000 souls. Besides these there are 160,000 others from the non-church members of the state which represent our proportionate responsibility of the citizenship now out of the church. We are responsible for these religiously, especially the membership. We are responsible for what they become or do not become. In the city it is heard on every hand that the church is not meeting the great human and deep soul needs of the day. The country church and country and village life problems are arising as a menace to us at the back, while the city problem rises before us. To meet this need our state convention should at this session, take steps to create an efficient commission on social service and the rural church."

The Country Church Problem Again.

The importance of the country church and how to revive it from decay occupied the greater part of one of the sessions of the Indiana State Convention, at Indianapolis. Clair S. Adams, Decatur, Ill., a field worker of the department of church and country life of the board of home missions of the Presbyterian church, spoke on the general subject, "The Country Church." He said the Presbyterian church had one thousand vacant pulpits it could not fill with the type of men thought desirable. He called attention to the fact that in Illinois alone there were 1,600 abandoned country churches, and to show the meaning of this to the church, he cited the finding of Newell Dwight Hillis, that 85 per cent of the names in "Who's Who in America" were of men who were country-born and that nine-tenths of the ministers drawn by the church were from rural districts, from the rural churches. Aside from this phase of the situation, he called attention to the fact that a majority of the population was country population, which should be reached by the church.

J. Campbell White at Toronto.

E. E. Elliott, national secretary of the Brotherhood Movement, is in receipt of a letter from J. Campbell White, general secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, accepting an invitation to speak at the Brotherhood banquet, at Toronto, on the evening of October 1st next. Mr. White is one of the famous men in the missionary world to-day, and the Brotherhood movement is to be congratulated upon securing such an eminent speaker for this banquet session. One of the best addresses of the Louisville convention was that delivered by Dr. J. E. Williams, of Nankin, China, on "The Awakening of the Chinese Republic." Mr. White's address at Toronto will be no less timely than Dr. Williams' address at Louisville. Mr. White's address will be timely from another standpoint, and that is from the standpoint of the Missionary Educational Movement which is to be undertaken in all of our churches, beginning this fall.

Warren, O., Looks Backward and Forward.

The last service to be held in the old building, at Warren, O., E. A. Hibler, pastor, was made a notable one. On the evening of May 20 this service was held. A banquet for men opened the evening. At the open meeting which followed, E. B. Wakefield, pastor of this congregation from 1883 to 1890, gave an interesting address of a reminiscent nature. Also J. M. Van Horn, who ministered at Warren from 1890 to 1901 and Judge Charles Fillius, long associated with the work, talked. V. C. Thompson and the present pastor followed with "Visions of the Future." Meetings will be held in the opera house after May 25, until the new building is ready.

Church With a Record Dedicates.

The church at Pleasant Hill, Ore., dedicated its new $3,600 building May 11. This church was organized August 4, 1850. For twenty-five years the congregation worshiped in a school house. From there they moved into the building just vacated, in which they worshiped for thirty-eight years. This historic church (the first religious organization in the county) has been a perpetual light bearer through all these sixty-three years. They have failed but once to assemble either in the church or in the grove, to partake of the Lord's Supper each Lord's day. Evangelist J. B. Holmes conducted the dedicatory services. Every dollar raised was either in cash or bankable bonds.

L. C. Oberlies with Lincoln Church.

L. C. Oberlies, State Bible-school superintendent of Nebraska, has been secured to act as assistant to the pastor and to take charge of the church finances, at the First Church, Lincoln, where H. H. Harmon ministers. Mr. Oberlies will give only part time to this work.

The Sixth District, Missouri, reports its "best convention," May 12, 13 at Macon, where Alfred Munyon ministers. As leaders, G. A. Campbell, Hannibal; W. D. Endres, Kirksville; H. B. Robison, Canton: W. A. Shullenberger, Mexico; and Secretaries Lawrence, Doherty, Briney and Reid, and A. R. Liverett of Jefferson City, were present. An attendance of 164 delegates and visitors is reported. The Sixth District officers have taken up in earnest the work of recognizing and interesting the smaller churches and their ministers, and are already seeing results. On program, counsel, and committee an attempt is being made to give these their rightful place. Next year's convention will meet at Centralia, C. H. Swift, pastor.

Sixth District, Missouri, has an agreement with the American and Missouri boards that if the total combined offerings for Home and State Missions (they are to be taken together, and remitted to the Cincinnati office) equal $4,000, the latter will assume the support of the District Superintendent of Missions. J. P. Rowlison occupies the office at present, and is doing most satisfactory work. Up to May 9 the money received by the American Board from the district amounted to only $459.17, coming from seventeen out of the 265 churches of the district. The secretary-treasurer, B. H. Cleaver, of Shelbina, asks the remaining congregations not to slight the matter, but maintain the district's honor by helping to reach the aim.

Leland W. Porter, whose resignation from the work at Helena, Mont., takes effect July 1, takes this step with a view to securing a position in the East favorable to the continuation of his studies. The elders of the Helena church speak highly of Mr. Porter as man, preacher and citizen. Mrs. Porter is a woman of high character and is a singer and elocutionist of merit. The board of the church at Lewistown, Mont., where Mr. Porter has just closed a meeting, speak of Mr. and Mrs. Porter as "consecrated, earnest, fearless workers for the Master," and speak highly of Mr. Porter's ability as a preacher.

"Last Sunday was one of the busiest days of my life as a preacher. At nine o'clock I married a couple at the pastor's study. At 9:30 I was in the great Sunday-school. At 10:15 I was preaching a sermon to the Sunday-school. At 10:45 our morning service began, and I preached again. At 1 o'clock I was at another wedding, and at 7:45 I preached again! And I am still alive to tell the story!—R. G. F." This item is clipped from the "Christian Visitor," the weekly paper of the church at Liberty, Mo., where R. G. Frank ministers.

The Seminary House, Baltimore, Md., held its commencement exercises May 25-30, at the Christian Temple. Dean Peter Ainslie delivered the Baccalaureate sermon May 25; May 27 was "Seminary Night"; May 28 was given to the Class Day exercises, and May 29 to the Commencement exercises, on which occasion diplomas were conferred upon the twelve graduates, and the address delivered by Dr. Oliver W. Huckel, Minister Associate Congregational Church, Baltimore. On May 30 will occur the Seminary Banquet.

Eugene Bible University, Eugene, Ore., held its commencement exercises May 18-21, at First Church. The Baccalaureate sermon was delivered by S. R. Hawkins, of Portland, and the ordination service conducted by J. S. McCallum. On Alumni Day, Chas. C. Curtis, of Dallas, Ore., gave the address. At the commencement exercises, May 21, Pres. P. L. Campbell, of the University of Oregon, spoke, and F. W. Emerson, of Albany, Ore., addressed the graduating class. Pres. E. C. Sanderson conferred the degrees.

At the annual convention of the Third District, Mo., recently held at Greenfield, the following officers were elected for the new year: F. L. Moffett, Springfield, president; Barclay Meador, Lebanon, vice president; E. W. Bowers, Springfield, secretary-treasurer and J. H. Jones, Springfield, superintendent of missions of the district. One of the most interesting features of the convention was an address by Clair S. Adams, of Decatur, Ill., who spoke on home and rural life.

Eleven hundred and nine attended Sunday-school at First Church, Akron, Ohio, May 18, with 385 in the Brotherhood Class, taught by the pastor, L. N. D. Wells. There were four additions to the church on that day. The evening services are taxing the capacity of the building, auditorium and Sunday-school combined. The Buckley Post of the Grand Army of the Republic were guests of this congregation on the evening of May 25.

The Scandinavian evangelistic campaign was inaugurated at Minneapolis May 18, under the leadership of D. E. Olson and C. F. Osterhus. Over $71,000 has been received in cash and pledges to pay for the $16,000 church which was dedicated Lord's day and to establish a Bible college for Scandinavians. The sudden death of the contractor a few days ago prevented the laying of the corner stone for the college as announced. Work will go forward soon.

W. Garnett Alcorn, pastor at Monroe City, Mo., writes under date of May 16: "The Sunday-school and church at this place, using the annual budget plan, raised for all our interests, last Sunday, $500. Since we made our last offering, in 1912, we have built a beautiful $1,800 parsonage and provided for a new $200 carpet for the church. We feel in the light of this that our little band of disciples has done excellently."

The annual convention of the churches in Montana will be held at Missoula, June 10-12, where H. H. Griffis ministers. "Special guests" will be: Miss Annette Newcomer, State Corresponding Secretary of Iowa; Mrs. Leland W. Porter, Elocution Instructor in Montana Wesleyan University, A. McLean; J. N. McCash and L. C. Oberlies. H. H. Griffis, Missoula, is president of the convention.

The Oregon churches will hold their annual convention at Turner, June 19-29. The program will include addresses by F. D. Kershner, President of Texas Christian University; I. N. McCash; A. McLean; J. H. Mohorter, and Miss Annette Newcomer. The corresponding secretary of the convention is C. F. Swander, 709 E. Taylor street, Portland, Ore.

A. L. Cole, pastor at Carthage, Ill., reports a delightful banquet managed by his men's Bible-class March 9. A hundred men listened to fine addresses by the following: Dr. J. Frank Young, president of the Ministerial Association of Carthage on "Backbone"; Judge C. J. Scofield, on "Boneheads"; C. L. DePew, on the Sunday-school. Mr. Cole himself filled the role of "Arbiter Elegantiarum."

The Christian Endeavor society of the Pacific Avenue Church, Spokane, captured the honor banner for the fifth time in six months, at the monthly meeting of all of the Endeavor societies of the city, held at the Central Church. More than 150 delegates were present. The Pacific Avenue delegation won the banner on attendance and general efficiency.

A card has just arrived, signed by "The Bolenge Missionaries," which reads as follows: "Bolenge, Africa, March 30, 1913. Baptized thirty the 25th in the Ubangi and forty-three here today. On March 5 we celebrated the tenth anniversary of the organization of the church here. There is at present a membership of 1,405."

Prof. Frank Garrett and family at Nankin, China, will leave June 14 on the S. S. Mongolia for the United States for a furlough. Mr. Garrett says, "The work continues favorably in all lines. There were nine baptisms in the church at Nankin two weeks ago. There will be others soon. The school is growing most satisfactorily."

Stirred into activity by rumors of the possible loss of J. H. O. Smith to the city and church, the official board of trustees of the First Christian Church, Oklahoma City, at a special meeting passed resolutions pledging its continued support of Dr. Smith's work and urging him to continue his service in that field.

A special exercise, "Our Nation's Glories and Perils," has been prepared by the A. C. M. S. for the use of Christian Endeavor societies, in the interest of home missions, June 29, that being Christian Endeavor home mission day. Programs and literature will be furnished gratis by the A. C. M. S., Carew Bldg., Cincinnati.

Miss Lillian Proefrock, Edgar A. Johnston, and Dr. Wm. A. Frymire, recently appointed missionaries to Africa, expect to sail from New York about August 1, reaching the Congo the middle of September. W. L. Burner and wife who are to take up the work at Matanzas, Cuba, will reach that field sometime in August.

The new church at Colfax, Ind., was dedicated May 4. The building was erected at a cost of $15,000, and at the dedicatory service a balance of $9,000 was to be raised. Over $10,000 was easily secured by the efficient service of F. M. Rains and others. The building is of shale brick, with trimmings of Bedford stone.

The First Church building, Turtle Creek, Pa., was destroyed by an explosion May 12. Fifteen persons were injured. A score of persons had gathered at the church preparatory to a lecture to be given by Rabbi Rudolph I. Coffee of Pittsburg, to the members of the Westinghouse Casino Technical school.

On the program of the Sixth District, Mich., convention, held at Flint, Mich., were the following, among others: H. C. Haight, Flint; Miss Bell Davenport, Saginaw; S. O. Landis, Flint; H. W. Spetler, Easton; Mrs. D. A. Bentley, Saginaw; J. F. Green, Flint; C. B. Frampton, Durand; C. J. Tannar, Detroit.

Eleventh District, Indiana, at its recent convention held at Covington, elected the following officers for the new year: President, George Rader, Hartsville; vice-president, R. S. Rains, East Columbus; secretary-treasurer, Miss Mary Utter, Hartsville; Sunday-school superintendent, A. H. Jordan, Greensburg.

There were added to the New York City mission churches during April, eight by baptism and two by letter. There are enrolled in the mission Bible-schools 849 and in the churches, 335. It is evident the success of the work will be determined very largely by the Sunday-school's efficiency.

Three congregations in Georgia are worshiping in new houses. East Point, a suburb of Atlanta, has completed its building at a cost of $10,000; Jefferson paid $7,500 for its new church; and Cortes Hill, in the rural community, cost $4,500. All of these are products of home missionary activity.

J. B. Holmes, evangelist, is supplying for three months at Forest Grove, Ore. If all is satisfactory, Mr. Holmes will take the work here permanently. C. H. Hilton leaves the church June 8. The latter preached the Memorial Sermon at Forest Grove, May 25.

F. N. Duty, First Church, Charleroi, Pa., will deliver the Baccalaureate sermon for the high school in that city, June 1, his theme being "The Diversity of Gifts." The men of Mr. Duty's congregation held their first annual banquet May 23, with about 150 men present.

The convention of the Fifth District of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society will be held in Havana, Ill. June 4-5. A good program will be given and the church at Havana invites the people of the Fifth District to attend. Ralph Callaway is the pastor of the church.

May 11 closed the fifth year of E. C. Wigmore's pastorate at Springfield, Ore. He will continue there indefinitely, it is reported. This commencement will close his tenth year of teaching in the Eugene Bible University. He will be on the faculty next year.

The Flatbush (New York City) congregation has closed the contract for the erection of their new church and the work is being pushed with vigor. They are now busy planning a campaign to raise at least $15,000 in ten days for their building fund.

Ground has been broken for the Mexican mission on Prospect Hill, San Antonio, Tex., which will be built under the direction of Central Church, and will be for the benefit of the Mexicans residing in San Antonio. Hugh McLellan ministers at the Central.

The Zanesville, Ohio, church was sorely stricken by the flood, many members losing all. Hugh Wyatt, the minister, has worked unceasingly in getting the church repaired and holding the people together. They expected to reach normal attendance May 18.

E. P. Wise, minister of First Church, East Liverpool, Ohio, was a member of the arbitration board which settled the pottery girls' strike there in favor of the girls. They are to receive increased wages and the conditions of the factory are to be improved.

A store building has been rented for the church at Newark, N. J., and the work is being continued by G. B. Patmont. The steps to provide a permanent place of meeting will not be taken, until Louis Patmont returns from his trip to Russia.

There is a movement on foot in Benton Harbor, Mich., to unite Baptist and Christian churches into one great Church of Christ. Building operations are delayed, pending the outcome of the conference of committees from each church.

The Sunday-school at Warren, Ohio, recently celebrated its anniversary. Geo. R. Godfrey, the superintendent twenty-eight years ago, was in charge of the service. A history of the first session of the school from Mr. Godfrey, proved interesting.

The Flint, Mich., Christian Endeavor Society holds the state record for the largest proportionate gain in membership and also for the number gained last year. The banners were captured at the recent C. E. convention held at Flint.

J. P. Duffy has an enrollment in his class of eighty-nine young men, in Central School, Terre Haute, Ind., forty-seven being state Normal students, twelve Polytechnic students, several others coming from Brown's Business College.

A movement is on foot to unite the Baptist and First Christian churches of Santa Cruz, Cal. Committees have been appointed by both churches which have been meeting to see what can be done to effect a union of these churches.

The Lindenwald Church, Hamilton, Ohio, though its members suffered the loss of thousands of dollars' worth of property, sent an offering of $18.35 for home missions. Last year the same congregation gave $6.50.

The church at Lancaster, O., I. J. Cahill, minister, has subscribed $1,345 to cover improvements planned. The annex to the building arranged for will double the capacity of the church for work.

William Woods College, Fulton, Mo., announces its Commencement exercises for May 25-29, in the D. M. Dulany Auditorium. Twenty-eight will be graduated this year from this institution.

To Indiana Churches

The offering for home missions is now due. If arrangements have not been made to take the offering later please attend to the matter now, and send the money promptly to the A. C. M. S., 108 Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio. Churches that have adopted the Budget System and remit quarterly should not let May pass without calling attention in a special way to home missions. An opportunity should also be given for special contributions to home missions. We should have offerings from 400 churches this year.

The local committee of our State Convention prepared a very pretty souvenir program for the delegates. There are a number left on hand. We will be glad to furnish these to churches, postage paid, for ten cents each.

Children's Day

Sunday, June 1, is a glad day in all our Zion. It is Children's Day for Heathen Missions. It is widely observed. It will be more generally observed this year than ever before. It is a rallying point; it helps to register the growth and real significance of the school. Of course, there will be songs and flowers and good cheer as becometh hopeful Christian people. Let due emphasis, however, be placed upon large offerings to extend the Kingdom of our Lord in dark places of the earth.

It will be remembered that Children's Day for Heathen Missions was first observed by our Sunday-schools in 1881. Since that time the children have given $1,201,806. They delight to share the good things which they possess with those who have them not. Think of our great Sunday-schools in Nankin, Chuchow, Wuhu, Shanghai and other points in China. Remember all our Sunday-schools in Japan, and India, and the great school at Bolenge, Africa, not to mention other fields. We organize more than one new school every week on virgin soil. We have over 18,000 in Sunday-schools on the foreign fields and there was a gain of over 2,000 last year.

The Children's Day offerings of the past helped to make these things possible. As we multiply the offerings light will spring up, hope will be generated, and goodness and purity will fill the lands.

If you have not ordered Children's Day supplies, please attend to it today. Address Stephen J. Corey, Sec., Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Home Mission Notes

Friends of American missions are anxious about the May offering. Returns from churches which do not have the budget method show fifty have given more than last year; fifty-three gave less; eight the same amounts; and sixty-six churches have given which sent no offering last year.

Conditions in the middle West produced by floods have greatly militated against the offerings. We are several thousand dollars short of amounts received at the same time last year.

Brethren, we urge you to not neglect the May offering. If you have taken it, please remit to the office at once; if you have not given your congregation a chance to make its contribution, do so without fail. The Home Board is doing its utmost with the means at its disposal and it needs funds to sustain its work. "Come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty."

I. N. McCash.

Lexington School of Methods, June 16-27

Kentucky's big Disciple event will be the Lexington School of Methods to be held at the College of the Bible, June 16-27. Matriculants are expected from all over Kentucky and, indeed, from other states. Sixty lectures will be given. Among the lecturers will be Professor A. W. Fortune, Professor C. W. Bower, Professor S. M. Jefferson, President E. Y. Mullins of the Southern Baptist Seminary at Louisville, Miss Hazel Lewis, national elementary superintendent, Ellis B. Barnes, W. J. Clarke, I. J. Spencer, who has just returned from Palestine. Among the subjects to be handled will be the New Testament, Religious Education, Elementary Work, Church History, Missions, Organizations and Management, The Holy Land. Demonstrations of all kinds and parties will be steered through the local Bible-schools for observational work.

Walter E. Frazee of the Kentucky Bible-school Association, under whose auspices the school is to be given, will be dean. He is proving himself a bunch of energy, and every present indication foretells the success of the school. Reservations are coming in from everywhere. Matriculants will be quartered in beautiful Hamilton College, the young ladies' seminary of Transylvania University. Lectures will be at the College of the Bible, and if that big building proves too small Morrison Chapel will be pressed into service. Dean Frazee has a plot of Hamilton College, showing 148 rooms to be reserved. Write him to-day for your reservation. The school will be a Home Coming for many a Lexington graduate. Last year the first annual school was held at Morehead, Ky., in a remote section of the state. Not less than 179 matriculated. At Lexington with all its superior advantages there should be not less than 500 matriculated. The courses offered by Professors Fortune and Bower alone will prove immensely popular. Much interest will center in Professor Fortune as this will be the first time the general public will have an opportunity of seeing this brilliant professor at first hand, since his election to the chair of the New Testament in the College of the Bible.

Dean Frazee appointed a local Lexington committee of boosters who are co-operating with the dean's Louisville office in making the event a magnificent one. The local boosters are J. W. Porter, Mrs. Anna Hawkins, Mrs. J. W. Withers, Mrs. F. A. Barr, Mrs. J. M. Hopkins, and Miss Mamie Phelps. Dean Frazee conferred with this committee on May 22 at Central Christian Church, Lexington. Arrangements were perfected. Dean Frazee addressed the students both at Hamilton College and the College of the Bible just before his conference with the local committee.

The Lexington School of Methods may become a permanent Lexington event of the Kentucky Disciples. It is the logical place, as remarked by I. J. Spencer of Central Christian Church. The whole period June 16-27 may be enjoyed for the sum of $8.00, including the matriculation fees. How is that for reducing the high cost of living? Can you beat that at home? Write to-day to Walter E. Frazee, 706 Realty Building, Louisville, Ky. Obey that good impulse now, and get your reservation in time.

THE WORLD'S GREAT FIELD was covered by the FAMOUS MOODY & SANKEY HYMNS.

HALLOWED HYMNS NEW AND OLD

is a worthy successor, edited by Ira Allan Sankey, son of the great singing evangelist Ira D. Sankey.

Frank E. Wilder, well known choir leader, Providence, R. I., says: "My library contains nearly all the leading 'Gospel Hymn' books from all publishers since the famous 'Moody & Sankey' books, and I know you will agree that many of them are excellent. I have carefully examined your HALLOWED HYMNS and with 25 years' experience I want to say candidly that I consider it marks a distinct step in advance. Our people are highly pleased and personally I consider it the best book in my library of some 50 volumes of Gospel Songs."

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointed by churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

Literature and Child-Training

Some one has said, "Let who will make the laws of a nation; give me to write their songs." It might almost be said, "Let who will preach the sermons the children hear and teach their lessons; give me to direct the literature that goes into their hands." For what a child reads has a subtle influence over him; sermons and lesson talks he is often wary of. Only in recent years have our schools given due attention to the literature they are putting before their pupils. Now, they are asking, not "Who publishes it?" but, "Where can I get the best that's published?" * * * Have you decided upon your literature for next quarter? A good business man investigates many lines before buying. We trust you will write us for information concerning our full line of supplies.

The Holy City

John saw a Holy City.

Did anyone else ever see such a thing?

One is tempted to say that a Holy City is something which no other man on earth ever has been able to discover.

Cain built the first city.

The builders of cities have often been murderers.

A city is a murderous place. Juggernauts run wildly through its streets. Towers of Babel ascend with fatal rapidity. The rush of the sidewalks is the pace that kills.

Where shall one find a Holy City? Chicago? No. It is enterprising, fascinating, but it is big and barbarous and dirty. New York? No. It is awe-inspiring, but it is covetous and hard of heart and iniquitous. London? No. It is vast, monstrous, cruel and shamefully sinful.

Shall we go to Rome and seek for holiness at that shrine of Christian faith? We shall find much there to interest us, but much also to depress and appall us. It is a place of avarice and hypocrisy. It is not a Holy City.

Shall we journey to Jerusalem? It is a town that cannot be truthfully described in polite society. Unspeakable filth is in its streets, bitter hatred shames the name of its contending religions.

When cities call each other sinful it is a case of the pot calling the kettle black.

Mohammed emerging from the desert saw Damascus in the distance and it rŏse before him like a dream of beauty. He turned back and would not enter it, saying that no man could enter more than one heaven. Mohammed was a wise man. Almost anyone who has really entered Damascus can think of abundant reasons for commending the discretion of the prophet.

There is no Holy City. There never has been one. Is there ever to be one?

Most people seem to think not. Even those who read the Bible and delight to think of the New Jerusalem, attribute that glory to heaven. But nothing can be more certain than the fact that John was not thinking about heaven. The Holy City which he saw was one to be established on the earth. It was a vision of regenerate society. It was a vision of the glory of God achieved in human institutions.

He spoke of it as a city because a city is a place where people live together and he thought of it as a place large enough to take in everyone. Except for this he might as well have called it a village or a farm.

The Holy City as John saw it was a place in which men and women could establish all the institutions of life in abiding righteousness. It was a place where love was to dominate the traffic, where the old cruel, grasping spirit was to vanish from commerce, and men were to live together in a spirit of Christlike brotherliness.

The realization of such a city does not depend upon vast numbers of people. It is not a matter of population but of principle. It is not a question of a score or a million, it is a mere matter of learning to live together in the spirit of Christ.

John named his city. He called it the New Jerusalem. Jerusalem was the first big town he had ever seen, the city which his boyish imagination had pictured as full of grandeur. It was also the city of his first great disillusionment. It was inevitable that he should name the city which he saw out of his own experience and vision.

But we could almost wish he had left it unnamed. People have been quite ready to suppose that Jerusalem was its only and inevitable name. The very reverse is true. John named the city he saw and we have quite as good a right to name our vision as he had.

We are entirely at liberty to discover our own Holy City coming down from God out of heaven, and give it its name. We are permitted to name it as John did after something that we know.

The City of God is to be established wherever people learn to live together in the love of Jesus Christ.

The Holy City may as well be located in your neighborhood as anywhere.

There is no reason why it should be remote from the place where you live.

When men and women begin to live together in the spirit of Jesus Christ, the Holy City establishes a new ward or precinct.

Whenever the people of any community determine that they will move unitedly toward any worthy end, there has been an election day in the Holy City.

There will be beauties and wonders in heaven; but God intends that men shall learn to live together here in the spirit of heaven. It is the divine plan that the spirit of Jesus shall come into all human relationships. Then the Holy City, which now is up in heaven and is not needed there, will descend.

Is there any place in your neighborhood into which it could descend?

Four Right Angles of Christian Service

It was natural that those who heard the preaching of Peter on the day of Pentecost and believed the good news should come to him and the rest of the apostles for instruction. They would be anxious to know how Jesus lived, what he taught, and what manner of men his disciples should be. The apostles were specialists. They had been with Jesus as no one else had and they had something to impart that was worth while. The students came of their own accord. It was not necessary to hunt them up and beg them to enter the school of the apostles.

The school is the place for systematic study. Its aim is to lead the student to discover new facts and distinctions and the place of each item of experience in the system of experience. Common facts are made to possess new meanings. The difficulty of teaching religion is that so many of us mistake a superficial acquaintance with facts for knowledge. This is true of those who come forward as teachers as well as of those who take the seat of the learner. We need the spirit of the child. We should never treat as commonplace the most familiar facts of religious experience but, on the contrary, we should come to the consideration of them with the expectation that new aspects will be disclosed.

The Bible cannot be understood by the Christian unless he knows many things that are not in the Bible. It is our business to be followers of Jesus in the twentieth century. We must therefore, know the world as it now is. The geography of the United States and of China, India, and Japan, should be as much a part of the curriculum of religious teaching as the geography of Palestine. What is the advantage in knowing Palestine if we are ignorant of the rest of the world? The customs of living men are as interesting as those of the dead. Our study of the life of Christ and of his teaching is abstract and unprofitable if we neglect to know the times in which we live.

The word fellowship emphasizes the fact that the Christian lives with and for others. Mutual aid is the very life of the Christian community. We do not learn what it is to follow Christ by listening to a few highly trained specialists as they discourse on the ethics of Christianity and the religious experience of Jesus. We need the specialist but we have greater need of the help that comes from the fellowship of all the disciples of the Lord. If we have fellowship one with another, we share material as well as spiritual goods. We do not allow the needy to suffer. We use our money that the children of the poor may be trained for effective lives. The financially dependent we endeavor to make independent by offering them opportunity and by teaching them how to use their opportunities.

The communion service was a prominent means of grace to the early church. It is not easy for us to realize its importance to an Oriental. For him eating with another has moral implications. We sit at a lunch counter with a man whom we have never seen before and we have not the slightest feeling of obligation because we eat together. We are just as ready to beat him in a horse trade as we were before. When we sit together at the Lord's supper, we ought to consider that we are pledging support one to another. It is communion with Christ we are seeking but how shall we commune with him unless we feel that we belong to his people and that we must share their lot, bear their burdens, help them to be delivered from their sins, and rejoice unselfishly in their prosperity?

How is public prayer regarded in the average church? How do the people feel when the minister says, "Let us pray?" Much depends upon the person who does the praying. If he gives all his attention to the preparation of his sermon and thinks of the prayer as a preliminary to the sermon, he will not help many in his congregation when he prays. Prayer is an intellectual exercise. Fervor loses nothing by being connected with clear ideas and chaste language. When the disciples heard Jesus in prayer they asked him to teach them how to pray. Convention addresses on the importance of prayer are of far less importance than genuine pulpit prayers. Spontaneousness in prayer, like spontaneousness in the sermon, is the result of much study. Knowledge of what life is and acquaintance with those who have lived well and prayed fervently will help us to offer the prayer of faith as it ought to be offered. There is power in the church that knows how to pray. (Midweek Service, June 11. Acts 2:42, 44, 46; 20:7; Eph. 6:18.) S. J.

A Neglected Treasure

The newspapers recently told the story of a man in New Jersey who was about to move to the west, and was undecided what to do with a large Bible he had inherited from an aunt. For the first time in thirty-five years he opened the brass clasps, and found within nearly three thousand pieces of paper money, ranging in value from ten cents to ten dollars. The smaller bills were of the old fractional currency common during the war and for a number of years afterward, some of which may command a premium. The total amount of the money was $4,867, and it had lain idle for thirty-five years since the aunt, dying, left her Bible to this nephew.

A number of similar incidents have occurred from time to time, and they point their own moral. Not only was the use of the money lost to the man who had inherited it, but the principal might easily have been lost to him, either through continued neglect till he had died and left it to another, or by careless disposition of the book without examination. Yet this may not have been the greatest loss which the owner sustained or risked in the neglect of the Book. For within it are treasures of a rich legacy from the past, far too valuable to ignore.

Evidences are not lacking that popular ignorance of the Bible exists, and that to an extent wholly unjustifiable, even from a literary point of view. Young people mistake who assume that a knowledge of Norse legends and Greek mythology is superior as a mark of culture to the fine old narratives in the earlier books of the Bible, or that the history of Rome is more significant than that of Israel in its influence upon modern life, or that nobler works of biography are to be found than the lives of the men of the Bible.

Indeed, so interwoven are all branches of human knowledge with topics directly derived from Biblical knowledge and allusions, that a knowledge of the Bible stands at the front as a means of culture; and those who neglect it, do so to their harm.

But this is not the greatest loss in the neglect of the Bible. For the highest things in life are the things of the spirit. "The things which are not seen are eternal." To these, the deepest aspirations and hopes of human life, the Bible ministers as no other book. Let then the parable of the lost treasure hidden between the leaves of the brass-bound legacy preach its own little sermon of warning against the neglect of something still more precious in the Bible itself.

Legislative Passes

We commend the scrupulous virtue of the Illinois Legislature in its widely advertised attempt to remedy the evils of the pass system on railroads within the state, and no less do we applaud the skill with which they quietly emasculated the bill in committee so as to continue the issue of passes to members of the Legislature, their wives, and clerical assistants. Every man who had a share in this piece of political hypocrisy ought to be marked for defeat when next he comes before his constituency for election. Of all people who ought not to have passes from the railroads members of the legislature stand at the head. They, more than any one group of men, are in danger of being influenced in their official conduct by this petty bribe. Moreover, if members of the Legislature had to pay their own fare they probably would stick to their work and finish it, instead of spending four days of legislative week at home. The Illinois Legislature cannot plume itself on quite as much virtue as New Jersey, which undertook to cut off at one fell sweep, passes for the legislature and half-fare permits for clergymen, but reflected that reforms should proceed gradually and contented itself with cutting off the petty privileges which had been enjoyed by the clergy, and the legislators continued to ride on their free passes. Perhaps the Illinois Legislature would have done the same, but the railroads had already withdrawn this privilege from the clergy several years before. We are glad of it. Let ministers of the Gospel and members of the legislature all pay their fare. But if there be any valid reason why either might with propriety receive some small concession from the railroad companies, the argument is not in favor of the legislators.

Whose Well Was It?

A few weeks before his death, Joseph Parker, the famous London preacher, preached a sermon from the text, "Now Jacob's well was there." He spoke against the mania for travel which takes people far from home in quest of blessings which abound near at hand. He said Jacob never had a well; it was God's well. He said that the only thing that made a well significant was the water in it, and the water was God's; and he who had good water at home had little need to journey far to drink of the water which was made no better by the fact that Jacob dug the well. All that contains an element of truth. Yet it is not convincing. The water which was God's would have remained deep down in the rocks, but for the digging performed by Jacob. God willingly shares with Jacob the honor of the well that has remained well nigh four millenniums in the fertile valley of Shecham. And who would not go far to drink from the well where Jesus quenched his thirst, and where he taught the woman, and brought knowledge of his truth to the people of a village? The water was God's, but had it not been for Jacob and a poor woman, the Son of God would have sat thirsty at the foot of Mount Gerizim. The water was God's, but the well was Jacob's. It is our duty not only to drink of the brooks which we find by the way, but here and there to dig a well for those who come after us. God's water needs our digging.

A Hundred Years of Peace

The anniversaries of important battles are commonly made the occasion of national jubilation but only by the victorious nation. Next year, however, there will be an opportunity for the celebration of a triumph in which the two countries concerned may join, for they both won, that is, the centenary of the signing of the Treaty of Ghent, Dec. 24, 1814. Since then there has been unbroken peace along the Canadian American boundary, the longest undefended frontier in the world. The British Interparliamentary Union, under the presidency of the Rt. Hon. Viscount Weardale, has expressed its warmest sympathy with the movement which is being organized for the celebration of this hundred years of peace in the United States, Canada and Great Britain. The city of Ghent is also making preparations to have the event commemorated in the council chamber where the British and American plenipotentiaries negotiated this unusually successful treaty.

The Cost of War to Peaceful Nations

Since the beginning of the war in the Balkans there have been business failures in Austria amounting to over $16,000,000, exports to the Balkan States have fallen $20,000,000 in three months, and debts to the amount of over $18,000,000 remain unpaid because of the war. The industries of the country have suffered a serious set-back. The loss to the machine factories has been over $2,500,000 and the demand for textiles has decreased by a third. This inflicts an especially severe injury upon Austrian prosperity, since the textile manufactures are the most important in the country and employ 350,000 workers. It is not surprising that Austria wishes to see the war with Turkey ended and get back her market in Servia, Bulgaria and Montenegro.

Japan Missionaries on California Land Bill

The following is a copy of Resolutions sent by the American missionaries of Tokyo, Yokohama and vicinity to the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, April 24, 1913:

As American missionaries resident in Tokyo, Yokohama and vicinity, we have viewed with deep solicitude the news concerning the proposed land legislation in California and deprecate any discrimination against the Japanese lest it mar the friendship between Japan and America and work injury to both countries. Therefore,

Resolved, that we appeal to our missionary constituency in the home land, to the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, to the Federation of Churches in California, and to the Christian public sentiment of the nation in favor of just legislation.

Resolved, that we express our sincere appreciation of the earnest efforts of the President of the United States and the leading men of both countries, and record our firm belief that the true public sentiment of both lands will support them in securing an equitable and mutually satisfactory settlement.

Resolved, that copies of the above resolutions be sent to the Charge d' Affaires of the American Embassy in Tokyo, the Governor of California, the presiding officers of the two houses of the California legislature and to the officials of the above named religious organizations, also to the Associated Press and to leading newspapers in Japan.

Earnest office-seekers say it serves the President right. He shut 'em all out of the White House, and now he can't find enough men to fill the ambassadorships.—Philadelphia North American.

POEMS OF THE SOCIAL AWAKENING

What Do You Care?

Out to the mines in the chill of the morn,
Stunted, ill-nourished comes the forlorn
Stream of humanity—undersized men.
Slaving and toiling for life blood; but then,
Dressed warm and cosy, with slate, book, and rule,
George and your Nellie have started to school;
They are your children, their cheeks warm and fair,
While Tony's a hunky, so—What do you care?

Over the bridges, the hills, and the fen,
Streams the procession of undersized men
Climbing the stairs to the waiting machines;
Lowered in cages to death-marked ravines.
Look at their faces; sad, pinched and worn!
Look at their garments; threadbare and torn!
Look at their swagger, their precocious air,
Some mother's babies, but—What do you care?

Children of poverty, born to duress,
Cradled and nursed in the lap of distress;
Wearing the garments of manhood in youth;
Learning its vices but missing its truth.
Slaving and toiling in factory and pit,
Seeking their pittance wherever they'll fit,
Caged in the sweatshops and penned in the lair
Of tubercular poison, but—What do you care?

Tony's a hunky and Sammy's a wop,
Foreigners truly and aliens,—but stop!
Some woman bore them in travail and fear—
Somebody's children, to some mother, dear.
Think not because they're from poverty's stem
Some mother's heart is not breaking for them;
Or, 'cause they dwell in the vale of despair,
She does not love them, but—What do you care?

What do you care? the arraignment doth read.
What is your plea to the true-bill of greed?
What can you offer by way of defense?
You who judge lives by their value in cents.
Sponsor of slavery's misery-filled pen!
They are your chattels, these undersized men!
What will you say when the Judge, truly fair,
Cries, "These are my children, but—What did you care?"

—William Edward Ross in "Pearson's Magazine."

The Voice of the People

Oh, I hear the people calling through the day time and the night time;
They are calling, they are crying for the coming of the right time.
It behooves you, men and women—it behooves you to be heeding;
For there lurks a note of menace underneath their plaintive pleading.

Let the land usurpers listen, let the greedy-hearted ponder
On the meaning of the murmur, rising here and swelling yonder;
Swelling louder, waxing stronger, like a storm-fed stream that courses
Through the valleys, down abysses, growing, gaining with new forces.

Day by day the river widens, that great river of opinion,
And its torrent beats and plunges at the base of Greed's dominion.
Though you dam it by oppression and fling golden bridges o'er it,
Yet the day and hour advances when in fright you flee before it.

—Ella WheelerWilcox.

The extreme styles in women's wear find scant favor with royalty. Queen Mary has given it to be known that under no circumstances will any lady in the royal entourage be permitted to wear the slashed skirt; and the reports of the trousseau of the Princess Louise, daughter of the German Emperor, which has just been finished, is said to be "a marvel of modest simplicity." It includes no "hobbles" and no slit gowns, but everything is of simple elegance. The models that prove so popular in our country are said to be taken from the demimonde of Paris, and are not used by the really higher classes across the sea.

"When Bishop Meets Baptizer"

The Advance (Congregationalist, Chicago), printed a playful editorial upon the conference of Episcopalians and Disciples in New York City. That editorial was followed up on May 8, by a shorter one, which we herewith reproduce:

When Bishop Meets Baptizer.

Several communications have reached us concerning our serious editorial on the proposed union of the Episcopalians and Disciples. One reader says he did not know The Advance could be so funny. We can be funny on occasion, but it was not we who were funny; it was the situation. We thought with sincere interest of that gathering of the two committees in New York, and of the hospitable entertainment which the Episcopalians offered the Disciples, and of the frictionless result in which there glided through to passage and unanimous agreement a series of resolutions of which six were commonplaces and eleven had to do with bishops and ordination, and never a whisper about immersion; and we read with real interest the comment in the Episcopal papers hailing it as the dawn of a new day in church union. Also we looked in The Evangelist and The Standard, Disciple papers, to see what the editors of those journals, one of whom helped assent to the resolutions, would tell their readers about it. And behold, we have not discovered a word. And we think we can guess why. When the Disciples got home they read those resolutions again. And they reflected that it is a lot easier to sit in New York and smilingly accept a list of resolutions than it is to get a body like the Disciples, or for that matter the Episcopalians, to meet and unite.

When we consider the practical aspects of the matter, there rise before our imagination a Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States of America, a suave, courteous, well-groomed gentleman, and a good, healthy Kentucky backwoods Disciple preacher who plows corn during the week and preaches in his shirtsleeves. And we are considering how these two gentlemen would put those last eleven resolutions into effect. Reader, if you thought our former editorial funny, just think of this. Consider the Bishop, befrilled and petticoated, offering to lay hands on this lank and muscular preacher from the tall timber. And then consider the backwoods preacher offering to administer to the Bishop real apostolic baptism. The Bishop would need to remember the struggles of Antaeus, and keep both his feet on the ground. For he would need all the saints the Episcopalians know and perhaps the loan of a few from Rome in addition to help him out of the situation if ever the Kentucky brother got him as far as the stream.

We are trying to think about it with due solemnity. But when the Episcopal bishops set out to reordain the Disciples, and the Disciples remind the Episcopalians that in the earlier stages of this discussion they were very much interested in immersion and now must take something in exchange for the laying on of hands in apostolic succession, may we be there to see.

A Unique Ordination in Brooklyn

Rev. Doctor Nehemiah Boynton is the well-known pastor of the Clinton Avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. On May 14, his two sons, Edward C. and Russell Boynton were ordained to the Congregational ministry. In the laying on of hands, five different denominations were represented: Congregationalists, Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians and Unitarians. An attempt was made to have the Episcopalians represented also, but evidently the committee on arrangements have not kept up very much with current agitations in the Episcopal church. Of course, the Episcopalians, as things stand now, would have nothing to do with so debatable a thing as joining in with "schismatics" in an act of ordination. The question of apostolic succession loomed up too large. The Congregationalist (Boston) describes the very unusual ordination as follows:

Few ordinations have aroused as much interest as that held last week Wednesday, in the Clinton Avenue Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., when Edward Chadbourne Boynton and Morrison Russell Boynton, the two sons of the pastor, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, were ordained. An unusual feature was the participation of ministers of five denominations in the laying on of hands. Aside from the Congregationalists were Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians and Unitarians. A sixth denomination, the Dutch Reformed, was to have been represented, but the pastor was unable to attend and sent a letter of greeting to Dr. Boynton instead. An endeavor was made to have still another denomination, the Episcopal, but it was impossible to secure a representative. A gathering of such various denominations in connection with a Congregational or any other denominational ordination is unusual and perhaps unprecedented.

After the council in the afternoon, at which the two candidates presented their papers, setting forth their beliefs, which were unanimously voted to be satisfactory, the members of the council were entertained by Dr. Boynton at a dinner at the Hotel Mohawk.

At the evening service the church was filled with a fine congregation. Ministers and laymen of many denominations were present and bore witness to the dignity, and impressiveness and the significance of the service. After a beautiful choral service, Moderator L. T. Reed called attention to the unusual character of the council and the significance of other circumstances in connection with it—that among the greetings received were the cordial and fraternal letters from four churches which the pastor, Dr. Boynton, had served in previous years: the church in Littleton, Mass., the North of Haverhill, Mass., the Union of Boston and the First of Detroit. Then he said that it was an evidence of the power of the Christian church and a tribute to the home life of their pastor that he was presenting two sons for ordination into the ministry. Rev. George F. Chapin of Saxtons River, Vt., a great-uncle of the young men, who was himself licensed to preach the gospel in the Clinton Avenue Church fifty years ago by a group of men among whom were Drs. Storrs, Beecher, Budington, and Thompson, led the responsive reading of the Psalter selection, "Praise waiteth for thee, O God of Zion." An impressive sermon was preached by Pres. Albert Parker Fitch of Andover Theological Seminary from the text, "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." Rev. Dr. Albert J. Lyman made a most uplifting prayer of ordination. Those who laid their hands upon the candidates were Moderator Reed, President Fitch, Rev. George F. Chapin, their father, Dr. John E. Tuttle of the First Presbyterian Church, York, Pa.; Dean Fenn of Harvard, Rev. Dr. E. P. Farnham, superintendent of the Brooklyn and Queens Baptist Church Extension Society, and Rev. Dr. William I. Haven, Methodist, secretary of the American Bible Society.

The young candidates then put on the robes presented by their grandmothers, and stood before their father to receive his "charge," which was their request. This charge was one of the most forceful and sympathetic ever given to a young man at the moment of entering the service of Christ. Dr. Boynton spoke of his fellowship with them in the common sports of life, and of his having journeyed with them in spirit through their college life and his great joy that now they were entering into a new fellowship. He especially charged them to cultivate integrity, which was the fundamental characteristic of Jesus Christ. "I charge you to cultivate the intimacies of integrity with relation to your profession, to your service, to your joy, to the world," he said. "Be true, strong men, bringing a holy gospel to a broken world." The right hand of fellowship was given by Dr. R. W. McLaughlin, who addressed them with fine feeling. The closing prayer was by Rev. Edward Chadbourne Boynton, and the benediction was pronounced by his brother, Rev. Morrison Russell Boynton.

The Washington Ms.; a Sensational Find

On December 19, 1906, Charles L. Freer, an art collector of Detroit, Mich., while traveling around the world purchased from an Arab dealer, Ali in Gizeh, an old manuscript in the form of a bundle of sheets of vellum. When Mr. Freer got back home, he submitted the manuscript to Professor Sanders of Michigan. The professor has pronounced it to be an important manuscript of the Gospels, most of the sheets of which were certainly written in the fourth century. The conjecture is that it was written by a Coptic scribe in 400 A. D. If so, the manuscript will rank with the Sinaitic and the Vatican manuscripts. Mr. Freer intends to present his unsuspected treasure to the American people, placing it at Washington, and to call it the Washington Manuscript. One hundred copies of the sheets have been made. The plan is to present a copy to each university library in England, France, Germany and the United States. Union Theological Seminary already has been presented with one in New York City.

Search was made to ascertain its original resting place and all other possible details in regard to the manuscript. Through the dealer Mr. Freer got in touch with the supposed finders of the manuscript, who stated that they had obtained it from a certain monastery in Egypt. The exact spot where the manuscript was found is not yet disclosed, but the statements of the finders fix the place definitely and are consistent with the evidence that has been gathered. The only hint as to the origin or former owner found in the manuscript itself is a prayer for a certain Timothy. This is associated with the Church of Timothy in the monastery of the Vine-Dresser, located near the third Pyramid. The manuscript is written on parchment of sheep and goat skins. The text is all intact, but the document has suffered from age and exposure. A bit of wood was found in the manuscript as a book mark, and it had been rebound at least once. One scribe is credited with writing the entire manuscript, except the first sixteen pages of John. The manuscript was protected by two wooden panels. On them the evangelists are depicted in the order in which their gospels appear in the text—Matthew, John, Luke and Mark. The last named is labelled by an inscription placed vertically beside his figure and to the left of Luke may be detected the last few letters of his name.

Bishop W. C. Doane Dead

The Right Reverend W. C. Doane, the picturesque bishop of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of Albany, died on May 17. He was perhaps the most picturesque figure in Albany, N. Y. For years, he affected the sartorial style of English bishops, wearing the Episcopal apron and gaiters just as they are worn abroad. He was born in Boston, March 2, 1832, his father, Rev. George Washington Doane, being at that time rector of Trinity Church. When William was two years of age his father moved to Burlington, N. J., and later became the second bishop of the diocese in New Jersey. William began his church career as his father's curate and was ordained priest in 1856. Later he became rector of St. Johns in Hartford, Ct., and in 1867 was called to Albany as rector of St. Peters. When only thirty-seven years of age he was elected bishop of the diocese of Albany, since which time he has been a leader in his denomination. Among the institutions which he has established are the Child's Hospital, St. Margaret's House in Albany, Church Home in Troy, an orphan house in Cooperstown, St. Christian Home in Saratoga. The building of the Cathedral of All Saints in Albany he considered to be the chief of his ecclesiastical achievements. He held the office of Chancellor in the University of the State of New York until 1909. His principal literary work was the Life and Writings of his father, four volumes. Bishop Doane represented the extreme high church sentiment and was the champion of conservatism in his denomination, but his kindliness of spirit, sincerity of purpose and great ability won him widespread friendship and respect both within and without his own denomination.

Episcopal General Convention Preparing

The triennial convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church is to be held next October—the first time in New York City within twenty-five years. The Cathedral St. John the Divine will be the scene of great missionary demonstrations. It is expected that 110 bishops and 600 deputies, representing close to 1,000,000 communicants and sixty-three dioceses, twenty-three missionary districts and ten foreign jurisdictions, will gather on October 8 for the opening service in the cathedral. The diocese of New York has offered to pay all expenses, including transportation, but such a proposition is opposed by many in the convention to meet exclusively in those cities able to meet such expenses. This objection has been voiced in the church organs by Doctor Cyrus Townsend Brady, the noted clergyman and novelist.

The convention will certainly miss J. Pierpont Morgan, whose death recently saddened the whole civilized world. Mr. Morgan was famous for his churchmanship, as well as his patronage of art and genius for finance. For years, since 1886, Mr. Morgan was a central figure at these triennial conventions, going to them in special trains with his pastor and other clergymen, renting mansions for their entertainment during the sessions of the convention. In his own person, Mr. Morgan did much unconsciously to embody the impression abroad that the Protestant Episcopal Church is the "millionaries' church."

The American Baptist Year Book for 1913 is just off the press. It gives a statistical analysis of everything a la Baptist.

The statistics show that there are in the United States 50,188 churches, an increase of 408 during 1912; 36,027 ordained ministers, an increase of 852; and a total membership of 5,529,573, an increase of 75,375. The increase in membership during the last sixteen years is as follows: For 1897, 231,766; for 1898, 89,189; for 1899, 39,691; for 1900, 51,540; 1901, 35,837; 1902, 61,399; for 1903, 176,183; 1904, 94,052; for 1905, 108,515; for 1906, 103,342; for 1907, 156,871; for 1908, 145,653; for 1909, 151,192; for 1910, 17,575; for 1911, 170,254; for 1912, 75,375, making a grand total of 1,705,531, or an average yearly gain of 106,595.

During the year 1912 there were received into the churches by baptism 284,195 persons, a decrease from the baptisms of the previous years of 6,577. There are 35,252 Sunday-schools, an increase of 421 during 1912; 266,858 officers and teachers, an increase of 5,095; 2,660,341 pupils, a decrease of 97,930.

There were given for church expenses $20,561,041, an increase of $508,578; for Sunday-school expenses, $962,708, a decrease of $4,526; for state missions, $954,651, an increase of $17,137; for home missions $896,179, an increase of $13,162; for foreign missions, $1,157,860, an increase of $42,933; for Bible and publication work, $97,697, a decrease of $2,068; for education, $413,824, a decrease of $8,603; for miscellaneous, $1,983,488, an increase of $119,195, making a grand total of $27,078,231, an increase of $703,607.

Lutheran Plea for Christian Unity

A "Universal Christian Church," in which all Protestant sects shall be united, is the church of the future, and rapid strides toward the accomplishment of such an ideal are being made, according to statements by the Rev. Junius B. Remensnyder, pastor of St. James' Lutheran Church, New York City, who preached the synodical sermon at the opening of the forty-fifth biennial convention of the General Synod of the Lutheran Church, at Atchison, Kans., on May 14. The Rev. Mr. Remensnyder is president of the synod.

The Lutheran Church, he said, with its 70,000,000 members throughout the world and its broad standards, seemed best fitted to lead the Protestant churches to unity.

Among other statements in the synodical sermon were:

"Revivalism has failed as a means of conversion. Christian nurture and pedagogical methods are more fruitful in results.

"The Lutheran is no puritanic church. Temperance, not abstinence, as to the good things and the innocent pleasures of life, is its rule. This accords with the modern larger view of the religious life."

Oxford and Its Divinity Degrees

The Convocation of the University of Oxford, the highest governing body in that university, squelched the attempt made to make it possible for Oxford to give its B. D. and D. D. degrees to students outside the Church of England. The vote was 760 to 334. The Convocation also sat down on the proposition that examiners for the School of Theology need not be in priest's orders in the Church of England. In other words, the Catholic Party has triumphed in the Church of England in a very serious matter by an overwhelming majority, showing that the mother of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States of America is quite as "Catholic" or "High Church" as her daughter in this country would like to be. No quarter to Dissent in England! No quarter to Protestantism in America! This is the attitude of the Catholic Party on both sides of the Atlantic.

Oxford is the High Church university, while Cambridge is the Broad Church university. Some years ago Cambridge generously threw open her B. D. and D. D. degrees to non-conformists. Parliament passed a law compelling Oxford to follow Cambridge's example, but the Convocation of Oxford has defied the law-making body of the land.

Men and Religion in Australia

The Men and Religion Forward Movement struck Australia all through April. Fred B. Smith and Raymond Robins, official representatives of the movement, have apparently created a profound impression there. At Melbourne not less than 400 men attended the daily institutes. Six popular evening sessions were held successively, and it is estimated that 21,000 attended them. Mr. Smith comments succinctly: "The message and method are gripping Australia tremendously."

The team stopped at Manila, capital of the Philippines, before going on to Australia. At Manila the American officials, civil and military, were strangely moved by the concentrated power of these two American specialists in religion for men. The leading English daily of the islands, The Manila Times, gave an entire editorial page to the leaders during their brief stay in Manila. Forty different sessions were held. More than 13,000 men attended. Fully 500 men decided to live the Christian life.

38th International Y. M. C. A. Convention

Among the May conventions was the thirty-eight international convention of the Y. M. C. A. at Cincinnati, while street car traffic was paralyzed by an untimely strike. Thousands of delegates had gathered and good-naturedly took in the unusual situation. Doctor Ira Landrith of Nashville, Tenn., was chosen president of the convention. Much enthusiasm was evoked by the report that Bible study classes in the past ten years had jumped from 1,793 to 7,285 and the enrollment went up from 31,385 to 103,600. Bible class teachers leaped from 1,429 to 3,914. Among the more prominent speakers were John R. Mott, Dr. Walter Rauschenbusch, Professor Jeremiah W. Jenks and George Sherwood Eddy. The convention by a vote of 521 to 392 decided to retain the so-called "evangelical test" of active membership in the Y. M. C. A., thus standing by its resolution of 1869 adopted at Portland, Me.

New Evangelical Champion in Europe

While Rudolf Eucken's fame in Europe remains undiminished, it is interesting to note that a new champion for the evangelical type of religion has arisen in the person of Friedrich Wilhelm Foerster, professor of pedagogy in the University of Zurich. Professor Foerster began professional life as a Unitarian and ethicist. For two years he went to work studying at first hand observation the labor movement, juvenile delinquency and relief of the poor. He then undertook to apply his ethical teachings to the situation as he found it, and, as he expresses it, he found himself driven to the conclusion that "moral education can find its complete expression only in the Christian religion." He landed square into the evangelical camp, and now his voluminous writings, it is said, are beginning to influence European thought.

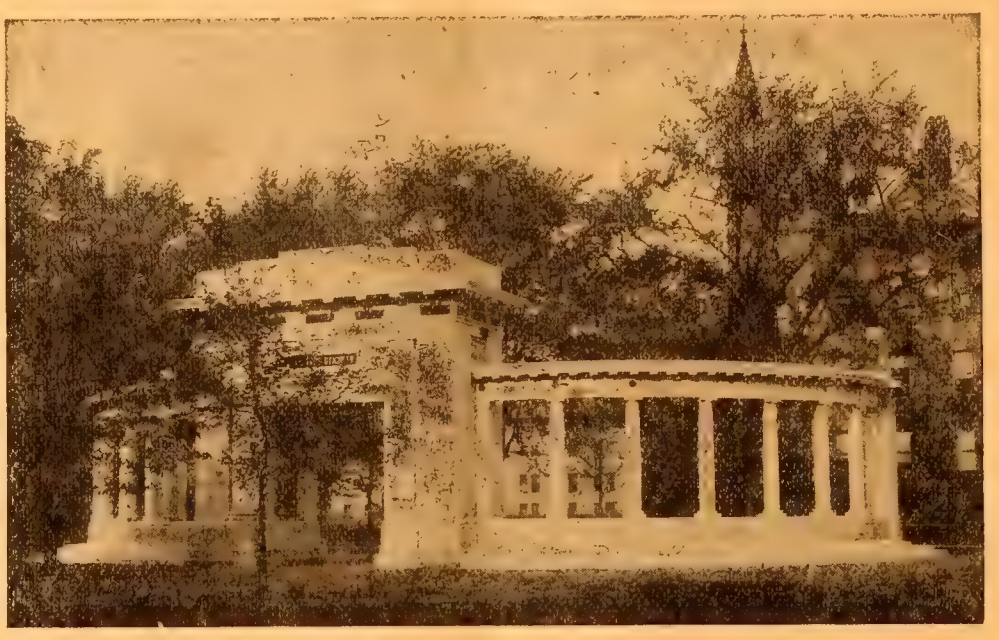
—Ten well-to-do Presbyterians of Canada are reported to have pledged $10,000 each toward providing a fund out of which the expenses of every Presbyterian minister and his wife in all the Dominion to the next meeting of the General Assembly will be paid.

In a Spot Made Sacred By Martyrs

By Philip D. Sherman, Associate Professor of English, Oberlin College

(In view of the recent statement by United States Government officials in Pekin that the missionary-educational project of Oberlin College in China has been one of the most significant influences in opening the new republic to the world, and in view of the fact that Oberlin is the only educational institution west of the Alleghenies to take really systematic advantage of the new conditions in this ancient land, a resume of the work done by the Ohio institution will be of more than ordinary interest. The centers of Oberlin's activities are at Taiku-shien, Fencho-fu, and Pao-ting-fu, in the province of Shansi.)

The monumental undertaking now going on of educating the masses of China is one of the many wonders of human achievement. One cannot compare successive reports of the boards of education for the country at large, and for the provinces in particular, without realizing something of the magnitude of the movement. The movement is not confined to the boys and girls alone, but reaches out to the adult population as well, and is particularly significant because of the special attention which is being directed for the first time in the history of the Chinese people to the welfare of women.



MARTYRS' MEMORIAL ARCH. OBERLIN.

Ever since the foundation of the College, Oberlin graduates have liberally found their way to the remotest corners of foreign lands, while the undergraduate body has always been markedly cosmopolitan, giving Oberlin the name, according to statistics prepared by the Bureau of Education at Washington, of being the second most cosmopolitan college in America, missing in this respect, by a slight percentage first honors, which are held by Yale.

Thoroughly in harmony with the spirit of the founders, in the college year of 1879-80, a group of young Oberlin men determined to establish in the province of Shansi, North China, just then opened to foreigners, an institution after the pattern of their alma mater—a New Oberlin in China. They selected the cities of Taiku and Fenchofu as the main stations and began at once practical work among the inhabitants.

The people of Shansi have always been proud, superstitious and money-loving. Shansi men have gone out through all the empire and outlaying dependencies to carry on the business of banks and pawnshops. From the nature of the field it was impossible immediately to realize educational plans, as the Chinese were still asleep and were not ready for Christian education. A beginning of evangelistic and medical work was made, however, and after a few years—after the confidence of the natives was won—primary and boarding schools were established. The work grew without incident of extreme moment, until the year 1900 found the Oberlin station with 13 workers, two churches, and a definitely organized educational plant.

Though ordinarily peaceful and inoffensive, the people of Shansi were strangely roused t[illegible] est pitch of fury by the Boxer craze of [illegible] the people at the Oberlin station at [illegible] murdered July 31st, and two weeks late[illegible] cloud burst over Fenchofu. Believing tha[illegible] being escorted to the coast under the p[illegible] the notorious governor, by previous [illegible] twelve miles northeast of the city, the Americans from this city were cut down upon the highway. The only persons to escape massacre were Dr. I. J. Atwood (a member of the organization which had gone out from Oberlin in 1879,) and his three associates then in America on furlough. To a wide and thorough knowledge of the Shansi situation, Dr. Atwood united the universal respect of the Chinese and great physical and moral courage. To him the American Board turned to attempt the rehabitation of the work which seemed in danger of perishing absolutely. Dr. Atwood went to North China, established a base at Paotingfu and prepared to go into Shansi with a deputation of officials authorized to receive the apologies of the native rulers for the massacre.

Over the road where the martyr Pigott was lead in chains, the party traveled in state. In the capital of the province where a few months before their majesties had trailed their yellow robes in flight, the party listened to profuse apologies and partook of elaborate banquets, the sine qua non of polite arbitration of disputes in China. Impressive burial services were held for the 49 Protestants killed in that city, and then Dr. Atwood went on to Fenchofu.

In a period of something over three years friendly relations were again established, the scattered families were collected and all activities possible under the circumstances were resumed. A most notable event during these months was the capture, by Dr. Atwood of the petty official responsible for the murder of the Fenchofu Americans, his conviction under the most insuperable difficulties and his ultimate imprisonment in the provincial jail.

In spite of Dr. Atwood's splendid service, however, it seemed for a time that Oberlin's project in China was destined to be entirely wiped out, but, due to the interests of an American philanthropist, a fresh beginning was made. Nearly all of the great forces of the world are, in the last analysis sentimental, and when the late D. Willis James of New York City offered to erect upon the Oberlin Campus a magnificent stone arch as a memorial to the men and women who lost their lives at Shansi, he released a sentimental force of far-reaching consequence.

The cornerstone of the arch was laid during the meeting of the American Board in Oberlin in 1902 and the completed monument was dedicated May 14th of the next year. On that day, too, the Senior Class of the Seminary instituted the annual custom of the "Arch Oration," which focuses the attention of the entire college and community upon the memorial and its meaning.

So great was the force of the enthusiasm aroused for the work that Dr. and Mrs. Hemingway of Chicago went out and took the place of some of the earlier workers in the Shansi field. A keen sense of responsibility now came to the entire undergraduate body, which decided to send out a personal representative to assist in the remanning of the Oberlin station.

Accordingly Mr. and Mrs. Paul Leaton Corbin were sent forth, their immediate support being met by the student body. Little by little property was restored and the ordinary work again taken up, so that today the central stations and the outposts have their hospitals and dispensaries, the churches and separate boarding schools for boys and girls.

ENTRANCE TO COMPOUND AT FENCHOW.

There are six outstanding stations belonging to Taiku and eight to Fenchofu, and flourishing day schools are conducted at most of the outstations.

In 1907 an academy was opened at Taiku in charge of H. H. K'ung, a graduate of Oberlin in the class of 1906. In 1908 Rev. A. W. Staub went to Taiku, and, during the following year did most effective work in organizing the curriculum for the lower schools and establishing the work of the academy. The most recent addition to the field is Jesse B. Wolf of the class of 1905 who is in active service as a member of the academy staff.

While the educational work is committed strictly to these special representatives, it is hard to separate this part of the work from the services which are being rendered by other Oberlin graduates in the same field who are constantly giving their time and thought to the academy in addition to their own responsibilities.

Probably the most interesting figure at the Oberlin station today is the principal of the Oberlin Memorial Academy, Hsiang Hsi K'ung, a graduate with the degree of A. B. from Oberlin in 1906. Mr. K'ung took his M. A. degree from Yale the following year. He is a native of Taiku, a member of a wealthy aristocratic family, and counts himself seventy-sixth in descent of the line of Confucius. During the recent troublesome revolutionary days the native officials of Taikuksien appointed him military head of the district, and he rendered most notable service.

Under Mr. K'ung's charge the Memorial Academy at Taiku has developed remarkably. Courses are offered in general history, mathematics, Chinese literature and classics, history of education, and principles of teaching, English, Bible, writing, music and oratory.

With Mr. K'ung's co-operation, the work at the various stations has recently been reorganized and is now in charge of the Shansi Memorial Association of Oberlin College, having become an independent Christian institution in affiliation with the American Board.

China and America are drawing closer and closer together. Each year Finney Chapel in Oberlin rings with applause when student subscriptions are taken for the work at Taiku and Fenchofu, and that similarly warm interest is felt in the New Oberlin in China for the mother institution is evidenced by the following extract from one of the Principal's reports: "On the 17th of January, when we heard that Oberlin's football team had again won the championship of Ohio, I called the academy students together and told them about it. You should have heard them sing "Men of Brawn" (Oberlin's rallying football song) and give a rousing 'Hi-O-Ho' for Oberlin and for Coach Gray. We are trying to develop some school spirit along with their other interests, and all these things count."

Naturally no single institution can hope to reach the entire population of the province of Shansi, some 12,000,000, but Oberlin's work is planned along lines calculated to come in touch with at least 3,000,000. Last year students came to the academy from nine prefectures and departments, and from three provinces. All told, the enrollment in all institutions in which Oberlin is interested totals 600, with thirty teachers.

STUDENTS STARTING FOR SUNDAY WORK.

Since 1907 an unusually favorable campus site for the academy has been secured, known as the Flower Garden Compound. It is a beautiful enclosed park of nine acres with 800 fine trees and 31 Chinese buildings—a good beginning on the material side, but quite insufficient to meet the growing demands of the work. Mr. Wolfe, who has just been added, has prepared plans for a new recitation building to cost $8,000, a building sufficient to provide for offices, recitation rooms, and considerable dormitory accommodations.

After a personal inspection of Oberlin's plant in connection with his tour around the world in 1910, President King stated, "Oberlin has, in my judgment, a better situation and outlook for sane and effective work than any similar undertaking in China."

The recent study of the educational situation in China carried on by Dr. E. A. Ross, the distinguished professor of sociology in the University of Wisconsin, embodied in his book "Changing China," contains an interesting epitome of one phase of the present vast and hopeful activity. Dr. Ross says: "Among the thoughtful the conviction spreads that China can never be great while the mothers of each generation are left ignorant and uncared for. China needs above all men of high, unwavering integrity, and she will not grow them while the impressionable boyhood years are passed in the company of an unschooled, narrow-minded, debased, uncultivated woman—we know that the mothers of Confucius and Mencius had a great share in forming the characters of their illustrious sons, and it is significant that the Chinese have brought forth no great men since they took to binding the feet—and the minds—of their daughters. All who work with the women of the yellow race are enthusiastic over their possibilities, and no testimonials are needed. Their faces are full of character as fine as the faces of women anywhere. All the railroads that may be built, all the mines that may be opened, all the trade that may be fostered, cannot give half as much to the happiness of the Chinese people as the cultivation of the greatest of their undeveloped resources—their womanhood."

ENTRANCE TO "FLOWER GARDEN."

At a dinner given in New York to the Imperial Chinese Commissioners who visited America in 1906, replying to an extended address by Dr. Arthur I. Brown, a Manchu prince, H. E. Tuen Fang, said: "We take pleasure this evening in bearing testimony to the part taken by the American missionaries in promoting the progress of the Chinese people. These educators have brought the light of western civilization into every nook and corner of the Empire. They have rendered inestimable service to China by the laborious task of translating into the Chinese language religious and scientific works of the West. They help us to bring happiness and comfort to the poor and suffering by the establishment of hospitals and schools. The awakening of China, which now seems to be at hand, may be traced in no small measure to the work of the Christian educators. For this service you will find China not ungrateful."

Now it has always been characteristic of Oberlin men and women wherever found, that they take an active interest in social and educational projects which promise benefit to the community. When the original tract of forest land where Oberlin now stands was obtained in Ohio in 1833, and the foundation of the village of Oberlin and of Oberlin College were laid simultaneously, the aim of the institution was stated in the first catalogues as follows: "The object of Oberlin College shall be the diffusion of useful science, sound morality, and pure religion among the growing multitudes of the Mississippi Valley. It aims also at bearing an important part in extending these blessings to the destitute millions which overspread the earth."

Is Family Prayer Important?

A Plea for Old-Fashioned Family Worship

From the "Continent"

Is family prayer a matter of first importance in a home where father and mother want their children to grow up Christians?

It all depends on how one looks in the first place on the importance of prayer for himself personally.

Do you think that a Christian man going out into the day and its tasks ought to stop a little before he goes and ask God to help him through that day—keep him square to the standards of Christian living?

Perhaps you don't. Perhaps you imagine that every fellow is here in the world on his own responsibility and that all the help he gets to do right is the help he takes out of his own stiff, stout will.

In that case, of course, there is no occasion for you to pray—nor to train your sons and daughters in prayer.

But in that case, why are you calling yourself a Christian? Christianity is based on a book in which all the people who are set up for examples depended on prayer—and the Greatest of them was the one who prayed the most.

If you really don't count on prayer, you are in a peculiar place tying yourself up with Christ's church.

But the church man is not liable to go off on that tack. He is far more likely to respond that he does believe in prayer, and that in one way and another he tries to pray a little nearly every day.

But, he will argue, one doesn's have to put his prayers into words. And, of course, that has to be acknowledged, so far as the individual contact between any one soul and God goes. But propositions of mere individual religion haven't much justifiable footing anywhere in the neighborhood of a man of family—the head of a home.

He has not only the duty of praying individually himself, but if he considers prayer any help at all in life, he is in most solemn duty bound to teach his children to pray.

Grant that prayer is in any sense an equipment for life—any safeguard whatever from evil—and it instantly is evident that a father is a downright cheat to his sons and daughters if he doesn't undertake to put them in possession of that equipment and safeguard.

And don't let him deceive himself by supposing that the little prayer which mother teaches them at their bedside in babyhood is going to be sufficient. That is tied up with childhood for all children, and if they get no other notion of prayer than that, they will surely put it away when they put away other childish things.

To make an impression of manhood and womanhood on the boys and girls, they must get an example of manly and womanly prayer from their parents. And while they may believe that mother prays in secret, they won't believe their father has any secret habits of prayer—outspoken, positive man of the world that he is—unless they hear him pray somewhere openly.

If the father wants his children to pray, he must get down on his knees in the home before them and pray for them and for their mother and for himself and for all the household then and there.

So there is the whole question of the matter of family prayer.

You got your prayer incentives from your father. Do you want your children to take any prayer incentives from you?

If you are not willing to send them out prayerless into the world, it is up to you to furnish them the example that your father furnished you.

Brace up and try. It won't be so hard after the ice is broken.

A Hundred Years of Peace

How the Coming Centenary Will Be Celebrated

The centenary of our treaty of peace with Great Britain will be celebrated in various ways. London will commemorate the event in an Anglo-American exposition, to be held at Shepherd's Bush, in the outskirts of London in the summer of 1914. We have received a report of the meeting of the general committee, which includes many noblemen and gentlemen distinguished in art, science, literature, commerce, and industry, and over 200 members of the British Parliament, which meeting was held at the Mansion House, a few days ago, the Lord Mayor of London, Sir David Burnett, presiding. In opening the meeting the Lord Mayor said: "My lords and gentlemen. I have the greatest possible pleasure in presiding upon this occasion over the meeting of the General Committee of the Anglo-American Exposition, which is an exposition for the purpose of celebrating a century of peace between Great Britain and the United States of America, to be held next year, and, as Lord Mayor of the City of London, I shall be only too pleased to do anything in my power to promote the success of that exposition, believing and recognizing that in its success much will be done to maintain and strengthen the bonds of friendship which exist today, and have existed for so long, between the peoples of these two great nations. (Hear, hear.)

"The object of the exposition is to celebrate in a fitting manner the 100 years of peace and progress between the English-speaking peoples since the Treaty of Ghent in 1814. The exposition will be held at Shepherd's Bush, London, between May and October of 1914, and will demonstrate in a practical manner the progress which has been made by the British and American people in every branch of civilization during that century, and will also place on view in chronological order the great achievements of that epoch, from inception to perfection, showing not only how each nation has improved on its own inventions, but where both have worked hand in hand to perfect the creation of the other.

"The exposition will unfold the treasures given to the world by a hundred years of British and American art.

"A hundred years of the history of the two nations, their famous statesmen, authors, artists, inventors, philanthropists, financiers, merchants, manufactures, and others. Men and women who have helped in the advancement of civilization and in making each nation what it is to-day will be represented with such objects of historical interest as are associated with them and their times.

"A hundred years of progress in education, science, literature, inventions and productions, improvements and comforts in social life, betterment of the conditions of working men and women, in placing before the world the fruits of the intellect and genius of the people of both nations.

"The exposition will also show in practical ways the advancement in navigation in railway transport, in girder, suspension and cantilever bridges, the use of steel in architecture, the boring of tunnels, underground and overhead railways, aqueducts, lighthouses, the work of the Panama Canal, printing—from the simple hand press to the modern rotary press and linotype—lithography, electricity, electric and hydraulic power, coal-gas and electric light, the storage of power, pneumatic dispatch, the telegraph, telephone and wireless, photography—from the daguerreotype to colored and animated photography—the invention and creation of new metals, the advancement in mining, the utilization of rubber, calculating and recording instruments, the great advance in agricultural machinery and all kinds of labor-saving devices, the marvelous achievements in chemistry, in fact the harnessing of the very elements for the use and comfort of the nations.

"No exposition has ever afforded such unique and interesting opportunities, and certainly there never was an occasion more fitting for a great exposition of the work and achievements of two nations of the same blood, celebrating their hundredth anniversary of peace and concord, where people of the same family, although separated by a great ocean, will be able to join hand in hand, to unite in shaping their mutual destinies, and as kinsmen advancing the welfare of humanity and of the whole civilized world.

"Then I need hardly remind you—especially in the city of London—of the fact that we are the largest customers of the United States, and I believe they are about the largest of ours. I understand that in 1912 the exports to England amounted to over $564,000,000, to the next largest, Germany, $306,000,000 odd. The imports were, from Great Britain and Ireland, $272,940,700—nearly $273,000,000; the next, Germany, $171,380,380. Of course, practical men in the city of London know all these facts I daresay better than I do, but these figures show what an enormous trade there is between the two countries.

"However, the greatest point of all is the feeling of friendship and kinship which unites the two countries, and which I believe this exposition will do so much to cement, and strengthen and improve."

Does Foreign Missions Pay?

What Some Famous Men Have to Say on the Question

James Bryce, Diplomat.

I cannot mention the American missionaries without a tribute to the admirable work they have done. They have been the only good influence that has worked from abroad upon the Turkish Empire.

President Angell, Educator.

Wherever an American mission is established, there is a center of alert, enterprising American life whose influence in a hundred ways is felt even by the lethargic Oriental life.

William McKinley.

The story of the Christian missions is one of thrilling interest and marvelous results. The sacrifices of the missionaries for their fellow men constitute one of the most glorious pages of the world's history. The missionary of whatever Church or ecclesiastical body, who devotes his life to the service of the Master and of man, carrying the torch of truth and enlightenment, deserves the gratitude and homage of mankind. The noble, self-effacing, willing ministers of peace and good will should be classed with the world's heroes.

William McKinley, an Advocate of Foreign Missions.

Edgar Wallace, Traveler.

What the missionaries have done I can see with my eyes, and seeing, I am prouder of my country and my countrymen and women than ever I have been before. No battle I have witnessed, no prowess of arms, no exhibition of splendid courage in the face of overwhelming odds, has inspired me as the work of these outposts of Christianity.

Somebody down the river told me that there was a difficulty in getting men and women for the missionary work in Congo land. Speaking frankly as a man of the world, I do not wonder. I would not be a missionary on the Congo for £5,000 a year. That is a worldly point of view. I do not think it is a very high standpoint. It is a simple confession that I prefer the "fleshpots of Egypt" to the self-sacrifice and devotion that the missionary life claims.

Look at the records of the missions of the Congo. I say without hesitation, that every work of progress and civilization that the Congo has seen has owed its inception and has been brought to fruition by these fine people. The very charting was carried out by the missionary. If from the depths into which the natives have sunk through oppression and neglect, men and women have been raised to the level of good citizens, the missionaries have done it. All that is best in this sad land is the work of the missionaries.

They are making men on the Congo. I have seen that with my own eyes. It is the only bright spot in the gloom that enshrouds this land of death. They are healing the sick and succoring the weak. In the old days of chivalry to succor the weak and aid the oppressed was the charge of every good knight. Such a charge these knights of Christ received from their overlord, and most worthily do they fulfil their charge.

Theodore Roosevelt.

The criticism of those who live softly, remote from the strife, is of value, but it would be difficult to overestimate the value of the missionary work of those who go to share the hardship, and, while sharing it, to wage war against the myriad forms of brutality.

Baron Hayashi of Japan.

To be sure there are disreputable native Christians in China, but there are also disreputable Confucians in China. Thousands of native converts have proved the thoroughness of their conversion to Christianity by all manner of sacrifices. They have borne the contempt of those about them; they have seen their own families and relatives turn against them; they have felt the thumb-screw of official persecution; they have even gone to the stake for their faith. It seems to me that the missionary has done a great deal of good for China. He has dissipated a great deal of the darkness that once brooded over that empire and that broods over most of it yet.

Marquis Ito of Japan.

The development and the progress of Japan are mainly due to the influence of the missionaries. It became visible in the right direction when Japan commenced to study the outer world.

C. H. Conger, Diplomat.

United States Ambassador in China. In a letter of August 18, 1900, to the American missionaries.

To every one of you, who, luckily, with us escaped from the threatening bloody massacre, I here, in this hour of deliverance, express, from the bottom of my soul, our most sincere thanks for the inestimable assistance which you and the native Christians have given us during the siege, and to which we owe our lives. And I am sure all ambassadors of the other Powers feel the same. Without your intelligent, as well as successful assistance by word and deeds, our rescue would have been impossible.

Henry Morton Stanley, Explorer.

Before my departure for Africa, I was a decided opponent of Christianity. I was not better than the most modern infidel of my country. To a newspaper reporter like myself, who had to treat with war, mass meetings, and political conventions, all religious emotions and feelings were something unknown.

But there came a time of meditation for me. Far away from the world and its turmoil and strife, I saw him, the great Livingstone an old, lonesome man, and I asked myself: "Why does this man live here at this point of the earth? What is it that gives him strength and perseverance?"

"Leave everything behind and follow me!" this command of the Holy Scriptures he translated into words and deeds. Not words but the love of God, his meekness, his zeal, and holy spirit—this it was that converted me to the living God.

Robert Louis Stevenson, Writer.

I had conceived a great prejudice against missions in the South Seas, and I had no sooner come there than that prejudice was at first reduced, and then at last annihilated. Those who speak against missions have only one thing to do, to come and see them on the spot. They will see a great deal of good done; they will see a race being forwarded in many different directions, and I believe, if they are honest persons, they will cease to complain of mission work and its effects.

Ex-President W. H. Taft.

I have had to read books during my life in which missionaries were made fun of. I remember the elder Weller, when asked to contribute for "vestcoats" and coats for the heathen said he had nothing to give, but would "come down handsome for some straight vestcoats" for the people at home.

I had my eyes opened by experience in the Philippines and in the East. Before I felt as Weller. Now I believe, even though we have places where home missionary work is essential, that it should be carried along in parallel lines in foreign lands.

Charles Denby, Ambassador in China.

The labor of the missionaries is the main factor in our relations with China. Wherever the missionary goes he is followed by education and civilization. Much of the development of China is due to the missionaries. They are the interpreters, the educators and the historians of the Chinese.

Sven Hedin, Explorer.

Many of my most precious reminiscences of the many years I lived in Asia come from the houses of the missionaries; and the more I become acquainted with them, the more I admired their quiet, persevering and, so very often, thankless labor.

A Cowboy's Idea of Religion

A converted cowboy is reported to have given this idea of what religion is: "Lots of folks that would really like to do right think that servin' the Lord means shoutin' themselves hoarse praisin' his name. Now I'll tell you how I look at that. I'm workin' here for Jim. Now if I'd sit around the house here tellin' what a good fellow Jim is, and singin' songs to him and gettin' up in the night to serenade him, I'd be doin' just like what lots of Christians do; but I wouldn't suit Jim, and I'd get fired mighty quick. But when I buckle on my straps and hustle among the hills and see that Jim's herd is all right, and not sufferin' for water and feed, or bein' off the range, and branded by cattle thieves, then I'm servin' Jim as he wants to be served."—Selected.

Leide and His Frogs

There is a monument in Philadelphia erected to Prof. Joseph Leide, the most distinguished naturalist probably ever connected with the University of Pennsylvania. It is related of him that once, having collected half a dozen frogs for the purpose of studying their habits under certain conditions, he shut them up in a box for a little while until he could give the time necessary for his desired observations. Forgetting all about his captives, he left his home on some important errand. When he was six miles away he suddenly remembered them; and lest they should suffocate because of his neglect, he walked back the whole distance to place them in comfortable quarters. This was told us by one familiar with the circumstances. It seems this regard for all sentient life was characteristic of the man.

It is a fine contradiction of the too often accepted notion that to be a great scholar or scientist is to be deficient in heart. Many a lad has imagined that cleverness and kindness seldom go together. —Christian Guardian.

The Bishop's Answer

Dr. W. A. Quayle, bishop of the Methodist church and a popular lecturer, in the early days of his ministry, went back to preach one Sunday to a former congregation in Kansas, and was entertained by one of his old parishioners. After the evening services the family gathered round the hearth and exchanged reminiscences with their guest, apparently without any thought of retiring. Eleven o'clock came and midnight.

The conversation lagged, and all showed unmistakable signs of weariness. Dr. Quayle yawned politely and rubbed his drooping eyelids. His host moved restlessly in his chair. His hostess eyed the timepiece with growing alarm. The very air was drowsy, but no one seemed able to end the awkward situation.

Finally as the clock chimed half-past one o'clock his hostess asked deprecatingly, but with a note of desperation in her voice:

"Brother Quayle, when do you go to bed?"

"When I get a chance," replied Dr. Quayle meekly.

Life in Epigram

By Ernest Wray Oneal.

Reputation is what men say you are; character is what God knows you are.

Reputation is seeming; character is being.

Reputation is your photograph; character is your face.

Reputation is manufactured; character is grown.

Reputation is what comes over you from without; character is what rises up from within.

Reputation is what you have when you come to town; character is what you have when you go away.

Reputation makes you rich or poor; character makes you miserable or happy.

Reputation is what you need to get a job; character is what you need to keep one.

Reputation is what is chiseled on your tombstone, character is what the angels say about you before the throne of God.—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

No Place for Him

An Irishman had recently come to North Dakota from New York City. He was in a small town close to the banks of the Red River and the fact that the stream ran toward the north somewhat puzzled him, as to his untutored imagination "north" had always seemed the "up" direction. Shortly after his arrival a Republican rally was held in the town and Pat attended. The chairman was a man named Casey and the principal speaker also bore a Hibernian name. This was too much for Pat.

"Sure," said he, "I'll never stay in a country where the rivers run uphill and the Irish votes the Raypublican ticket! It's back to New York for me."—Chicago Record-Herald.

From Near and Far

Social, industrial and religious conditions among immigrants were discussed at the immigration conference held last week in the banquet-room of the Chicago Coliseum. "The Immigrant and the Courts," "The Industrial Outlook for the Immigrant," "The Immigrant and the Church," and "Neighborhood Opportunities for Service" were some of the subjects discussed. Miss Mary McDowell, Professor Graham Taylor, Rev. George B. Safford, Abraham Bowers, Rev. V. P. Backora, and Joel B. Hunter were among the speakers. A. A. McCormick, president of the Cook County board of commissioners, spoke on "The Community of the Immigrant" at the evening session.

Representatives from the Baptist, Christian, Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian churches of Chicago met May 28 in the Auditorium Hotel to plan for further extension of the co-operative church movement in that city. The meeting was held under the auspices of the Co-Operative Council of City Missions, of which Rev. Shailer Mathews is president. Among those who spoke were Rev. James Rowe, Revc. J. C. Armstrong, Rev. O. F. Jordan, Rev. Frank L. Anderson and Rev. George B. Safford, representing, respectively, the Methodist, Congregational, Christian, Baptist and Presbyterian City Missionary societies and boards.

With the purpose of spreading the gospel of the "catch-my-pal" crusade, a temperance movement which he originated, Rev. Robert J. Patterson of County Armagh, Ireland, has arrived in New York. He declared that 150,000 persons in Ireland have joined the movement, in which each person pledging himself not to use intoxicants is under obligation to get another adherent. The crusader's individual appeals to passengers on the way across, it is reported, resulted in one of the "dryest" trips the Camerónia ever made.

All church officers, Sunday-school teachers, evangelists and mission workers of the Reformed Presbyterian Church are forbidden to use tobacco in any form under the terms of a resolution adopted by the synod which has just closed its session. The resolution was presented by Rev. W. W. Carithers, a delegate from Cache Creek, Okla. After its adoption a resolution providing that one year hence an effort be made to revise the church discipline to provide that all members of the church abstain from the use of tobacco was adopted.

Judge McKenzie Cleland, the Chicago reformer in penology, is a United Presbyterian elder and was a member of Assembly in Atlanta. After an impassioned speech on his specialty Judge Cleland secured the appointment of an ad interim committee to study whether current methods of punishing men for crime accord with the spirit and teachings of Jesus Christ.

"Not to be cashed in a saloon" is the warning displayed on the 800 pay checks issued every two weeks by a company at Escanaba, Mich. Upon the back of the check above the place for indorsement is printed a form which announces that the check becomes void if it is indorsed by a saloonkeeper or passes through his hands in any way.

The new republic of China is beginning to appreciate the truths of Christianity, and all over the vast empire of Asia enlightened officials are clamoring for more Y. M. C. A. establishments, according to G. Sherwood Eddy and Fletcher S. Brockman, district secretaries of the Y. M. C. A.

The hymn, "The Son of God Goes Forth to War," has just been translated into Chinese and is said to be proving exceedingly popular in Chinese congregations. The martial spirit is high among Chinese in these days, and this song expresses it perfectly.

Dr. John Henry Jowett of Fifth Avenue Church says he is of the opinion that when there is a death in the family the loved left behind should wear gray instead of black, as gray is the color of dawn and death is the dawn of the life everlasting.

It is estimated that railways centering in Chicago will lose $1,000,000 revenue a year from the prohibition on shipment of liquor into dry territory. There has been no complaint, however, as the railways generally favor prohibition.

Judge Butler at Cairo, Ill., recently said at the close of a murder case that it was the seventy-sixth in nineteen years with which he had had to deal either as attorney or judge. Of these murders seventy-five were caused by liquor.

Testimony shows that over fifty-two per cent. of the funds collected by the United Charities of Chicago is used in expenses; only the minor part goes to charity.

The death-rate of New York City from tuberculosis has fallen from 4.27 per thousand in 1881 to 1.9 per thousand in 1912.

Massachusetts has raised the compulsory school age from fourteen to fifteen years.

The International Opium Conference will meet at The Hague in June.

Disciples Table Talk

Bethany Assembly, 1913, Invites.

The Bethany Assembly program this year extends from July 24 to August 17. The officers, C. W. Cauble, E. B. Scofield, E. L. Anderson and W. E. M. Hackelman invite all who have a palate for good lectures and concerts, good fellowship and "fried chicken," to attend. Some of the leading speakers on the program this year are the following: P. H. Welshimer, of Canton; Prof. E. E. Snoddy, of Hiram College; R. H. Miller, of Buffalo; J. W. Street, of Mackinaw, Ill.; Dr. W. C. Morro, of Butler College; Lee Tinsley, of Morristown, Ind.; Garry L. Cook; Grant K. Lewis; Geo. W. Winfrey, of Summitville, Ind.; R. M. Hopkins; Dr. P. E. Powell, founder of the Knights of the Holy Grail. A special concert feature will be the Music Festival which will extend from July 24 to 27. A more complete program will be published later.

Rockford, Ill., Church Will Build.

W. B. Clemmer, pastor at Central Church, Rockford, is enthusiastic over the new building which is now in course of construction. On May 19 work was begun. The following is a general description of the building, as it will appear when completed: "The building will be classic in style with dome; plain, yet beautifully ornate and churchly. Extreme dimensions 58x102 feet. Exterior a very light buff brick with stone trimmings and slate roof. Interior wood in oak. A modern down-to-date church and community center with all suitable appointments for worship, teaching and social service." A gymnasium, 25 by 50 feet will be one fine feature of the new plant. The present congregation was organized November 2, 1898, with twenty-three charter members in the Y. M. C. A. building and called "The Central Christian Church." L. E. Prather was the evangelist and first pastor. D. R. Lucas, O. F. Jordan, W. D. Ward and the present pastor have served this church. During Mr Jordan's seven years' ministry the Old Stone Church was bought and paid for. During Mr. Ward's ministry the church was sold, and the present property, better located, was bought, the dwelling remodeled and occupied by the church. March 22, 1911, the movement was begun by Mr. Clemmer to provide an adequate church. January 28, 1911, a campaign was begun for $10,000, all or nothing, to guarantee the building enterprise which culminated successfully October 1, 1912. It is hoped to dedicate the completed building by Thanksgiving, 1913.

E. T. Williams Highly Honored.

The following is clipped from a Cincinnati paper: "Edward T. Williams, charge d'affairs of the American legation at Pekin, who formally presented President Yuan Shi Kai with the official recognition of the United States, was for four years pastor of the Central Christian Church of Cincinnati. Today Secretary Williams is regarded as one of the most important Americans in China, where he won high position through his knowledge of the language and his unusual understanding of international law. From 1884 to 1888 the present secretary of the American legation at Pekin was pastor of the Cincinnati congregation, and it was through his connection with the Disciples of Christ that he first went to China. In 1888 Mr. Williams was ordered by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society of Cincinnati to the Chinese field, with headquarters at Shanghai. Because of his proficiency in the language, level headedness and general ability the Cincinnati missionary was given a position in the diplomatic service as vice consul at Shanghai, and very soon thereafter his executive ability took him to Pekin as secretary of the American legation. Later he was transferred to Tientsin as consul general and then he was transferred to the State department at Washington in charge of far Eastern affairs. He remained at Washington about a year and a half, returning to Pekin in his former capacity. Secretary Williams is credited with representing the 'great unknown' in the far Eastern policy of this government. It has been current gossip in inner diplomatic circles that moves which blocked the Japanese and Russians in Manchuria and prevented the dismemberment of China were of Williams' devising. Since the ambassadorship to China is vacant, the position of Secretary Williams as charge d'affaires brings him into the closest relation to the advisors of the newly recognized republic. The first wife of Secretary Williams was the daughter of the late President Loos of Kentucky University. A school for girls was established in her memory in China by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Because he has been able to serve his country without himself appearing in the limelight, the government is said to have extreme confidence in its present representative, formerly the little known pastor of a modest Cincinnati church."

Ohio State Convention at Lima.

The State Convention of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions was held in the C. T. Paul who addressed Ohio's convention.

Central Church of Christ, Lima, May 19-22. The convention was entertained by both the South Side and Central churches. Monday afternoon the two auxiliaries entertained the state officers and delegates, and later the state officers received all delegates. The C. W. B. M. sessions began Monday evening and continued until Tuesday, 4 p. m. Miss Mary Lyons, state secretary, presided in the absence of the president, Mrs. S. H. Bartlett, Hiram, who was kept at home because of illness. A. B. Houze extended a cordial welcome to the convention. The chief convention speakers for the women were Prof. C. T. Paul, president of the College of Missions, Indianapolis, and Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, national president, Indianapolis. The Brotherhood sessions were held at the First Baptist Church, Tuesday forenoon and afternoon, and were largely attended by a bunch of live men, awake to the issues of the day. M. E. Baker, Akron, presided. Mayor C. N. Shook was introduced by F. C. Lake and told the convention something of his experiences in dealing with violators of the law. His plain statement of facts made a most eloquent plea for civic righteousness and set the convention on fire. Ohio Disciples are proud that Mayor Shook is a Disciple and a man with a backbone. Other speakers were Ex-mayor J. White, F. M. Rains, Harris R. Cooley and T. W. Pinkerton. The open parliament called out a warm and profitable discussion. The afternoon session closed with a fellowship supper served by the ladies of the Baptist Church. The opening session of the O. C. M. S. was held Tuesday evening, and addresses were made by I. J. Cahill, state secretary, and W. F. Rothenburger, state president. Both men were at their best and delivered highly polished and vital messages. Wednesday was given to open parliaments and business. The Bible School session was given the last place on the program. With experts such as Settle, Welshimer, Miss Hazel Lewis and others, a great session was expected and the expectations of the delegates were fully met. The registered attendance was about three hundred. A great many delegates went with friends and stopped at notels who did not register. It is safe to estimate that the out-of-town attendance was fully four hundred.

F. M. Rains visited Central Church, Terre Haute, May 18, and secured the following pledges from Sunday-school classes and departments: Keystone Class, $75; Loyal Men, $75; Loyal Bereans, $75; Ludeans, $75; Plus Ultras, $50; Ministering Circle, $25; Intermediate Department, $60; W. U. G.'s, $25; Junior Department, $60; Primary Department, $50; Beginners' Department, $50; Birthday Contributions, $50. Total, $670.

The church at Port Arthur, Tex., has added 98 to its membership since the coming of C. F. Pearce to its pulpit, eighteen months ago. This church has organized a mission Sunday-school at the Gulf Refinery. A Brotherhood has also been organized. The Port Arthur church is trying to bring the 1914 State Endeavor convention to Port Arthur.

The First Christian Sunday-school of Canton, O., broke the world's record for attendance May 18, when 4,286 members and visitors attended the morning services. The local church attained this record with but one week's preparation in order to retain its world wide reputation after being beaten one Sunday by Atlanta, Ga.

On May 18, the Official Board of the First Church, Galesburg, made a report to the church in favor of the purchase of a lot for the parsonage site and the removal of the present house thereon and rebuilding sufficient to put it in good modern condition. The church approved the action of the Board.

At the Colorado State Sunday-school convention, held at Greeley, June 6-8, Prof. Walter Athern, of Drake, and W. C. Pearce and John L. Alexander of the International Association, were principal speakers, with W. E. M. Hackelman leading the music.

Herbert L. Willett and family expect to arrive in New York about June 12, on the George Washington. Dr. Willett's family will go from New York to Kenton, O., Dr. Willett coming direct to Chicago.

The state convention of the Colorado churches will meet with Dr. B. B. Tyler and South Broadway, Denver, June 12-16. A unique program has been arranged by G. B. Van Arsdall and C. W. Dean.

The congregation at Normal, Ill., has voted to extend a call to E. A. Gilliland, the present pastor, for five years, at a salary of $1,800. Mr. Gilliland came to this work in May, 1912.

Bernard Gruenstein delivered the Memorial address on Jefferson Davis' birthday, June 3, at Bardstown, Ky., by the Crepps Wickliffe Chapter U. D. C.

Dr. J. W. Lowber, of Austin, has recently been elected a member of the Authors' Club, London, which is probably the greatest literary club in the world.

F. B. Sapp, Fargo, N. D., will attend, as a delegate, the Second World's Christian Citizenship Conference, to be held at Portland, Ore., June 29-July 6.

Graham McMurray will hold a summer evangelistic meeting for Ladonia, Tex., church, where A. L. Clinkinbeard ministers.

Carr-Burdette Baccalaureate service was held at Central Church, Sherman, Tex., May 18. G. L. Bradford preached the sermon.

The corner stone of the new East Side Church, Lincoln, Neb., will be laid June 22. J. W. Hilton ministers in this field.

A. D. Harmon, Omaha, First, delivered the Baccalaureate sermon for the State Normal at Peru, Neb., May 22.

D. Stewart, Santa Cruz, Cal., reports "courtship going on between First Christian and Baptist churches" there.

J. W. Cloe, who has served the church at Mt. Pulaski, Ill., successfully for two years will be open for other work Sept. 1.

C. A. Finch, of Topeka, First, delivered the Memorial service address for the Topeka Typographical Union.

ADDITIONS TO CHURCHES.

Helena, Mont., 4. Forty by confession since July 1.

Commencement at Christian University, Canton, Mo.

June 8, 11 a. m.—Baccalaureate Sermon, by J. H. Garrison, St Louis. 8 p. m., Presentation of Training Class Diplomas to Priscillas.

June 9, 8 p. m.—Recital by the Music Department.

June 10, 10 a. m.—Closing Exercises of the Bible Department. Presentation of Diplomas to Graduates in the Department of Religious Pedagogy. 2 p. m., Athletic Field Day. 8 p. m., Declamatory and Oratorical Contest.

June 11, 10 a. m.—"Something to Happen in Chapel," conducted by the Juniors. 2 p. m., Alumni Day. 4 p. m., Reunion of Zetos. 8 p. m., Alumni Banquet.

June 12, 10 a. m.—Commencement Address, by Geo. H. Combs, Kansas City. 2 p. m., Dedication of Four New Buildings, by Judge Chas. J. Scofield, Carthage, Ill. 8 p. m., Senior Class Play.

Eighteen degrees will be granted, fifteen A. B's., two A. M's. and one B. D. The equipment of the school is double what it was two years ago. The curriculum is being strengthened accordingly. Four new professors have been employed for the old departments and two new departments, Normal and Arts, have been added.

One-third of the graduates are preachers. Eighty per cent of the Bible students enrolled are preaching. This shows a high average ability of the student body. We have more calls for the highest type of student preacher than we can fill.

H. B. Robison.

A Fraternal Conference

At an informal meeting of the undersigned ministers of the Christian Church and of the Disciples of Christ at the La Salle Hotel, in the city of Chicago, Dec. 7, 1912, to confer together on matters of mutual interest to the two bodies, Rev. J. H. Garrison was asked to preside and Rev. O. W. Powers to act as secretary. Rev. Peter Ainslie, of the Disciples, explained that his attention had been called to an article in The Herald of Gospel Liberty, an organ of the brotherhood known as the Christian Church, complaining of certain historical statements which had appeared in the official program of the convention of the Disciples of Christ at Norfolk, Va., in October, 1907, and in other publications of 1912, which the brethren of the Christian Church felt did them injustice in that the said statements seemed to lay claim to James O'Kelly, Abner Jones, and Barton W. Stone as early leaders in the movement of the Disciples of Christ; whereas the brethren of the Christian Church claim these brethren were not at any time in any way associated with the Disciples, except that Barton W. Stone did coöperate with the Disciples in evangelistic work, and in an effort for the union of all of the followers of Christ, but as they hold, never actually united with that movement. On this point the Disciples appeal to history and are prepared to make corrections when such history is shown to be untrue. Brother Ainslie also mentioned that by reason of the fact that in many places the Disciples call their local churches the Christian church, where both bodies have churches in the same communities, confusion arises, one church being taken for the other, that letters intended for the Disciples of Christ go to the Christian church, so that in this way calls for offerings often go to the Christian church, when they are really meant for the Disciples of Christ. Out of this fact arises the complaint that the Disciples of Christ seek to raise funds for their work from many of the Christian churches, thus making unpleasant relations to exist between the two bodies.

It was further stated that at a meeting at Louisville, Ky., in October, 1912, certain brethren had been appointed by the Disciples of Christ to confer with representatives of the Christian Church on these matters, but as they were not present, Bro. Ainslie, as President of the Commission on Christian Union of the Disciples, asked the undersigned brethren to take their places.

After the brethren representing the Christian Church had explained the way in which the historical statements had been interpreted by their brethren, and how they are inconvenienced in the matter of the delivery of mail to the wrong persons, calls for offerings, etc., and the confusion which had resulted in the matter of the statistics of the two bodies the Disciples present disclaimed any intention on the part of their brethren in any way to encroach upon the rights of their brethren of the Christian Church.

It was explained that concerning the historic statements referred to, in the opinion of the representatives of the Disciples, the writer did not intend to include the names of James O'Kelly and Abner Jones as belonging to the movement best known as the Disciples of Christ, but that they were mentioned as precursors of that movement, in that they rejected human names and creeds, and urged the duty of Christian union. They further stated that, in their opinion, these names should not be included as belonging to the movement of the Disciples, but that the identification of Barton W. Stone with the movement of the Disciples was a well-established fact in their history. They recognized the confusion existing, and explained that they had not limited, and could not limit, themselves to any one scriptural name, nor did they desire to monopolize any one of these names. In the interest of a clear understanding, however, and to avoid confusion, it was agreed by the representatives of the Disciples that they would recommend that an effort be made to use such name, or names, to designate their movement as would tend to eliminate confusion. It was also suggested that an interchange of fraternal delegates would be helpful to the same end. The representatives of the Christians also requested that care be taken in making up mailing lists, and especially in sending out requests for contributions, so as not to include Christian churches, Sunday-schools, and ministers in the denominational calls of the Disciples.

At the close of a very pleasant and fraternal conference, in which it was felt that the representatives of the two bodies knew each other better, a sub-committee was appointed to prepare a statement of same, which is hereby signed by the representatives of both bodies in attendance.

Death of Two Prominent Disciples

MRS. M. M. BLANKS—AN APPRECIATION

By Frank L. Jewett.

At about the set time for morning worship, Sunday, May 4, 1913, in the city of Baltimore, Mrs. M. M. Blanks passed to her heavenly reward. During the last few days of her life she prayed, not to be delivered from pain and suffering, but that God's will might be done. She had been in Baltimore approximately three weeks, taken there by the love and devotion of dutiful sons who took this, the last chance to prolong her earthly life at the hands of the great medical experts at Johns Hopkins University. The care, anxiety and love of this merciful errand was shared by one son only, Mr. James G. Blanks. He alone of her numerous relatives and friends witnessed the "going to sleep" that knows no waking in this life.

Very speedily all arrangements were made for the journey to Lockhart, Texas, the old family home. Mr. and Mrs. Willie Blanks met James G. Blanks at Sedalia, Mo. Mr. Trudeau Blanks met the brothers at Austin. Here also Mrs. Jewett, myself, and one of the Bible Chair students, Mr. P. M. Kenley, and Mr. Smith joined the party. Many men from Lockhart and Mrs. May Killough, a daughter of James G. Blanks, met the party again at San Marcos. The funeral services were held in the church direct from the train. As a girl, Mrs. Blanks became a member of this Church. She was never a member of any other. It was very fitting, therefore, that the service be held here. I had been asked by wire from Baltimore to have charge of the service. Dr. Albert Buxton, the local minister, assisted. The service was short. Mrs. Blanks was then laid to rest by the side of her husband, who passed away sixteen years ago. There were flowers and floral offerings in abundance and profusion silently and fragrantly witnessing the love relatives and friends had for the deceased.

The story of Mrs. Blanks' life is simply told. Though born in Missouri in 1840, yet she was a Texas girl at eight. Her people moved to the country near Lockhart. Of this family only one member survives—a sister, Mrs. Ellison. Mrs. Blanks married early in life and at an early age united with the Christian Church. Dr. and Mrs. Blanks were parents of six children. Three of these still live. She was grandmother to thirteen children and great-grandmother to three.

During the last few years only of her life did she really live away from Lockhart, the old family town.

Mrs. Blanks was a really great woman. As one came to know her he was very soon impressed with her religious life. Her faith was steadfast. Her experience, profound. Her trust, sublime. Her interest in the kingdom, international. Her Christianity, practical. Her joy, unspeakable. Her bravery and courage under suffering, at times, remarkable. She was broad minded and liberal minded to a wonderful degree. Yet she was not loose minded but constructive.

She was enthusiastic over missions and loved to work with the C. W. B. M. for this more nearly fitted her ideal. For while she was intensely interested in foreign missions she was concerned about her local church, the Mexicans in Lockhart, the students at the University of Texas and the Mexicans across the border from her Lone Star State, cared for by the People's Institute, and then the regions beyond.

She was a magnificent giver. The Texas Bible Chair was made possible largely by her original gift. The People's Institute was enabled to go on to larger things because of her manifested generosity. These are but two instances of her much giving. Her giving has proven very wise giving. But the greatest thing about the giving is her self-effacement in it all. During my eight years incumbency at the Texas Bible Chair there has never been the slightest hint or suggestion from Mrs. Blanks as to dictation or ownership. So far as my personal relations to her are concerned, let it be said to her eternal glory, in all these trying years of Bible Chair work, as the work has pushed itself forward to great things, she has never spoken words except those of encouragement and those of interest.

Earth is the poorer and heaven the richer in her passing on. A great soul has been called up higher.

FREEMAN WALDEN.

Freeman Walden of Seattle, Wash., died at his home May 7, at the age of seventy-three years. Mr. Walden was at one time associated with B. W. Johnson as editor of the Evangelist (before it was consolidated with the Christian), and at another was associated with D. R. Lucas as editor of the Christian Oracle. He was the man who called the first convention of the Disciples of Washington Territory for the purpose of co-operative work, was their first president, and afterward their corresponding secretary and state evangelist. When the state forces divided for greater effectiveness, he was the first President of Western Washington.

Mr. Walden began teaching school at seventeen years of age, and alternated study and teaching until prepared for his life work. He did most of his work at Oskaloosa College, Iowa. While teaching a select school at Albia in 1862, he began preaching at that place, and began to give all his time to the ministry the following year, taking the pastorate at Lost Creek. He afterward returned to Albia as pastor for several years, adding over 500 to the membership there. He was pastor at several other eastern points, among them, Columbia City; Charles City; De Soto; East Side, Des Moines, Iowa; Steubenville, Ohio, and Old Bedford, Ill. He was a member of the state board and trustee of Drake University when he came West.

Removing to Washington Territory about twenty-five years ago, he was again pastor at several places, among them, Puyallup and North Yakima. He also became well known as a fruit man, and one of the best authorities on fruit culture in the state, having extensive orchards in the Yakima Valley.

The funeral service was held May 8, Wm. E. Adams, pastor of the Queen Anne Church of which he was a member, officiating. Wm. F. Cowden, a pioneer companion in the Washington work, and warm friend for many years, was the first speaker; and Rev. W. A. Moore, of Tacoma, his "Son in the Gospel," also spoke. May 9 the body was taken to North Yakima, where the last rites were performed, and he was laid to his final earthly rest.

Monarch Light Touch

THE extremely light action of the Monarch Typewriter endears it to all operators who use it. The typist who takes pride in her position finds great satisfaction in being able to turn out as much work, and as good work, per hour, toward the end of the working day as during the morning. Other conditions being the same, she can always do this on a Monarch. There is for users of this machine. The mechanical reason for the Monarch light touch is found in the action of the Monarch type bar, an exclusive and patented feature which gives this remarkably light touch.

We would remind the business man that Monarch light touch means more work and better work, because less physical strength is expended by the operator. Therefore, cost per folio is reduced making the Monarch a business economy.

Disciples Day at the World in Chicago

The larger religious bodies have each been having a special day in connection with the great Exposition at the Coliseum. The Disciples of Christ had their day Monday, May 26. The weather was certainly against us, for it rained incessantly all day. But notwithstanding this the attendance was large; good delegations came in from Wisconsin, Illinois and Indiana. We had ordered two hundred plates for the banquet, but we had almost four hundred in attendance. The Assembly Hall given to us for our program in the afternoon was crowded and all available standing room was occupied.

As to the program, it was the very best. The addresses were all of a high order. The program began at eleven o'clock. This was woman's hour, presided over by Mrs. S. J. Russell, president of our Chicago C. W. B. M. Union. The address was given by Mrs. Anna Atwater, of Indianapolis, who filled all our hearts with inspiration as she told us of the enlarging enterprises of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Mrs. E. M. Bowman, who has just returned from a visit to our mission fields in India, also brought us a brief message from the work there.

The afternoon program was held in the Assembly Hall at two o'clock, Austin Hunter, chairman of the committee, presiding. After a prayer by Dr. E. L. Powell, addresses were delivered by Claude E. Hill, Stephen J. Corey and Mrs. Anna Atwater. Mr. Hill, who is our National Superintendent of Christian Endeavor, interpreted the work of Christian Endeavor in its relation to our own religious movement.

Mr. Corey, Corresponding Secretary of the Foreign Society, brought us a strong missionary message, which was most appropriate as our program was held in connection with this greatest of missionary expositions. We have heard Mr. Corey several times, but never heard him speak with greater effectiveness than on this occasion. He told us of his visit to the Congo and of the marvelous transformations of life that have taken place there under the influences of the gospel, modern miracles not surpassed by anything save the resurrection of our Lord. Bro. Corey also spoke at a later hour in the main part of the Exposition. We were most happy to have him with us.

As there were many who could not be present at the morning session to hear Mrs. Atwater, she spoke again at the afternoon session, and her message was a fitting climax to the program of good things in the afternoon. The session closed with prayer by Mr. Benlehr of India.

At four o'clock a half-hour praise and devotional service was conducted by C. J. Sharpe of Hammond, Ind.

At six o'clock our banquet was held in the Coliseum dining hall. This was by far the largest banquet our people in Chicago have had for years. There were just about four hundred plates. Mr. E. M. Bowman, vice-president of the Exposition presided. The address was delivered by Dr. E. L. Powell of Louisville. Dr. Powell was at his best and spoke for an hour upon "Provincialism in Religion." It was a ringing protest against narrowness in religious outlook, and a fine plea for Christian union. Any movement to make large success in these days must be labelled "Undenominational." Our own movement will be fulfilled by and by in the larger unity of the church, be fulfilled "as the dawn is fulfilled in the day, as the bud is fulfilled in the flower, as the river is fulfilled in the sea."

AUSTIN HUNTER.

To Friends of Eureka:

I desire to announce to the alumni and friends of Eureka College my resignation from the office of President of the college. The resignation has been accepted by the Board of Trustees, the same to take effect August 31, 1913, unless it seems wise to close the work a few weks earlier.

My reasons for this action are as follows: The business and educational administration of the college calls at present for the sacrifice of scholarly pursuits to such an extent that I find myself unwilling to pay the price for continuance in the work. The opportunity for scholarly work seems much less than the board and I considered possible at the time I came. This changed situation leads me to seek another field where I shall be able to give myself much more to scholarly work.

I desire to assure the alumni and friends of the college that in leaving I have the feeling of good will to the college and an abounding faith in its future. I shall be glad to further its interests in any way possible, and bespeak for all friends of the institution that same hearty co-operation and the same hope and confidence which have been manifest in the past. It is possible for you to make the institution a power for even larger service than in past years.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointedby churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

The Seven Thousand

There were seven thousand in Israel all the knees of whom had not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth of whom had not kissed him.

How the news surprised Elijah! It is always occasion for surprise, encouragement and pathos. It is a needed and beautiful reminder of the hidden resources of the kingdom of God on earth; it is a constant encouragement to the man who stands alone, God's champion of righteousness, to know that somewhere in the world there are others who care for the things he cares for, whose silent prayers assist his own outspoken but solitary exhortations. Elijah never knew that there could be so many faithful men in Israel. His cry ascended to the Lord, complaining that the children of Israel had thrown down the altars of the Lord and had turned to the worship of Baal; that they had slain the prophets with the sword; that iniquity sat enthroned with Jezebel as a supreme political and religious power in the land, and that he only was left. Hear his pitiful lamentation as he says, "I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts; because the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life to take it away." It was an encouragement and a rebuke to Elijah to be told he was not alone in that heroic and desperate undertaking; that God had seven thousand others who cared for the same things.

Luther had to stand alone and he cried, "Here I stand, I cannot do otherwise. God help me." God did help him and helped him largely because the peasants' revolt had prepared the mind of the common people of Germany for just such a movement. Robert Brown had to stand alone in England, when for the sake of religious freedom he found himself imprisoned in dungeon after dungeon, in some of which he could not see his hand before his face, yet he was not alone and the Puritan movement grew by leaps and bounds and out of it came America. There is always the 7,000 somewhere who have not bowed the knee to Baal nor kissed him.

But the text involves a two-fold pathos. It shows us to a pitiful degree the lamentations of the great prophet, Elijah, and it shows us also the sad state of Israel in which a country whose united effort might have involved such spiritual potency was permitted to become ineffective.

Why did not Elijah go back to Israel and organize the 7,000 and with them rouse the conscience of the nation? What might he not have done with such a host! 7,000 was the number of David's horsemen in that great expedition of conquest by which he extended the borders of his kingdom from Damascus to the southern desert.

Seven thousand was just the number of the men of might whom Nebuchadnezzar carried away to Babylon along with artisans and people of royal birth, and the withdrawal of these utterly broke the spirit of the Jewish nation.

The lack of these 7,000 was fatal.

Then, 7,000 was the number of the young men of the princes of the prophets, who had not defiled themselves, and who girding themselves together under the leadership of the king and, with the moral inspiration of the prophet, fell upon the hosts of Benhadad and put them to utter confusion.

What might not a prophet have done with 7,000 men at his back if he had known how to organize and lead them and make them an effective instrument in the righting of a great wrong! Elijah could call down fire from heaven, but he could not call around him the men who really believed in the things in which he believed, and that sometimes is quite as important. His prayer shut up the heavens, but his voice could not rally his companions on earth; all day long he stood upon the mountain top beside the unburnt sacrifice; alone amid the 450 prophets of Baal, alone with king and court against him, and all the time there were 7,000 people in hiding who ought to have been at his side. It is encouraging to know that the 7,000 were somewhere. It is most disheartening to know that throughout that terrible crisis they left the prophet in isolation and permitted him at length to face discouragement and despair because he stood alone.

Where are the seven thousand? There are prophets who are struggling against hopeless odds, who might be saved from disheartening loneliness if some of the good people now in hiding would speak out. There are ministers ready to give up because they cannot find even seventy of the seven thousand. Let us not blame too severely the brave old prophet who thought that all God's plan depended on him. Let us rather blame and exhort the men who should be standing by him to break their silence, to leave their timidity and selfishness and rally to assist the right.

You may not know where all the seven thousand are, but if you can find one of them and bring him to the doing of his duty you will do a good thing.

Are you one of the seven thousand?

The Old and the New

The present moment gets its meaning from the past and from the future. The wisdom of the past, whether we acknowledge it or not, guides our actions. Whether our work is worth while depends upon the demands we feel we can legitimately make upon the future.

In Matt. 13:52, the function of the teacher in relation to the old and new is stated. The Christian teacher is neither a reactionary nor an iconoclast. He is an interpreter. He looks for truth and he acknowledges it wherever it is found. He does not boast that he is orthodox or that he is heretical. His desire is to have something to give to those who come to him for instruction. He is a man of his time. He studies its thought and activities. He tries to understand the doubt and the faith of his generation. If men think in terms of law, he thinks in terms of law. If the biological method is in the ascendency, he uses it in his study of religion and morality and in his teaching.

The old paths seem to many of us the easiest to follow. We know when the strain comes and when we can rest ourselves. Then, our fathers have walked in these paths. They were wise men and good road-builders. We should lose, we fear, some of our appreciation of them if we should desert the ways in which they walked. We believe in social and religious continuity. The truth is timeless, we think, and therefore we should beware of new ideas and new forms of expression. We are right in holding that our fathers found truth and that we should hold to what they found. We are wrong if we are of the opinion that we shall lose our appreciation of them if we enter new paths. They were pioneers. They accepted what the past gave them and they used it in gaining new truth. We shall know them better if we follow their example.

Jesus fulfilled the law by showing its meaning, by pointing out what was fundamental in it. Thus he enabled the world to dispense with its ceremonies. These were only pedagogical necessities in the days of humanity's childhood and youth. He further changed the emphasis from the outward to the inner. He bade his disciples judge themselves what was right. This meant that their reason was to be held in honor and that it was required of them to cultivate their spiritual understanding. His words do not constitute a code of ethics; they reveal him to the discerning. To receive them as a code is to introduce confusion into our lives. To treat them as helps to an understanding of him and to the adjustment of ourselves to the spiritual environment is to bring order and freedom to the life within and to make ourselves forces for progress. The old then ceases to be a burden to us; it becomes food for our souls, a way of freedom and not of slavery.

The difficulty with our creed making is that we regard our statements as final. Life is too complex to be confined within the circle of any creed, whether written by philosophic Greeks, learned Germans or learned Englishmen. Our quarrel, then, is with those who ask us to accept one of the historic creeds as a full and satisfactory statement of our faith. As testimonies to the faith of their writers they are of great value. They deal with questions in which we are interested and their statements will prove helpful to those of us who take pains to understand them in the light of their origin. The old creeds are good. We do well to study them. But to allow them to prescribe the limits of our thinking is a poor way to honor them. They are stepping stones to higher things. Our faith must be our own. We must do some thinking of our own, even if we grant that we have neither the learning nor the insight of the fathers.

The old faith, loyalty, and love we wish to preserve. The old wrongs we must destroy. The new earth is to be one wherein dwelleth righteousness. "The fearful, and unbelieving, and abominable, and murderers, and fornicators, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and liars," shall have no place in the new social order. Our fathers had to tolerate some evils which we may hope to eradicate. They have given us political freedom and they have left us an educational ideal. We respect the rights of the individual because they showed us how. We must gain industrial freedom. We must destroy all commercial agencies that war against the happiness and health of childhood and the purity of womanhood. Lying in business must be treated as treason to humanity and the liar must have his just punishment. Intelligence, health, happiness, righteousness will characterize the new order. The Safest Frontier on Earth

Great preparations are under way for the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the signing of the treaty which ended the war of 1812. There is to be an international memorial at Niagara Falls, a monument on both sides of the river. Possibly it will be an international bridge. That will be a fitting monument.

But the best monument is the row of crumbling forts and rusty guns all the way from the eastern boundary of Maine to the western boundary of Oregon. Three thousand miles and more of frontier lie between Passamaquoddy Bay and Puget Sound, and in all that distance not a shotted gun points menacingly from either country toward the other.

It is the largest, the securest, the safest frontier on earth. Its hundreds of miles of water-front are safely guarded by two old tubs, one of them flying the Union Jack and the other the Stars and Stripes. When we wanted to show at the world's fair a battleship more modern than the old Michigan or the three ships of Columbus, we built one out of brick—an eminently successful ship she was, answering every purpose.

The most dangerous international boundaries on earth are those where forts are most modern, where troops are thickest, and cannon double-shotted. The most dangerous coasts on earth are those protected by the largest battleships. The safest frontier in the world is that between the United States and Canada. It stands an object lesson to all nations.

Why are they so slow to learn?

The True Democracy

Democracy—the etymology of the word tells the story. It is two Greek words—demos, the people, and kratos, a power—it is power increasingly possessed and exercised by the people. Lincoln defined democracy as it expressed itself in government "as a government of the people, for the people and by the people." What a fine symbol of democracy is Lincoln. Look at his great, strong, sad face—a man raised up out of the common forgotten soil of humanity to be a great nation's leader in an hour of terrible trial. In him you see what the common clay of humanity may become when it is used and infused by the divine spirit.

Here in America we are trying to express this great idea. We are expressing it in the realm of education. We seek to educate everybody. We seek to educate their hands as well as their heads. We prepare boys and girls for the shop and the factory, as well as for the college and the university. We believe in making our boys and girls useful as well as accomplished. We give them a vocational training as well as a cultural education. We seek to make them capable as well as learned. And the youths and the maidens who go to college will be told that they must serve their own generation or they will be false to their alma mater. The old education educated the privileged class away from the masses. The new education educates the masses to enjoy more and more privileges. There are people in America who are afraid lest we will "educate people out of their station." But that is the glory of America. America spells opportunity. No American boy or girl needs stay in any class. American society is not static. If an American boy or girl has worth or gains in value to society, they may move up to any station.

And we are expressing this idea of the worth of man industrially. Industrial democracy is one of the slogans of our day. The cultured class of the past was a segregated class. The gentlemen of the old school and the ladies of the old regime had plenty of time to be courteous and cultured. They lived a leisurely, protected life. But today a man must gain and express his culture in and through his work. The only vocations respected in ancient society were statecraft and war. That of the clergy was added in the middle ages. The necessary hard work was done by those who were in partial or complete servitude. Manual work was regarded as dishonorable. Now all work is honorable. A man today is not honorable except as he renders some real service to mankind. Never again shall one race or class enjoy a freedom that will be founded upon the slavery of another race or class. Liberty to be of real worth must be for all. It must not be for the few at the expense of the many. All are agreed that social conditions are not what they should be. There are too many excessively rich men, and there are far too many excessively poor men. We don't know yet how to distribute our wealth. Socialism suggests as a remedy the development of a class consciousness in those who do the hard work of the world. Socialism is undemocratic. It would create a class war. Industrial democracy tells us that every prosperous community creates more than it can consume. That social surplus we must learn to distribute fairly, honestly, fraternally.

We are expressing this idea of the worth of man politically. More fundamental legislation in favor of popular government has been enacted since 1900 than was enacted in the previous century; and that which has been adopted, is but a small part of the program that is pending. Democracy is growing. There is more of it in the world today than ever before. Never did the word mean so much. Democracy is a youngling yet. But it has wrought wonders. It has reformed our prison system. It has revised our criminal code. It is humanizing our shops and factories. It will eventually abolish war. It will one day establish a confederacy of nations. It is slowly substituting the word brother for the word barbarian. It is one of the operating tendencies of our time. Men are becoming increasingly democratic in spirit and in outlook because their minds and hearts are keyed to the note of democracy which is the genius of the program of Jesus. The ethics of Jesus is becoming the ethics of mankind.

What the States Are Doing

Massachusetts has on its statute books a minimum wage law that instructs the governor to appoint a commission of three persons, and authorizes this commission to establish minimum wage boards for the determination of the wages of women and minors. Ohio has adopted a constitutional amendment that authorizes the enactment of minimum wage legislation in that state. Governor Sulzer, of New York, in his inaugural address, earnestly recommended a minimum wage law for the Empire state. Here are his words: "To secure protection that other workers have won for themselves through organization, we should carefully consider in this state the establishment of wage boards with authority to fix a living wage for conditions of work below which standards no industry should be allowed to continue its operations." Several state legislatures are considering this question. Wisconsin has an "Industrial Commission." Professor John R. Commons, a member of that Commission, insists that "a minimum wage standard is essential for the protection of labor." He declares the minimum wage "to be the final rounding out of a great scheme of labor legislation." Oregon and California are considering this question. On March 19, Governor Spry of Colorado signed a minimum wage law which makes it obligatory to pay every woman worker in that state at least 75 cents a day. Lieutenant Governor O'Hara, of Illionis, is conducting an investigation that looks forward to the passage of a minimum wage law in that state. He has suggested a conference of governors to be held at an early date in Springfield, Ill., for the purpose of formulating a uniform minimum wage law. The governors of many states have agreed to attend that conference.

The Complexion of Civilization

Is civilization growing dark-skinned? That is a fair question. The conquering races of the world have been fair. The colonizing people have been the light-haired, long-headed type, but the world's skulls are said to be growing more round, the axis from front to back shortening in its proportion to the transverse line from right to left. The long-headed type, the restless, colonizing type, the energetic, fair-haired people move out and subdue the world. The dark-haired people stay at home and with them the race becomes phlegmatic and well content with itself. Complexion is a mark of race and a visible token of character.

Scientific observers declare that the light-haired type is growing rare in Great Britain. For the vast majority of young Englishmen there is no reasonable prospect of advancement in their country. The energetic, the restless, the adventurous leave it, and these are in good proportion the people of light hair.

Now the vital question arises whether that adventurous race that conquered land and sea is adapted to settling down and dominating industrial civilization? Light-haired races are sailors, pioneers, adventurers, ranchmen, farmers, explorers, but the world has grown too small for them and we now must have a race of people content to deal with smelters and shuttles and looms and lumber yards.

It is said that dark-skinned people on the whole adapt themselves better to town and industrial life than do fair-haired people. Are we to find that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong? Are we to discover that the lithe, nervous, energetic men from the Northlands must give way to solid, bullet-headed, dark-haired folk from farther South?

If so, history will reverse itself, for the cold lands of the North have been civilization's reservoirs. There have grown up the hardy folk who have learned to save enough in a short summer to keep them alive through a cold winter and to push out and conquer hunger and cold. Are we to lose them because, like Alexander, they have no more worlds to conquer? Alexander, by the way, was fair-haired. Is the battle henceforth to the slow-going child of the darker skin, and must industrialism furnish a weapon that is to reverse the processes of history? It is a fair question and one which scientific men are now discussing with considerable acumen.

We do not pretend to any expert knowledge of the problem involved, but we note the discussion with a considerable degree of interest.

On the Book Table

Some New MacMillan Books

THE PROBLEM OF CHRISTIANITY. By Josiah Royce. In two volumes, $3.50, net.

A work of great importance to all students of religion and philosophy and to the general reader who keeps abreast with progress in these fields is Dr. Josiah Royce's "The Problem of Christianity," in two volumes, the first, "The Christian Doctrine of Life," and, the second, "The Real World and the Christian Ideas."

Volume I is a study of the human and empirical aspects of some of the leading ideas of Christianity; Volume II deals with the technically metaphysical problems to which these ideas give rise. The two volumes are contrasted in their methods, the first discussing religious experience, the second dealing with its metaphysical foundations. They are, however, closely connected in their purposes, and at the end the relations between the metaphysical and the empirical aspects of the whole undertaking are reviewed.

The "Christian Ideas" which Dr. Royce treats as "leading and essential" are, first, the Idea of the "Community," historically represented by the Church; second, the Idea of the "Lost State of the Natural Man," and the third, the Idea of "Atonement," together with the somewhat more general idea of "Saving Grace."

"These three," Dr. Royce says, "have a close relation to a doctrine of life which, duly generalized, can be, at least in part, studied as a purely human philosophy of loyalty and can be estimated in empirical terms apart from any use of technical dogmas and apart from any metaphysical opinion. * * * Nevertheless no purely empirical study of the Christian doctrine of life can, by itself, suffice to answer our main questions. It is indeed necessary to consider the basis in human nature which the religion of loyalty possesses and to portray the relation of this religion to the social experience of mankind. To this task the first part of these lectures is confined, but such a preliminary study sends us beyond itself.

The second part of these lectures considers the neglected philosophical problem of the sense in which the community and its Spirit are realities.

THE COUNTRY CHURCH. By Charles O. Gill and Gifford Pinchot.

Is the country church growing in size and power, or declining? Is it doing effectually the work which belongs to it? These are in the main the questions which Charles Otis Gill and Gifford Pinchot consider in their new book, The Country Church, to be published this month. The book is not a collection of opinions as it was found that there were almost as many who believed thoroughly in the country church and the work which it is doing as there were those who were doubtful of its efficacy. The volume is rather made up of facts brought forward by the personal investigations of the authors, and conclusions based on these facts. It is published under the authority of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

THE INSIDE OF THE CUP. By Winston Churchill. $1.50 net.

"The Inside of the Cup" is undoubtedly the best novel Mr. Churchill has written. As a powerful study of the modern tendencies in the Church and their new relations to life, it sets forth in masterly delineation the personal history of a young clergyman and the transformation of his views and attitude toward the great social problems of the times.

The romance of "Richard Carvel," the realism of "Coniston," and the deep social significance of "A Modern Chronicle," are repeated in this powerful story.

In conception, consistent character drawing, and style, "The Inside of the Cup" reveals Mr. Churchill again as America's foremost novelist.

This novel will evoke not only the admiration of Mr. Churchill's many readers but it will undoubtedly become the most discussed book of 1913.

Northern Baptist Convention

The Northern Baptist Convention was held at Detroit May 21-28. More than 1,000 delegates were announced as accredited by President Henry Bond at the first session. Hundreds of others straggled in later. The Unification process, whereby all co-operating societies were merged into one General Convention, was seen to be working beautifully, and without a hitch, for the first time. No one seemed to be afraid that some ecclesiastical Jesse James was about to swoop down upon them, and divest the delegates of their liberties. Brotherly love characterized the convention, likewise common purpose and mutual confidence.

The American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society reported favorably upon the union enterprise at Nanking, China, in marked contrast to the ungentlemanly action of the delegates of the Southern Baptist Convention, which forced a missionary to stop his speech advocating the same thing. That report says: "The East China Union Medical School at Nanking, maintained by seven missionary societies including our own, has now become the medical department of the University of Nanking. Through this action our society has become related to this institution which promises to influence strongly and helpfully all missionary and Christian education in Eastern China." Co-operation has not been limited to educational work. At the urgent request of the board of directors of the China Baptist Publication Society and upon recommendation of the South China Conference, Rev. Jacob Speicher, of Kityang, has been transferred to Canton as our representative in the work of the Publication Society. Plans have been presented for the union of the three missions occupying Hangchow in an institutional evangelistic center in that city. Most important of all, however, have been the interdenominational continuation committee conferences held by Dr. John R. Mott in a large number of the important missionary centers of India, China, Korea and Japan. In these conferences co-operation seems to have been the most important topic under consideration and encouraging progress is reported both in the spirit of unity and in measures to secure practical co-operation of the different missionary bodies occupying the same general area.

The total number of missionaries as shown in the statistical tables is only 694 as compared with 722 reported one year ago. This decrease is due to the transfer of a considerable number of missionaries from the active list to the list of those who have retired from active service. In the light of such changes as these we are led to realize more and more clearly that the abiding force in missionary endeavor is not the human agency but the Lord of the harvest himself, and in that eternal and omnipotent Power we rest our confidence for the ultimate triumph of the task in which all are engaged and to whose consummation each contributes his share as opportunity is given.

The statistics show, in heathen lands, 5,434 native workers; 827 self-supporting churches; 159,920 church members; baptisms 10,040; number of pupils under instruction 63,386; native contributions $122,312; patients treated, 47,760.

One Obstacle to Christian Union

Without any comment whatever, except as may be implied in the five words that form the headline to this item, we re-print a portion of Editor J. B. Gambrell's editorial in the Baptist Standard (Dallas) of May 22:

The Sunday-school Board made a report of an enlarging business. The business for the year ran far over $300,000. Next year the new office building will be ready for dedication when the Convention meets in Nashville.

There was a real debate over the International Lesson Series, free and vigorous. No harm was done but great good. The doom of the old hop, skip and jump method has been pronounced. It lingered entirely too long superfluous on the stage. The Convention reached a happy conclusion. Our own lesson committee will stand for us and revise the lessons suggested by the International Committee. The graded lesson system will rapidly take the place of the lessons on the old plan. These give opportunity for real teaching. Our board has the matter in hand, and I think we may all wisely coöperate with the Board in perfecting the graded lessons.

On more than one topic the question of union in work with other denominations came to the surface. My own views are settled. The truth first; then as much co-operation as is practical. I consider the union and co-operation of Baptists among themselves immeasurably more important than union with other people. That is going to be my first care. I will never be a party to mongrelizing the truth for the sake of a spurious union. But it would be equally foolish for Baptists to refuse to co-operate with other Christians to accomplish common ends where it can be done without detriment to the truth. We must keep in the middle of the road and keep right on. And this is what the Convention indicated it will do. No one could fail to see that there is a growing opposition in the Convention to allowing self-appointed men of all sorts to frame up schemes for doing all sorts of things, and foist them on our churches. I think what was felt and said and done was altogether wholesome, and there was a unanimity in conclusions which gives encouragement to us all. The statement by Secretary Willingham that the Board stands for having our own theological schools met with favor though no test vote was taken.

Dr. Stimson on Congregational Unification

The Congregational exchanges more and more are crowding their pages with the pros and cons, mostly pros, of ecclesiastical unification. A committee of nineteen representative Congregationalists some time ago published in advance its proposed report to the forthcoming National Council. That report is evoking much epistolary matter, and frequent page-articles. The various societies of the Congregational churches are as loosely attached to each other, corporately speaking, as our own. It is proposed to unify these societies into practically one general convention, just as the Northern Baptists have done, and just as the Disciples of Christ are about to execute. Among the latest champions of Congregational Unification is Doctor Henry A. Stimson.

In an article in The Congregationalist (Boston) of May 29, Dr. Stimson goes into ancient Congregational history and comes out with flying colors for unification, as follows in part:

"With this history behind us, it becomes us to recognize that Individualism has been our curse, as Separation has been our fetich. Today unity and organized fellowship can alone be our salvation. Other Nonconformists have learned how to work together, to differ, and yet to abide in love. Fellowship has been to us little more than an expression, while our flag has been our Individualism, which bears the same relation to Independence that license does to liberty. We are called now to work out our Independence in the bonds of a union of our churches, which will enable us to turn toward our brethren of the other denominations with a united front and the outstretched hands of a fellowship which is to be as genuine and thoroughgoing as it is open-hearted and brotherly."

A straw vote was taken recently at the Fall River meeting of the Massachusetts Congregational State Association. This straw vote indicates that the measure will be adopted. Not less than 109 votes against 28, was the way the vote sized up for unification among those delegates.

Modern Pastoral Calls

Doctor Henry Alford Porter, pastor of the "big Baptist church" of Louisville, has at last been enticed away from that burg to Dallas, Texas. The Dallas brethren will give him $6,500 a year, an assistant pastor, a secretary, an automobile and a chauffeur to boot, for his services as pastor in Dallas. Louisville will give him resolutions of regret, and for years probably nurse a grudge against Dallas. Dallas has been after Doctor Porter for many months. Last fall the Dallas people had Doctor Porter in their city and pleaded with him to come over and help them. Doctor Porter turned them down. When he came back to Louisville, and told his Louisville congregation all about it, a congregation that packed the Walnut Street Baptist Church rose up en masse and gave their idol a sensational ovation. The other day, Doctor Porter was in St. Louis in attendance upon the Southern Baptist Convention. The Dallas people were there also. Dallas worked on Doctor Porter's nerves, let us suppose, and at last succeeded in luring him to the Lone Star state, where he will now be among the highest priced pastors in Texas. Such is a modern call to become a pastor. It is little less than highway robbery! The Dallas brethren must be congratulated, but the Louisville brethren—what of them? Are condolences in order?

Advertising Ministerial Pensions

The Board of Ministerial Relief of the Northern Presbyterian Church has struck out a new and brilliant way to advertise its campaign for a general endowment fund from the proceeds of which its aged ministers may be pensioned for life. The scheme is to reprint and distribute no less than 75,000 copies of Thomas Nelson Page's story "The Shepherd Who Watched by Night." It is a story calculated to arouse sympathy for the veterans of the Cross. The Presbyterian Board's aim is to raise a $10,000,000 endowment fund. Interest in this aim will be intensified, it is thought, by the reading of Mr. Page's noble story. Mr. Page himself, who originally had no idea that such a use would or could be made of his work, declares that his hope in writing the story was to develop just such a sentiment. Would it not be a splendid thing if our own Board of Ministerial Relief could have this story re-printed, too, and distribute it broadcast among our fellow-Disciples to advertise its work and its aims?

Southern Presbyterians and Federal Council

For months before the General Assembly of the Southern Presbyterian church met in Atlanta in May, it was felt that the Presbyterian church, U. S. would withdraw from the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ, because of alleged liberal views of President Shailer Mathews. The Southerners feared that their reputation for orthodoxy had been compromised by the election of Doctor Mathews. Opinion was evenly divided when the assembly met. When the matter came to a vote, opinion changed and veered around to a surprising majority in favor of remaining in the Federal Council.

It was in connection with this theme of federation that Dr. R. F. Campbell of Asheville proposed in the Southern Assembly a very interesting plan for increasing the importance of the other specialized Federal Council of Presbyterian denominations. He advocated the creation of an upper house of that federation, in which the different denominations concerned shall have equal representation, just as the states in the national senate. With the existing federation to serve as a lower house—representation therein being proportionate to membership—a joint body would be created in which the lesser denominations would not be overwhelmed. The plan was laid over for a year.

Episcopalian Representation

An interesting discussion is going on in the Episcopalian press about the basis of representation in the General Convention. The house of delegates in the General Convention, which meets next October in New York City, is composed of eight delegates for each of the sixty-seven dioceses, no matter how large or small the diocese may be. The diocese of New York with its 89,944 communicants has no more representatives in the General Convention than the diocese of Springfield with its 3,733 communicants. Pennsylvania with 58,198 communicants will have the same number of votes as the diocese of Fond du Lac with 5,395. The diocese is the unit of representation. This will have an immensely important bearing on the question of changing the name of the Protestant Episcopal church to that of American Catholic Church. The eastern dioceses are fostering a movement to change this basis of representation. It does look ridiculous that a "high church" diocese like Fond du Lac can wield such a disproportionate influence. This is the diocese that is leading the "high church" name-changers. The democratizing of the House of Delegates in the General Convention would go a long ways toward putting a quietus on Fond du Lac and similar small dioceses.

Congregational and Baptist Union?

Union of the Baptist and Congregational denominations could be effected within one month if a uniform method of baptism could be agreed upon, according to Rev. Dr. Ambrose W. Vernon, a Congregational minister of Brookline, Mass., who addressed the Baptist ministers' conference at Boston May 29, on "Church Unity."

He reviewed the work and tenets of both denominations, spoke of their influence in the world for evangelism and said that united they could be of untold worth.

"The entire thing," he said, "that is holding the Baptists and Congregationalists apart is the matter of baptism and whether persons should be dipped or sprinkled. We could unite within one month if baptismal form could be agreed upon. And you Baptists are so much larger than the Congregationalists that I should think you would give this serious thought and take a chance."

Dr. Henry Van Dyke Another Heretic?

Dr. Henry Van Dyke of Princeton says he is a heretic, if his son Tertius is. The other day Tertius Van Dyke was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York City. That action was protested by prominent members of the Presbytery on the ground of the liberal views of young Tertius Van Dyke, graduate of the Union Theological Seminary. Well, Tertius Van Dyke was ordained in Brick Presbyterian Church, where his famous father was until recently pastor. Doctor Henry Van Dyke preached the ordination sermon, and in it, according to the Christian Intelligencer of May 21, he came to the defense of his son's liberal views, saying if the son is heretical the father is also. Think of the author of "The Gospel for an Age of Doubt" saying that! What's next?

About as lifeless a thing as we ever see is a stone. But Paul says that believers are "living stones," built into a temple, having, it is suggested, a grip to hold on and a will to stay put.

From Near and Far

Ten new secretaries will be sent to China, India, and Japan to promote religious and social activities as a result of a luncheon held recently in the University Club, Chicago, at which G. Sherwood Eddy, general Y. M. C. A. secretary of Asia, and Fletcher S. Brockman, national Y. M. C. A. secretary of China, referred to the opportunities for Christian service in the Orient. Since the dinner those present have pledged sufficient funds to support the work of the ten new secretaries for the next five years. For a number of years the Chicago Y. M. C. A. has supported two secretaries in Hongkong, China. With twelve representatives in the Orient, the Chicago association is said to lead all other Young Men's Christian Associations in missionary enterprise.

Eighteen delegates to the International Peace Conference to consider plans for the celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the treaty of Ghent visited the University of Chicago on May 16. At the meeting in Leon Mandel Assembly Hall President Harry Pratt Judson presided and gave the address of welcome, and Sir Arthur Lawley, former Lieutenant Governor of the Transvaal and Governor of Madras; Mr. T. Kennard Thompson, president of the Canadian Club of New York; and Dr. E. R. L. Gould, formerly of the University of Chicago, made addresses. The hall was filled with an enthusiastic audience of students.

An interesting experiment is being tried in Philadelphia. An earnest campaign is being conducted against vice as it is entrenched in houses of prostitution. The mayor and voluntary agencies are coöperating. The "experiment" alluded to above consists in offering to provide attractive and comfortable homes for women who want to or can be persuaded to give up a life of vice and become virtuous, respectable. There have been several acceptances of the offer made, but comparatively very few.

Resolutions involving changes in the evangelical work and the financial system of the denomination were adopted at the recent conference of Seventh Day Adventists at Takoma Park, Md. One resolution called for the raising of 20 cents a week from every member of the church for the support of missions and for the liquidation of its debts. The other released all ministers from the institutional affairs of the denomination to devote their entire time to the specific work of preaching.

A Sunday observance campaign is on in Tacoma, Wash. Practically all of the leaders in religious work are enlisted in it. Though the campaign has only begun, the friends of the European Sunday are showing marked signs of nervousness. The mayor and many of the leading business and professional men are supporting the movement heartily.

The U. P. church of Johnstown, N. Y., with a membership of 206, gave to missions last year $2,710, or an average of $13.15 a member. This is an increase of $1.94 per member over last year's report. Dr. James A. Williamson is the pastor, and a layman who saw the opportunity to press the mission question worked by his side.

Congregations in Omaha, Neb., were given the unusual experience June 1 of being addressed by editors. Thirty-five newspaper men, in attendance at the Nebraska Editorial Association meeting, occupied city pulpits, speaking on the theme, "What the Press of Nebraska Is Doing to Raise the Standard of Morals in the State."

Mrs. Woodrow Wilson is taking an active personal part in the Washington City civic betterment movement, breaking the precedent which has barred the mistresses of the White House from such activities.

An agent of the New York City Bureau of Social Hygiene called on one hundred and twenty-two real estate firms of that city, of whom only seventeen declined to rent property for avowedly immoral purposes.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Mrs. Chapman, and Mr. and Mrs. Charles M. Alexander have just landed at Vancouver, B. C., returning home from nearly two years of evangelistic work which they have conducted in Australia and New Zealand.

A great amphitheater is to be constructed in Garfield Park, Chicago, capable of accommodating 9,000 people. The idea is to provide a great open-air place where plays can be given for the benefit of the public and where conferences can be held.

Pres. John Willis Baer of Los Angeles, told the Presbyterian Assembly he would "rather go staggering drunk to the gates of heaven, an unconverted man, than to go as a Presbyterian elder who has rented his property for brothels or saloon purposes."

Some Aspects of Provincialism

A Sermon Delivered at First Church, Louisville, Ky., May 25.

By E. L. Powell

"We will find our text recorded in the fifth chapter of the epistle of Paul to the Galatians, the thirteenth verse: 'For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty, only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but for love serve one another.'

"My subject is entitled 'Some Aspects of Provincialism.' The Copernican astronomy gave us an universe, and man no longer dwells in provinces, but in a world each part of which is related to every other part, and all of which constitutes a splendid, glorious unit. It would seem that provincial thinking and provincial life would be almost an impossibility under the inspiring influence of the new conception of the world. We are almost compelled to think in terms that are universal. We must entertain world conceptions and think in world terms.

"What is provincialism?

"It is the antithesis of the large, the expansive, the unlimited, the universal. It is to have a limited program whilst God and the angels are bidding us dare great things and achieve great things. It is mistaking the ceiling for heaven's infinite dome. It is being content with the rumbling of cart wheels when it is our privilege to listen to angelic music. It is having to do with the segment rather than the circle; it is hitching our wagon to a post rather than to a star. It is living and moving and having our being in thought or in activity within the narrow and the bounded rather than in the great universalities of thought and of life. It is choosing the lake for a yachting expedition rather than the ocean that we may feel the infinite suggestiveness and meaning of the unbounded.

"Provincialism is the antithesis of liberty. It is the antithesis of all that is associated with largeness, with greatness, with unbounded opportunity, with unlimited service.

Some Harmless Kinds of Provincialism.

"There is a good-natured sort of provincialism which expresses itself in contented ignorance, smiling, benevolent and harmless. It prefers home-spun to satins and silks. It chooses the tuning fork rather than the pipe organ. It sings of the good old days. It is satisfied to hear the cackle of its burg and to think of that cackle as the wave which goes around the world. It knows nothing of higher criticism; it cares less. David Harum would be its type in the world of affairs. Its feminine manifestation would suggest a religion of old lace and lavender, fragrant wth perfume and redolent with the tenderness and sweetness of dear and hallowed and sacred memories. It stays at home because it does not love to travel. It prefers the fireside because it does not care for the battle. It is altogether amiable and sweet-spirited and content. The world moves on in its largeness, in its great currents of enterprise and high endeavor, but this good-natured provincialism smiles and is satisfied, but has no interest in world movements.

"And there is the provincialism of the heart, associated with culture, associated with travel, associated with great thinking, associated with great enterprises, associated with world citizenship. It is the provincialism of the heart which makes possible patriotism, and however well traveled and far traveled such an one may be, he lives in his affections and in his sympathies, in the old home and not very far from the old cradle of his childhood, and not very far from the old cemetery in which his loved ones are buried. He is catholic in his interests, catholic in his sympathies, catholic in work, catholic in giving unlimited expression to his faculties and powers, but in his heart he is a provincial, and he can feel even as this good-natured provincialist of whom I have spoken feels, the significance and the sweetness of the old oaken bucket which hangs by the well.

"God save us from that sort of liberality that is not born and is not sustained and is not nurtured by the provincialism of the heart.

Harmful Religious Provincialism.

"But tonight, my friends, I wish to bring a message concerning a provincialism in the life of the church, which is limiting, dwarfing, hindering, destructive and utterly antagonistic to the meaning and spirit and significance of the religion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I speak of the provincialism which may be stated as denominationalism. Denominationalism is provincialism with all of its dwarfing and hindering and restraining power, and the awful fact is that the church of today is provincial in its limited and bounded denominational life.

"First of all, denominationalism closes the doors of the soul to other truth than that which a particular or individual denomination holds, as its special depositary. The Apostle Paul writing to his Corinthian brethren, warns them against this very spirit of provincialism, which makes it impossible for them to receive truth from all sources and through all influences and agencies which may have truth to impart. Said he to these people, "Why do you glory in men? You are constituting sects in the church, you are beginning the inauguration of denominationalism in the church.'

"Some of you say, 'We are for Paul,' as though Paul could satisfy all of the demands of your soul for truth, as though Paul held all the immeasureable gospel of the universe in his message. Some of you glory in Apollos, and you are perfectly content to move and to have your being within the limited circle of his influence, and bounded by the limitations of his message. Some of you gather yourselves in a party around Cephas, and you are perfectly content with the aspects of truth presented by Cephas. Do you not see that you are impoverishing your own souls? You have the right to all that Paul can give you; you have the right to all that Cephas can give you; you have the right to all that Apollos can give you. Why do you narrow yourselves by your partyism and accept only that which is stamped Pauline, or accept only that which is stamped with the name of Apollos, or accept that which is stamped with the name of Cephas?

The Shame of Denominationalism.

"A divided church is guilty of soul robbery. I thank God for Luther, I thank God for Wesley, I thank God for Alexander Campbell, I thank God for all of the great leaders who have given their great messages to mankind, and one certainly would be very foolish to join with others in forming a party whose religious life and faith should be bounded by the personality of either Luther or Wesley or Campbell. Denominationalism is absolute impoverishment. Denominationalism says, We are content to receive an aspect of truth rather than to claim all the glory, all the power, all the shine of the whole truth as it is represented in him who is the inspirer and Lord of every messenger of truth who has come with his partial and fragmentary message to mankind.

"But, furthermore, denominationalism, through its theology, has provincialized the church in that its speculative and metaphysical theology has absolutely kept the church from more than starting in her real mission, that of redemption of the world, in all of the walks and ways and pursuits and activites of the world.

"I do not minimize theology, I am not questioning now its orthodoxy, or pronouncing any word against its heterodoxy. I say it has provincialized the church in that it is necessarily aloof because it is academic, because it is metaphysical, and, therefore, has not reached so far as the needs and sufferings of mankind are concerned. Read the Nicene Creed, read the Westminster Confession, read the Augsburg Confession, read any theology as it is represented in any creed, and what has it to do with modern life? What single affinity is there established by a single theological utterance between the woes of mankind and the truth which it can proclaim? It knows not one thing about a social program. Jesus came with a social program; He came to set at liberty those that were oppressed; He came to open the prison door for imprisoned souls. He came to convert ashes into joy and sorrow into gladness. He came with His message to antagonize and to overthrow all that is oppressive or that is destructive of the rights of the soul.

"The Gospel of Jesus Christ has to do with every interest of life, has to do with the enfranchisement of all that are enslaved, has to do with the liberation of every mind that is in fetters, has to do with the betterment of society, has to do with every interest of government, has to do with every interest of home, has to do with every interest of school, has to do with every interest of business, has to do with every interest with which man is concerned.

"Imagine one holding the Westminster Confession or any other notable and historic creed trying to awaken the church of the living God to a social program by pointing out to that church that the Father and the Son are consubstantial; that there are in the Trinity not three persons and yet three persons, who are but one person; that the great decrees of God, definitely known and comprehended and stated, concern simply and solely individual pardon. You find not one word of social salvation in any creed of Christendom. It is individual; individual in its selfish individualism, as though the great mission of the Church of Jesus Christ was simply to get a man pardon, and then be left without any program; to have one's sins forgiven, or the sins of the multitude that compose the membership of the churches forgiven, with absolutely nothing to do.

The Suffering World Rebukes the Divided Church.

"The world moaning its misery, the great problems confronting us, all these questions of latter-day significance stand up and say, 'What do you say about it? You claim to be a follower of Him who took little children in His arms and blessed them, have you a word on child labor? You claim to be a follower of Him who was good to the sinful woman, have you a word on the white slave traffic? You claim to be a follower of One who long ago touched life in the principles which He enunciated at every point and affecting every interest, what is your Gospel? Don't you see how theology has provincialized us?'

"The church says that it believes in the risen Christ, and so she did once. But this risen Christ has been by the churches, by the denominations through their theology driven back into His tomb, so that He cannot come forth with His mighty power of redemption to set free society from its ills, and to carry humanity forward in the fulfillment of the problem which He Himself announced in the synagogue at Nazareth.

"And, therefore, the cry of the church to-day, representing all of the denominations, knowing the weaknesses and limitations of denominationalism, is back to Christ; back to an historic Christ —the Christ of the creeds can no longer raise the dead, the Christ of the creeds can do nothing, the Christ of the creeds is bound by theological subtleties and metaphysical speculations; the Christ of the creeds can put no power, no inspiration, no dynamics into the life of the church. Back to the historic Christ, and let us see Him at work. Let us see Him as He raises the dead. Let us see Him as He opens the eyes of the blind. Let us see Him as He unstops the ears of the deaf. Let us see Him as He mingles with publicans and sinners and makes than conscious of their self-respect. Let us see Him in His relationships to the misery and to the woe and to the awful agony of mankind, and then we will know what the church ought to be, and the church then will be set free from her entanglements, from her limitations as respects the sacred and the secular, keeping itself within certain bounds as constituting its sole province, and swinging out into the secular in the name of Him who bids her be loosed that she may go forth and claim her mission and her task.

"I want to say, friends, if the testimony of almost any great denominational convention is to be accepted as reliable and trustworthy, that the church through its divisions, through its sects, through its denominations, through its parties, stands almost impotent and powerless in the presence of any great social work that needs to be done. Every element of society is being organized and the church refuses to accept the truth, for which Jesus Christ poured out His life blood, that there must be a united church having only one spirit, and that spirit to do the great straining, draining, tremendous work of the world.

"Now, then, Christian union is the answer to the cry of a provincial church, conscious of her division, conscious of her limitations, conscious of her weaknesses, conscious of her sin, her sin before God. We cannot justify it on any ground either of common sense or scripture. Do you know what is happening right here in this America of ours as the direct result, the immediate result, of our denominationalism? The complete divorce of education from education. Why is it that we cannot teach the Bible in the public schools? It is a perfectly just thing that the State has done in forbidding the Bible to be taught in our public schools, but why is it that we cannot teach the Bible in our public schools, making it possible for the intellect merely to be developed at the expense of the soul's life and the soul's salvation? It is because one denomination fears that the children of another religion will be persuaded, if sectarian instruction be allowed, to accept the teachings and tenets of that religion. It is simply a pure rivalry and a jealous regard for our denominational teaching, our denominational theology, our denominational tenets, and so we have driven the great angel of Christian truth out of the temple of education. Our jealousies have done it; our rivalries have done it; our miserable animosities have done it, and we are criminal before God and the angels. Because we cannot agree among ourselves as to just precisely what is the thing that ought to be taught about Christian religion, we are allowng our children to grow up without ever feeling the mighty pull and power of spiritual impulse or an impulse generated by any higher power than that of the intellect.

The Church Powerless.

"Now I rejoice in the fact that we have come upon a time when we know that we are sinners. There is not a religion that can justify its existence in the presence of that prayer of Jesus Christ poured out almost from a breaking heart that they all may be one 'even as Thou, Father, art in me and I in Thee,' that they all may be one in order that a possible organic union, standing out as the apology and defense and justification of Christianity, may result in having the whole world to believe in Him.

"I have here a little pamphlet given forth by the Christian Unity Foundation of the Protestant Episcopal Church which is carrying forward its propaganda for Christian unity to result in Christian union with remarkable zeal and most commendable earnestness. This Foundation is sending out constantly literature bearing on this great subject of Christian union. Now here is an address delivered by the Rt. Rev. C. P. Anderson, D. D., bishop of Chicago. I must be permitted to quote just an extract or two from this most remarkable utterance. It will have a familiar sound to our own people, and probably I am voicing just the very sort of denominational pride which I would kill in making this utterance, but, at any rate, as I understand our own position and our own plea, I do not see how it could be better stated than in the words of this great distinguished churchman.

Dr. Powell's Church in Louisville.

"The Christian unity propaganda is not radical nor destructive. It is constructive conservatism. It conserves the original constitution of the church. Let us suppose that you are reading the New Testament for the first time without any presuppositions based upon modern conditions in Christendom. You read 'on this rock I will build my church.' 'Tell it to the church.' 'The church, which is His body.' 'He is the head of the body, the church.' 'The church of the Thessalonians,' and so on. Here the church is one. It is a body. It is visible. Now take your eyes off the Bible and look around. Does the bewildering multiplicity of churches fit into the Bible conception of the church? Leave out for the present the form and organization of the church. The point to be pressed is that the New Testament is strong on the doctrine of the church, but knows nothing whatever of the modern idea of churches.

"Poly-churchism is as foreign to the New Testament as polytheism. The 'churches' of the New Testament are geographical congregations of the church. It is true that the sect germ threatened to invade the church even in those early days, but it was anathematized as a sin of the flesh. 'Now, this I mean, that each of you saith, I am of Paul; and I of Apollos; and I of Cephas; and I of Christ. Is Christ divided?' 'I beseech you that there be no division among you.' This very schism which St. Paul characterized as carnal sin has become triumphantly rampant in our time. When one saith, I am of Rome, and another, I of Canterbury, and I of Geneva, and I of Luther, and I of Wesley, are we not carnal and walk as men? The reunion of Christendom, then, is not a perilous pursuit. It would heal wounds, build up the body and restore that unity which characterized the church when she first set out to win the world for Christ.

"And may I add this, likewise from this bishop of the Episcopal Church: 'I speak as a churchman, as a Catholic, as a Christian. Do I need, does any Christian man need, any other terms to define my religion or his? God is my Father; the church is my mother; Christian is my name; Catholic is my surname. Do we need any other names? Why go on to add Anglican, Episcopalian, Roman, Protestant, Presbyterian, Methodist, Congregationalist, Baptist and so on?' That is the new word, although an old word for the divided church of to-day.

"Friends, I am going to say what I believe just here and now, in no spirit of unkindness, recognizing that I must share the guilt. I verily believe that the preachers of the churches are responsible before God for a delayed Christian union. In a recent convention of a great religious denomination a missionary from the foreign field stood up before that august and distinguished body to make a plea for inter-denominational association and co-operation in the conduct of the schools on the foreign field, and he was cried down and was not permitted to finish his address, if the reports of the newspapers are to be accepted, and I have not seen that they have been denied.

"I have heard nothing other than this, that it was not the great rank and file of the membership of that magnificent body that was responsible for this most pronounced provincialism, but those who composed that great convention were preachers of the gospel of Jesus Christ. They were men sworn by their vows to proclaim a gospel representative of the aim and purpose and meaning of that gospel to mankind.

"I do not say that these men are to be charged with having been untrue to their convictions, but I claim that their convictions are so narrow in this age, when the spirit of Christian union is abroad, that they have become absolutely anachronic, out of date; they have been outgrown, they are obsolete, and such an action is absolutely a hindering to make as she claims her great task of not saving an individual here and there, but of redeeming society and presenting here upon this earth some little of the shine and glory of the New Jerusalem let down from God out of heaven.

"I confidently believe, basing my convictions upon the spirit of the time, basing my conviction upon the common sense of business men, who surely know that a divided Christendom is simply wasting money and wasting men and making absolutely ineffective a great Christian program—I dare to entertain the faith that we shall have here in America a national church, because there will be no denominational churches."

The Father's Priesthood

An Appeal to the Fathers of Today

From "Epworth Herald"

The first protector of childhood was the father. Between the little one and all who would harm him, from the foundation of the family, has stood the father. The brother, the friend, the kinsman of whatever degree, might do something in this direction in time of stress; but to the father, always and everywhere, the child looked, and has the right to look for safe-keeping from all that would harm.

The father was the first guardian of health. The mother hand might lead along life's path gently. She might soothe in time of trouble. She might lift up when the little one stumbled and fell; but it was the father's place to watch over the real life crises in sickness or accident.

The father was the first teacher. It was his right, his privilege, to lead the thought of those who called him by the sacred name of father out into the field and tell him the meaning of all the keen young eyes saw in nature. Did the child wonder why the ripple of water made music in its ears, the father's sweet task it was to make known the secret of sound. "Why does the bird flit through the air, and not walk?" the boy asked; and the father took in his hands a fluttering little thing of the sky and taught his child the mystery of bird life. So everywhere out in the world the first things the child knew of the life about him and of knowledge in all spheres came from the lips of the father. From him he learned how to do the work placed upon his shoulders.

The father was the first priest. From the lips of the father the child from the beginning of time learned all it knew of God. The father told his son and his daughter all he himself knew of the relationship of man to man, and of man to society, of man to the world. How deep-seated and how far-reaching this relationship of the father to his son really ought to be, Jehovah himself revealed to the old Hebrew patriarchs. In all literature there is nothing sweeter, nothing more striking and impressive than the language in which God declares the duty of the father toward his sons and daughters in respect to their knowledge of the Ruler of the universe, as well as toward their fellow men. Think of it a moment.

Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord:

And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might.

And these words; which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart:

And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up.

And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes.

And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates.

Many great and precious promises were made by Jehovah for the faithful performance of these duties; and all down through the ages the Hebrews, perhaps, more closely adhered to the divine will than did any other nation.

And every people which has ever risen to any degree of permanence or of real success has based its religious life upon the statutes so earnestly commended to the Hebrew race and so rigidly insisted upon by him who gave utterance to those commandments.

We of our days have gone far astray from the old way. Where is the man who ever thinks of gathering his children about him and teaching them patiently and impressively the law of God? Shall we not blush with shame as we ask this other and more searching question: How great a proportion of the men of our day and generation could, if put to the test, stand up and name over accurately the laws of God as given to man on the tables of stone and as summed up by the Son of God while here in the world? How we stumble and feel our way on through even the shortest and the simplest of these sacred mandates! Not infrequently do we hear men say, when this subject of the observance of the decalogue is brought up, "O, well, the Ten Commandments are no longer in force. They are all abrogated!" It is an easy way of slipping out of a tight place—easy, but so costly!

For think what we are forfeiting when we thus lay aside the old heaven-given relationship of priesthood in the family! Just as surely as night follows day, just so surely will the shadows of an awful retribution settle down upon this nation if it does not speedily return to the old way of making the parent the religious leader of the child.

It is right to place the little ones under the care of the best possible teachers in the public and in the church school for training in religious matters. We do well when we give our young people the best papers, and books and magazines we can. These are mighty agents for good; they have great power in shaping the thought of the coming generation.

But none of these agencies can take the place of the father's influence. That missing, the home is bereft of its most potent force in educating men and women as to their duty toward God and best papers and books and magazines we can. These are mighty man. And the penalty will be swift and terrible.

If we would see peace again in our nation; if we would have hope for the return of real greatness as a people; if we would behold the evangelization of the peoples now in darkness, and if we would witness the widespread sweep of religious, civil, and material prosperity for which many earnest souls are longing and praying, the father must take back again the old-time position of protector, guardian, teacher, and religious instructor of his children. He must be to them a real priest, not simply pointing out to them the way they should go, but himself walking in that way. He must not only "talk of the commandments when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down and when thou sittest up," but he must himself "diligently keep the commandments of the Lord your God and his testimonies and his statutes."

This is surely the footpath of peace. Shall we not walk in it?

Henry Ward Beecher

What the Religious World Owes to Him

By Newell Dwight Hillis, D. D., Brooklyn, N. Y.

[June is the birth month of Henry Ward Beecher and 1913 the centennial of his birth. We are indebted to the "Homiletic Review" for the following extracts from an article by Dr. Hillis.—The Editors.]

The people of the republic, without regard to church affiliations, owe an immeasurable debt to Henry Ward Beecher. We build tombs for our soldiers—they keep the state in liberty; to our jurists and presidents—they teach us justice; to our inventors and merchants—they furnish us with the comforts and conveniences of life; to our martyrs—they die to secure our happiness and moral welfare. What has Mr. Beecher done for Plymouth Church and Brooklyn and America? Perhaps we are prejudiced by virtue of affection and his long career in our city. Let those who are not of us, therefore, go into the witness-stand and give their testimony. Abraham Lincoln never belonged to Plymouth Church—though

Henry Ward Beecher as a Young man.

Abraham Lincoln sat in one of the pews both the Sunday before and the Sunday after his address in Cooper Institute. But Abraham Lincoln once laid down his morning paper, containing a sermon by our ascended Elijah, and said that he knew of no man of whose counsel, sympathy, and daily friendship he would more gladly avail himself. * * *

No man of his day was more misunderstood. Mr. Beecher suffered, on the one hand, from indiscriminate eulogy, fulsome praise, and an affection that could not blame. On the other hand, he suffered from malignant criticism, and even more from jealousy. But now has come a time when it is possible to sift the wheat from the chaff, to estimate his virtues and his strength, and also his mistakes and his ignorance of men, for it has been wisely said, "No one ever knew more about man or less about men." Now that he has been twenty-five years dead, what do men say of him? The greatest leader in the Congregational Church in England has said: "Beecher carried more genius than any other man of his century." Spurgeon called him "the Shakespeare of the Christian pulpit." Dr. William Taylor disagreed with Mr. Beecher in his theology, but after his death Dr. Taylor said of Beecher's address in Liverpool, "the world has heard no such eloquence since Demosthenes." Just before his death Phillips Brooks referred to Mr. Beecher and said, "I regard him as the greatest preacher Protestantism has ever produced."

Beecher as a Prophet.

As a prophet of the unseen God, Mr. Beecher has put the entire nation under obligations. Great as orator, and lecturer, and statesman, his supreme gift was the gift of vision. The prophet is a man who sees the right clearly, who feels the truth deeply, and who will die for his convictions. Not many men of vision and spiritual outlook! There are a thousand analytical intellects born to one seer. Their wisdom is clear and subtle, but their light is always white light; it has no fertilizing power. There are ten thousand great workers in connection with material things where there is one man of vision. Not many Pauls—one in two thousand years. Not many Shakespeares—one in the history of the English race. It sometimes seems as if Mr. Beecher worked under a special dispensation. He himself once said that if you put a microscope over the stamen of the flower, what you see depends not on the flower, but on the power of the lenses. And when a man turns his eyes toward the spiritual sky, what he sees is determined by the spiritual lens that he carries. * * *

Beecher's Wonderful Career.

Consider what Mr. Beecher has done for our country to deserve our praise and our memorials. Pass in review the leading events of his career. He was born in 1813, on the day dedicated to John the Baptist, who made Herod tremble. That was an annus mirabilis. It was the birth year of Wendell Phillips, Charles Sumner, Horace Greeley, and Edwin Stanton. First came ten years in Litchfield, amid the hills, where he grew, a child of the open air and nature: then seven years in Boston, in the era of transcendentalism, and its rich stimulus; then four years at Amherst College. At twenty-one he entered Lane Theological Seminary, where his father was professor of theology. The abolition reform was on. Some of the students were mobbed out of Kentucky. The atmosphere was rife with theological discussion. Dr. Wilson tried Beecher's father for heresy. The favorite text of the theologians was "contend earnestly for the faith." And they fought vigorously and quoted Scripture as an excuse for fighting. Then, as now, the heresy hunters took off the wheels of the Lord's chariots and not the enemies'. Theology was the air the boy breathed, the food he ate, the poisoned water that he drank, and at last he rose up in utter revulsion. He found that men were saved by bread, and not by fighting over the chemical formula that makes bread. One afternoon in May, in the woods, kneeling in prayer, the vision splendid dawned. The sense of the love of God burst into his soul with all the glory of the inrushing sunshine, and for the next fifty years he had one theme, man's sin and God's love. At twenty-four he took the first church that was offered—the church at Lawrenceburg—made up, he tells us, of nineteen women and one nothing—a man.

He was his own sexton, swept the church, made the fires, did everything but listen to his own sermons—that the people had to do. Then came eight years in Indianapolis, where once he preached daily for a period of eighteen months, and delivered his lectures to young men on industry, gambling, amusements, the causes of dishonesty— the best book of its kind that ever was written. He was called to the old Park Street Church in Boston when thirty-four, and refused it; he accepted a call to Brooklyn in 1847. He found this church a handful; he carried it through three great revivals and built up a church of 2,500 members. He visited England in 1863, and there met and vanquished his Goliath. He gave the Lyman Beecher Lecture series at Yale from 1871 to 1874, of which, when David Swing laid down the last volume, he said, "They may as well close the series. Everything has been said that can be said." From 1876 to 1880 he gave 300 sermons and lectures a year, probably the greatest physical and intellectual feat that has ever been accomplished. He revisited England in 1886, where he received a warm welcome. And here, in Brooklyn, he died—a long, eventful life, running through the most fiery and momentous period in our country's history.

Beecher's Views of God.

The world owes Mr. Beecher a great debt for his views of the love of God. Many of you are old enough to remember the medieval theology. It was ultra-Calvinistic. Its essence was that God made a man and a woman and put them in the garden. Then he sent a tempter in, sending him inducements sufficient to break through all the buttresses of virtue, and break down the battlements of man's character. Then when the life of the first father and mother was unclean, this spiritual taint was handed forward, to all the children, and spread like an awful plague in the blood. For 3,000 years God kept up his manufacturing of evil. He left Asia and Africa and most of Europe during all this time without a single temple or teacher, while myriads poured over into a physical hell, with red hot flames gushing forth. Then after 3,000 years he sent his Son into the scene to die for the elect only, leaving the non-elect to perish for this sin of Adam. Over against this, Mr. Beecher placed the gospel of Jesus Christ, God's love to the evil and the good, God's love to the just and the unjust, God's love to the publican and harlot, God's love that will not break the bruised reed nor quench the smoking flax. God's love that, when the mother's or father's love, like a taper, burns low in the socket, is a star of hope that burns eternal over the prisoner in his dungeon, and the prodigal amid his desolation, his husks, and swine. God's love, that is like a mother's care for her child. Why does God love bad men? Why is the rose sweet? Why is a rainbow beautiful? Why does the lover delight to serve his beloved? Why is the mother glad to give life itself for her sick babe? Why does the sun shine for weeds as well as roses? Because all these have borrowed some little hint and glow and gleam from God, who loves because it is his nature to love, who is toiling tirelessly to make bad men good, and good men better, and the best men heroes and saints, and who will at last, here or there, bring judgment unto victory.

Mr. Beecher made theology reasonable. He showed us the progressive revelation of God. He took the sting out of the theory of evolution, and showed us that evolution was God's way of doing things. He pointed out that every nation had its task, and every tribe its stint, and every individual his duty, and that all the hosts were marching upward toward an unseen goal, that there was a divine leader behind the clouds. He was a great optimist, because he believed in God. His earliest, latest, and profoundest passion was his passion for Jesus Christ. His love for the poor and weak was a love unquenchable, but it was not like unto that immeasurable love which he cherished toward Jesus Christ. He taught us the joy of death. He put flowers instead of black on the house, in the hour when the angels of God's presence hovered about a home from which a little child slipped away.

Praised Because of Goodness.

During the centennial year, multitudes will praise Mr. Beecher because of his greatness, but the people of Plymouth Church revere and love him because of his goodness. The notes that he kept before and during his great trouble, the sermons that he preached, and the prayers that he offered during this hour of darkness and pain, hold pages of such spiritual exaltation and fervor as are found nowhere else in the history of devotional literature. His people suffered far more than Mr. Beecher himself. He carried his friends and his church as some father carries a little child in his arms. What a life of prayer and of peace he lived! Morning after morning, during the public excitement, he came down from his room with all the brightness and exuberance of a little child. "God gave me the victory at the beginning of the trouble, and I have his pledge that it will all come out right." At last the sun cleared itself of clouds, and under a serene sky he laid himself down to rest. Twenty-six years have gone since he passed from the scenes of his work, his struggle, and his victory, but his name is still one that charms the people, and his influence is ever more and more, and now that long time hath passed, through his children and the children of those whom he instructed, inspired and transformed, God hath answered his prayer and made his church a place to which the multitudes come seeking bread for their hunger, light for their darkness, and life for those who stand in the region of shadow and death.

Through Henry Ward Beecher God wrought great things for the republic, and the greatness of God in him made our ascended Elijah the glory of his times.

As Others See Us

When looking at the paper to see how the question in California is progressing, imagine my surprise to run across the following, given to show the common people in Japan in just what kind of hands their fate had fallen as well as the government of the famous Washington and Lincoln. I translate from the Osaka daily paper called Osaka Maenichi.

"My First Visit to the American Congress.

"After I had been in New York awhile I went to Washington. This is the head of the government and I supposed the place to study the government, but fortunately the House was in session and I got a pass to go in the gallery where the guests sit. Well, it was a strange sight, really ludicrous. There was confusion of the members while the House was in session and while a man was making an earnest speech, the different members being busy with what seemed the individual work of each. All were actively engaged in reading letters while sitting in their seats (in the Chamber) while the work was going on, rude to the House and speaker both, it seemed to me, and these letters were not official, but apparently personal letters. Others were calling in a loud voice for the page. Those who seemed to have time off from letters, were reclining in their chairs with their feet up on the table (in the Chamber). The putting of one's feet up on the table is a thing done by Americans very often, but who would have dreamt of their doing it in this place? The worst of all was the fact that some of these were sleeping and others even snoring (in the Chamber). Some were eating apples. (The Japanese do not eat in the presence of any one except on certain occasions.—Writer.) When I thought of the government being in the hands of such people I lost hope.

"The Senate was much like the Lower House though possibly a little better.

"When I spoke to an American about the disorderly conduct of the House, he said, 'This is inevitable when you come to think that these men are from the various states, and among them are farmers and some uneducated backwoodsmen. Not long ago there was a member of the House who did not know how to turn out the gas, so blew it out and went to sleep never to awaken.' This American did not think it strange that the men should act the way they did. A country of Party Politics and not of Ideals."

Joe Jefferson on Immortality

These quaint lines were first published in The New York Tribune. Mr. E. C. Benedict has given the following interesting bit of history concerning them: One day when Mr. Jefferson and Grover Cleveland were taking luncheon on board the Oneida, in Buzzard's Bay, the conversation drifted to the subject of a future life. Mr. Jefferson expressed himself as very grateful for having had more than his share of the joys of this life, and as being prepared to meet any moment the common fate of all. He said that he had lately been scribbling some doggerel on the subject, and he recited his lines to us. I asked him for a copy of them, which he said he did not possess, but that he would send me one. This, upon being again reminded of his promise, he finally did, with his signature attached.

Two caterpillars crawling on a leaf,
For some strange accident in contact came;
Their conversation, passing all belief,
Was the same argument, the very same,
That has been "proed and conned" from man to man,
Yea, ever since this wondrous world began:
The ugly creatures,
Deaf, dumb and blind,
Devoid of features
That adorn mankind,
Were vain enough, in dull and worry strife
To speculate upon a future life.
The first was optimistic, full of hope,
The second, quite dyspeptic, seemed to mope.
Said number one, "I'm sure of our salvation."
"Our ugly forms alone would seal our fates
And bar out entrance through the golden gates;
Suppose that death should take us unawares,
How could we climb the golden stairs?
If maidens shun us as they pass us by,
Would angels bid us welcome in the sky?
I wonder what great crimes we have committed,
That leave us so forlorn and so unpitied?
Perhaps we've been ungrateful, unforgiving;
'Tis plain to me that life's not worth the living."
"Come, come, cheer up," the jovial worm replied,
"Let's take a look upon the other side;
Suppose we cannot fly like moths or millers,
Are we to blame for being caterpillars?
Will that same God that doomed us to crawl the earth,
A prey to every bird that's given birth,
Forgive our captor as he eats and sings,
And damn poor us because we have not wings?
If we can't skim the air like owl or bat,
A worm can turn 'for a' that.'"

They argued through the summer; autumn nigh,
The ugly things composed themselves to die;
And so to make their funerals quite complete,
Each wrapped him in his little winding-sheet;
The tangled web encompassed them full soon,
Each for his coffin made him a cocoon.
All through the winter's chilling blast they lay
Dead to the world, aye, dead as human clay.
Lo, spring comes forth with all her warmth and love;
She brings sweet justice from the realms above;
She breaks the chrysalis, she resurrects the dead;
Two butterflies ascend, encircling her head,
And so this emblem shall forever be
A sign of immortality.

Disciples Table Talk

A New Idea at St. Louis.

W. G. Johnston, of St. Louis, writes that the Christian Ministers' Association of Greater St. Louis recently sent out a statement to a number of preachers embodying, what it considered, "some of our needs and a way of meeting them." It suggested the organization of "The National Ministerial Association of the Churches of Christ," possibly at Toronto. It seemed to these preachers that such an association should have at least some of the following aims, namely: co-operation of ministers and churches in supplying mutual needs; co-operative book-buying; the possibility of having a library for use through the mails; some plan for making available more of our preachers for institute work, rallies, chautauquas, lectures before student bodies, etc.; a better use of the social service idea in the life of the church; meetings for the discussion of living subjects; and the establishment of a magazine in the interest of the preacher's thought and work. A number of interesting responses have been made. J. H. Garrison endorses the entire program, with the exception of the magazine idea; while J. B. Briney hardly knows what to say, sees danger of over-organization, and is "not prepared to endorse the enterprise." A. McLean says: "If such an organization could be effected and if the members would attend the meetings when the meetings were called, I think it would be a very good thing." Stephen J. Corey endorses the entire plan, and thinks it well wrought out. I. N. McCash says: "The impression it makes upon me is favorable. There must be closer co-operation either among ministers directly, or through some agency that will help them bring pastors and churches needing pastors, into closer business relations....I think fees proposed will not be in the way, and the details may be worked out to the satisfaction of all." W. R. Warren, Secretary of Ministerial Relief says: "You will know that I am in heartiest sympathy with such movement from the fact that I took the initiative at New Orleans. . . . . Of course I shall be glad to cooperate in whatever seems best." A. B. Philputt, of Indianapolis, brands the scheme as "visionary" and "impracticable."

County Evangelization in Ralls Co., Mo.

J. B. Rowlison, of Vandalia, Mo., county superintendent of missions for Ralls County, conducted an evangelistic tour of that county early in June. A number of ministers and other workers accompanied Mr. Rowlison, and H. C. Bellew, of Frankford, had charge of the music. The following schedule was carried out; with few exceptions: June 1, 11 a. m., Ocean Wave—H. M. Hale. June 1, 3:30 p. m., Salt River—J. P. Rowlison. June 1, 8:00 p. m., New London—J. P. Rowlison. June 2, 8:00 p. m., Spalding—J. H. Coil. June 3, 8:00 p. m., Rensselaer—H. M. Hale. June 4, 8:00 p. m., Huntington— J. H. Coil. June 5, 8:00 p. m., Ariel—E. B. Redd. June 6, 8:00 p. m., Center—J. H. Coil. June 7, 7:00 p. m., Hays Creek—J. H. Coil. June 8, 11:00 a. m., Union Chapel—J. P. Rowlison. June 8, 8 p. m., Liberty—J. H. Coil. June 9, 8 p. m., Prairie View—W. A. Shullenberger. June 10, 8 p. m., Perry—Geo. A. Campbell. June 11, 8 p. m., Mt. Hope—J. H. Coil. June 12, 8 p. m., Pleasant Grove—J. P. Rowlison.

A "Daily Life" Church at Nashville.

"To establish a church for week day use as well as Sunday service; a church where the religion of Jesus Christ may become a thing interwoven with the daily life of people"—that has been the vision of the congregation of the Park Avenue Church, Nashville, Tenn. Rev. J. Lem Keevil is pastor of the congregation. When the new house of worship is completed, it will be designated as the Fifth Avenue Church of Christ. The building will cost about $40,000. It will contain an auditorium of 1,000 seating capacity; a Sunday-school room with gallery and parlors above and a gymnasium, swimming pool and heating plant in the basement. A blending of Byzantine with Renaissance architecture will characterize the design both inside and outside. Entrance will be through a colonnade and front vestibule into the large auditorium, spanned by barrel vaults and masonry dome of Guastavino construction similar to that used in St. Paul's chapel, Columbia University, and the cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City. Directly back of the pulpit will be a choir gallery and pipe organ, the latter having been subscribed by the women of the church.

Regarding Dr. Ames' Harvard Visit.

Vaughn Dabney, in attendance at Harvard College, writes regarding Dr. E. S. Ames' recent addresses given at Harvard: "In many ways Dr. Ames' second visit was more fruitful than the first. Dr. Ames is gaining a larger influence among students and professors alike, and a large number of associates look with pleasure to his return next year as preacher. His two sermons were upon 'Regeneration' and 'The Cloud of Witnesses.' While here, Prof. E. C. Moore entertained Dr. Ames with a dinner in his honor. Leading members of the faculty were present. Dr. Ames addressed the Methodist ministers of Boston while here." Mr. Dabney sends the following list of Disciples now at Harvard: R. C. Foster, Ky.; W. C. McCallum, Ky.; G. D. Kirkpatrick, Okla.; G. P. Ullom, Mass.; Vaughn Dabney, Chicago; G. E. Moore, Australia; Harold Halsell, Okla.; V. O. Appel, Ill.; W. E. Alderman, Mass.; G. Stewart, Mass.; L. E. Cannon, Ill.; R. H. Goodale, Ill.;——Murdock, Des Moines; B. G. Haggard, Des Moines.

Regarding the Joint Magazine.

A member of the "Magazine Committee," writes: "The Magazine Committee of the National Secretaries Association met at Indianapolis, on May 29th, and decided upon the details of the plan to publish a joint missionary magazine which is to take the place of all the magazines now published by our Missionary Societies. The plan is as follows: 1. The name of the magazine is to be "Christian Tidings." 2. The place of publication is to be Indianapolis, Ind. 3. An editor will be employed to give his time exclusively to the editing of the magazine, with necessary clerical assistance to look after the business management and circulation. 4. The first issue of the magazine is to be the October, 1913, number, and it is hoped to have the magazine from the press in time for the Toronto Convention. The above plan has been adopted by every society with the single exception of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Their failure to enter into the plan will defeat it. The sentiment in favor of a joint missionary journal is universal. The National Secretaries Association has canvassed the matter from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, and without a single dissenting voice the idea has been well received. Secretary Muckley presented the matter at the West Virginia convention and his report was greeted with a storm of applause. Secretary E. E. Elliott has presented the matter to ministerial meetings in more than twenty principal cities and the approval of the Ministerial Organizations to the joint magazine plan has been unanimous. It is to be hoped that our Christian Woman's Board of Missions will give early sanction in order that the joint magazine may be brought out in time for the Toronto Convention. It is up to the women. May they act wisely and quickly."

Unity in the San Angelo, Tex., Convention.

Frederick D. Kershner speaks with enthusiasm over the spirit of unity and harmony which prevailed at the state convention, at San Angelo. He says: "The San Angelo Convention was characterized by unity, harmony and enthusiasm. It proclaims a new and growing sense of brotherhood on the part of our churches. One of the most noteworthy features was the splendid service rendered by the community generally. The inspiration of a great convention is something which can be felt but not described. More and more our people will learn that they can not afford to miss these fountain sources of enthusiasm. Every church in Texas ought to begin planning now for a great convention at Gainesville. Without co-operation our work must fail. It is the supremest irony to preach Christian union and fail to practice it among ourselves."

Representatives of the Official Boards of the various Disciple churches of Des Moines and vicinity, held a joint meeting at the Central recently. Finis Idleman was Master of Ceremonies. Park Avenue, Highland Park, Capitol Hill, Grant Park, Valley Junction, Chesterfield, Rising Sun, Mondamin, Ninth and Shaw, Clifton Heights, University Place and Central churches were represented, and some member from each of these churches gave a word of greeting and exhibited an earnest desire for the forming of a Disciples Union in Des Moines. Prof. Martin told of the Disciples Missionary Union in New York City and what they were doing.

At the convention of Sixth Illinois District, which will be held at Tuscola, June 17-18, the following are among the speakers: Miss Lura V. Thompson, Carthage; Mrs. Aden G. Pippiett, Champaign; Mrs. Lula M. Burner, South America; Mrs. V. T. Lindsay, Springfield; W. R. Warren, Indianapolis; C. L. DePew, Jacksonville; Walter Rounds, Arcola; H. H. Peters, Paris; Gilbert Jones, Lovington; E. M. Smith, Decatur; J. Fred Jones, Bloomington, and S. E. Fisher, Champaign. J. F. Rosborough, of Clinton, is president in this district.

William Jennings Bryan, secretary of state, has received a letter from the official board of the Central Christian church, Jacksonville, Ill., commending the stand he has taken as the leading cabinet official of the United States against liquor. The letter is signed by each of the twenty-four elders and eight deacons of the church. The action of Mr. Bryan, which has received the endorsement of church, Sunday-school and temperance organizations all over the country, is of special gratification in Jacksonville because of the secretary's former connection with this city in school and church.

At a recent meeting of the state board of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions of Kansas, held at Topeka, a unanimous call was extended to Mrs. H. M. Snyder of Larned to take charge of a new department of the work, the junior department, and also to serve as assistant state secretary, representing the entire state of Kansas. Miss Alma Moore of Oklahoma, will be the state secretary, taking the place of Mrs. J. E. McDaniel, who recently resigned to take up national work.

W. P. Keeler, Englewood, Ill., writes that in all the annals of the Englewood church few deaths have so stirred the heart of the membership as that of Philip Keeler Spurgin, May 21. Mr. Spurgin is the third son of Robert and Ella Spurgin, having been born Oct. 21, 1890. From early boyhood he has been an active worker in the Englewood church and Sunday-school. Tuberculosis was the cause of his death.

S. G. Buckner delivered the baccalaureate sermon for Somerset, Pa., High School June 1, taking as his theme "Self-Finding." Mr. Buckner goes to Portland and Los Angeles in July to attend the World's Citizenship Conference and the International Christian Endeavor Convention. The Somerset Church will entertain the Western Pennsylvania Christian Missionary Convention in September.

George Darsie, of Terre Haute, Central, addressed the men at Frankfort, Ind., May 20. It was the occasion of the annual banquet of the Men's Class, which J. C. Burkhart, minister, teaches. One hundred and twenty-five men sat down at the tables. Visitors were present from surrounding towns. The banquet was held in the tabernacle which was built for the Scoville meetings last November.

Charles B. Newnan, retired pastor of Central Church, Detroit, died May 30, after six years of ill health. Mr. Newnan resigned his pastorate when his health began to fail and went to California, but the trip did not bring permanent improvement. He is survived by his widow and two children, H. L. Newnan of Detroit, and Mrs. L. M. Railsbach, of Saginaw.

R. B. Helser, pastor at Trenton, Mo., has returned home from Excelsior Springs where he made an extended stay for the benefit of his health. Although feeling considerably better it will be necessary for him to refrain from the ordinary heavy work of the pastorate for some time. He returned to his work against the advice of his physician.

At the homecoming service held at University Church, Des Moines, May 25, about fifty charter members were present. The church was organized in 1888. Probably the largest communion service ever observed in Des Moines was held in the afternoon when an assembly that filled the entire space of the tabernacle partook of the communion.

The annual meeting of the Iowa City, Iowa, group of churches will be held at Nicholas, Iowa, June 13. The program includes, among others: S. J. Epler, Liberty; W. J. Wright, Kalona; C. A. Vannoy, Iowa City; Prof. J. F. Reilly, Iowa City; L. Dunlap, Kalona; and Prof. W. S. Athearn, Drake University.

Pres. Miner Lee Bates, of Hiram, was the principal speaker at the first anniversary of the dedication of the First Church, East Liverpool, Ohio, May 25. He took as his theme "Abounding." A total of $1,402 was raised to apply on the building fund. E. P Wise ministers to this church.

The Cadillac, Mich., church is endeavoring to raise $2,500 for the extension of their church property. It has become necessary to put a foundation under the present church, and to build additional class rooms for the accommodation of the rapidly increasing Sunday-school.

The church at Adrian, Mich., has organized what is known as "The Workingmen's Brotherhood of the Church of Christ." Its motto is "Ich dien" which translated means "I serve," and the society's slogan is "Solving the man's problem." About thirty members are reported.

George C. Meeker of the church at Chico, Cal., has been elected president of the Sacramento Valley Christian Ministers' Association. Ellis Purlee of Red Bluff is the new secretary. The association will hereafter hold a meeting every month in one of the cities in the district.

The Phillips Bible Institute, Canton, O., sends its first annual report of enrollment, as follows: Resident (22 states and countries) 82; night (7 religious bodies) 257; correspondent (41 states and countries) 304. Total enrollment 633. M. L. Pierce is Dean of the Institute.

H. O. Pritchard, of Bethany, Neb., and R. McQuary, of Tecumseh, recently held a meeting for the church at Wymore, Neb., as a free will offering to the cause of state missions. E. R. Child, pastor at Wymore, writes in hearty appreciation of this good service.

Dr. E. I. Osgood has been attending a meeting of the Pekin Medical Conference and writes about the wonderful union spirit that is taking possession of the missionaries in China. He states that not less than nine union medical schools have been started.

First Church, Huntington, Ind., observed the fourteenth anniversary of its founding May 19. The principal speaker was W. J. Young, of Piqua, O., who was the first resident pastor of the Huntington Church. His theme was "The Men of the Church."

In the recent Sunday-school contest between the Hammond, Ind., and Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, schools, a sunrise parade, special trolley cars and a Boy Scout guard were features of the closing day, June 1. The former school claims the victory.

H. P. Shaw and wife, of Turlock, Cal., were reappointed missionaries to Shanghai, China, at the last meeting of the executive committee. They will sail about September 1. The physicians now pronounce Mrs. Shaw in good health.

Barclay Meador, pastor at Lebanon, Mo., is visiting during the month of June, a number of the churches and school houses of the county with stereopticon views showing the principal scenes in the life of David Livingstone.

The church at Atchison, Kan., with an attendance of nearly 500 in the Bible school, went on record as vigorously opposing the opening of the pool halls on Sunday in Atchison. The protest was taken to the mayor at once.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first twenty-five days of May, amounted to $19,141, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $7,449. There was also a gain in the number of contributing churches.

George A. Campbell, pastor at Hannibal, Mo., recently entertained the Ministers' Alliance of Hannibal at luncheon. "The Lighter Side of the Ministry" was discussed by the company.

C. M. Chilton delivered the baccalaureate sermon for the St. Joseph Central High School. Mr. Chilton also gave the commencement day address at Drake University, June 11.

A. F. Hensey reports forty-three baptized at Bolenge, Africa, and thirty at Bobangi, an outstation on the Ubangi. H. C. Hobgood reports 110 baptisms at Lotumbe, Africa.

The Christian Endeavor Society of the church at Galesburg, Ill., recently gave a shower for Will Frymire, a Galesburg boy, who goes this summer as a missionary to Africa.

Frank Garrett speaks of seven baptisms at what is known as the Drum Tower, Nankin, China, and twenty more at the South Gate, same city. They are about four miles apart.

W. H. Hanna reports thirteen baptisms near Vigan, P. I. The college at Vigan will begin with ten Bible students and, all told, there will be about thirty in the dormitories.

Bert Wilson, formerly secretary of the men and religion forces in Lincoln, Neb., will soon begin work in connection with the Foreign Christian Missionary Society.

R. W. Gentry, Winfield, Kans., preached the baccalaureate sermon for the high school in that city. Mr. Gentry took for his theme, "Am I My Brother's Keeper?"

The Foreign Society has sold about 10,000 volumes of missionary books since October 1, 1912. This is far in advance of the record for the corresponding time last year.

Secretary Stephen J. Corey will represent the Foreign Society on the Central Committee that is planning for a nation-wide missionary campaign.

The church at Terre Haute, Ind., enters the Living-link column in the Foreign Society. George Darsie is the splendid missionary pastor.

Dr. C. L. Pickett is cheered over the dedication of his new hospital at Laoag, P. I., March 28. There have been a number of conversions.

J. L. Thompson, Greeley, Colo., delivered the commencement sermon in the State Teacher's College located at Greeley, May 25.

G. A. Hess, pastor of Central Church, Clinton, Ia., will attend the second world's Christian citizenship conference at Portland, Ore.

Secretary Stephen J. Corey will speak before the International Christian Endeavor Convention at Los Angeles, Cal., July 13.

H. O. Breeden, pastor at Fresno, Cal., reports that a new building for the work there will probably be begun in September.

Frank V. Irish, formerly of Hyde Park, Chicago, is promoting a new church on Indianola Avenue, Columbus, Ohio.

A contract has been let for a new $30,000 building at Lafayette, Ind. (First), where Geo. W. Watson ministers.

The pipe organ at Bowling Green, Ky., was installed May 30, with an elaborate recital program.

E. F. Daugherty will deliver the Alumni address at Franklin College, Franklin, Ind.

W. H. Bagly preached the baccalaureate sermon for the high school at Taylor, Tex.

The Iowa Christian Endeavor Convention will be held at Cedar Rapids, June 24-27.

The new $15,000 building at Vernon, Tex., was dedicated May 25 by I. N. McCash.

Budget Sub-Committee Reports

The Budget Sub-Committee, appointed at the last regular meeting of the full committee, consisting of R. G. Frank, chairman, President Hill M. Bell and Walter M. White, met in Chicago, May 26th and 27th, all three members being present. Mrs. Atwater and Mrs. Longdon representing the C. W. B. M., and R. M. Hopkins, representing the National Bible School Association, met with the Committee in conference, presenting some matters of importance pertaining to the work of their respective interests. A communication from I. J. Cahill, Secretary of the State Secretaries Association, was read.

Following this conference the Committee carefully canvassed the work of the former meeting of the full Committee in the light of information received since the publication of the tentative report of the Budget Committee.

After a thorough consideration of the percentage basis plan, and the national budget plan, a comprehensive draft of the latter being presented to the Sub-Committee by the Chairman, R. G. Frank, it was unanimously decided to recommend the national budget plan, for the consideration of the full Committee, as being the most reasonable and simple means of relieving the present unsatisfactory method of collecting and distributing our missionary and benevolent offerings.

At this time it is the purpose of the Chairman to call a meeting of the full Committee in Chicago the latter part of June.

Walter M. White, Sec. Sub-Committee.

Toronto Convention

Representatives of Churches

In connection with our last national convention held in Louisville, a mass meeting of all those attending the convention was convened at which a constitution was adopted providing that the future national conventions should be composed of representatives of the churches properly chosen and authorized by the churches themselves. This mass meeting further adopted a resolution which provided for the appointment of a committee of fifteen brethren and sisters to arrange for the first convention to be held under this new arrangement. In the discharge of its duties this committee appointed the three persons whose names are signed below as a committee on credentials for the convention of 1913, to be held in Toronto, Canada, from September 30 to October 6.

Article 111 of the constitution adopted at Louisville provides for the membership of the convention and reads as follows: "The convention shall be composed of members of Churches of Christ as follows: Representatives appointed by Churches of Christ on the following basis: Each church may appoint one representative, and one additional representative for each one hundred members, provided that no church shall have more than five representatives."

It is therefore the privilege of each church to designate a certain person or persons as provided by the constitution to attend the Toronto Convention and to act as its representative or representatives. This committee will later provide the churches with blanks by means of which the fact of the appointment of each person may be certified by the officers of the church. The representatives of the church should bring this form when properly filled out with him to Toronto, and upon its being deposited with the person authorized to act for this committee and upon the payment of a convention fee of fifty cents he will receive an official badge and program. The badge will entitle him to a reserved seat in a section of the convention hall set aside exclusively for representatives of the churches. All matters coming before the convention will be decided by the votes of these representatives.

Other persons who may desire to attend the Toronto convention are hereby informed that a non-official badge will be provided for them and that this and the program may be secured by paying the convention fee of fifty cents. Such persons may sit in any part of the convention hall except in those sections reserved for representatives and may enjoy all the privileges of the convention except those which by the constitution are reserved exclusively for the representatives of the churches.

It is the intention of this committee to provide these blanks and so distribute them that they will be available for every church, but in case any church fails to receive them a note or card addressed to any member of this committee will secure them. In case this cannot be done, a note certifying that the person named is a representative of the church will be accepted by the committee.

Monarch Light Touch

THE extremely light action of the Monarch Typewriter endears it to all operators who use it. The typist who takes pride in her position finds great satisfaction in being able to turn out as much work, and as good work, per hour, toward the end of the working day as during the morning. Other conditions being the same, she can always do this on a Monarch. There is for users of this machine. The mechanical reason for the Monarch light touch is found in the action of the Monarch type bar, an exclusive and patented feature which gives this remarkably light touch.

We would remind the business man that Monarch light touch means more work and better work, because less physical strength is expended by the operator. Therefore, cost per folio is reduced making the Monarch a business economy.

World's Citizenship Conference, Portland, Oregon, June 29-July 6

More than 100 of the world's greatest orators will take part in the conference which will attract more than 20,000 persons to Portland. The affair is everywhere regarded as the most important religious and social movement of modern times.

Representative men from all Christian countries have been invited and will be welcomed to this international symposium on Christian citizenship, peace and war, emigration and immigration, education and religion, the family and divorce, prison reform and civil service, social conscience and personal character, the obligations and observance of one holy day in seven, the physical and spiritual evils of intemperance and how to meet them, social evils and their preventatives and remedies, the claims upon society of its delinquents and dependents, the ethical values of Christianity and the Christian presuppositions of a sound ethic—these and many other vital themes will be considered, not with a view to the trying out of certain theories simply, but to the end that a better understanding may be reached, a mutual advantage from past experiences derived, and a broader and higher platform of Christian citizenship everywhere permanently achieved.

Among speakers and their subjects will be the following:

The Moral Implications of the Right of Suffrage—President Woodrow Wilson, Trenton, N. J., U. S. A.

Socialism—Raymond Robins, Chicago, Ill., U. S. A.

Christian Forces in Levant—Dr. Armenag Haigazion, Konia, Asia Minor, Turkey.

The Necessity of An Awakened Public Conscience—Judge A. Z. Blair, Portsmouth, Ohio, U. S. A.

Religious Instruction in State Educational Institutions—Dr. James S. Martin, general superintendent National Reform Association, Pittsburgh, Pa., U. S. A.

Municipal Reform—Rev. Dr. Mark A. Matthews, Seattle, Wash., U. S. A.

Prison Reform—Hon. Oswald West, Salem, Ore., governor of Oregon.

The Obligations of the West to the East—Dr. Isaac Taylor Headland, Pekin, China.

Religious Fundamentals in the Common Law—Dr. Richard Cameron Wylie, Pittsburgh, Pa., U. S. A.

The General Scope and Purpose of the Portland Conference—Dr. Henry Collin Minton, president National Reform association, Trenton, N. J., U. S. A.

The Moral Accountability of Nations—Dr. J. A. Macdonald, editor Toronto Globe, Dominion of Canada.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointed by churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

The Best Advertising

Satisfied customers are the best advertising. An influential man writes us: "Send me full line of samples of your Bethany Graded Series. We are dissatisfied with the materials we are using, and want to examine yours. Have never heard anything but good said of the Bethany Series." In this case some of our customers were doing efficient advertising work for us. We take pleasure in such advertising. How Goes the Battle?

By Henry Ward Beecher

Alas! man striving to be religious has on every side presented, I think, the most piteous spectacle of time. Methinks if God weeps ever, it is when he beholds the poor staggering steps and faint endeavors which have been made, and are still being made, by men to emancipate themselves from the animal, and to come up by their own evolution and patience and power into the state of the angel. To cease being physical and to become spiritual, as a drama—often as a comedy, but more often as a tragedy—has been going on for thousands of years. We have seen how, directly or indirectly, men have been forced to their religion by fear; how, when they had once come under the yoke and bondage of the priest and the government, they were maintained in their religion by the sword; and what wastes, what cruelties, there have been, no man can tell—not until the pictorial judgment comes, and we stand looking down through the past of history to see the line of mourners, of martyrs, of murdered ones, of mothers and children, of the long crowd that have suffered because the devil of force entered into the church and dominated religion. Not till then shall we ever have any conception of what the world has gone through in this respect.

I know there are many who mourn, just now, over the reactions of religion, and the tendencies of science. I am not one of them. I see nothing to regret. There is, no doubt, a reaction of religion as represented by organizations and forms and ceremonies; there is very likely a falling off in religion so far as its ecclesiastical machinery is concerned; but I would as soon cry because the leaves drop off from the white oak in spring as to cry for that. There are, however, those who know religion only in its arbitrary and external delineations; and I do not wonder that they mourn. If I were a workingman, to-day, in Germany or in France; if I were a workingman in Italy or Spain, where the Papal rule has been predominant; if I had only the intelligence which God has given me, only the natural instincts of manhood, and only the yearnings of an uncultured human heart, and I dwelt a poor man in those countries, I should be an infidel. My heart would revolt at what is imposed on men there as religion. If you interpret the New Testament so that it shall lead to the treading down of the poor; so that it shall sanction tyranny; so that it shall recognize no religion except that which the priest gives; so that individualism is discouraged; so that personal liberty is denied; so that all aspirations and generous sentiments in the human soul are crushed out; so that every inspiration of truth and justice and purity is trampled upon—if you interpret the New Testament thus, I do not wonder that men reject it. I honor men who tread under foot that which claims to be religion when it is nothing but the offspring of the devil in the guise of an angel of light. But if you call the spirit of those men who are seeking for a knowledge of the moral government of God over this world; of those men who rejoicingly find that there is a revelation of God in the physical globe besides that of the letter, which is worth reading; of those who believe that there is a disclosure of the divine method and will in the unfolding of human society, which it is well to understand—not casting away the history of the ancients so far as it is good; of those who believe that there is a revelation going on all the time, everywhere, and that it behooves each large and generous man who feels the need of manhood and immortality to have an eye and an ear open to every source of information—if you call that spirit a spirit of infidelity, then I am an infidel, and I would to God that you were too! Nay, I take it that, while there have been transitional periods, that while there have been incidental and temporary reactions from various causes, and while there has been much to be deprecated and combated, yet there has been a steady advance upward. The general tone of conscience among scientific men is in the right direction. They are committing themselves to the ground that truth is to be received when the evidences are present, no matter where it leads a man. I am willing to accept the issue on that ground. I am willing to rest my faith in Christianity upon it. For I declare that you shall find no delineation of man's character, no exposition of man's relations, nothing which shows how the human soul may grow up from an animal into a man in Christ Jesus, no presentation of the reasons why one may hope to live beyond the dark horizon of death, no representation of the way in which we may supplement our conscious weakness by the power of the Everlasting, like the Gospel. I put the cross of Christ, when it is stripped of its fabulous meanings, when it is divested of its crooked philosophy, when it is merely a symbol manifesting to the world the precious truth that God does not govern to destroy, but would rather suffer than make suffering—I put the cross of Christ, under such circumstances, against anything and everything else. Give me Christ, give me Calvary, give me the Gospel, and I am not afraid to face the world, and say, "Try it with your alembic, try it with your mathematics, try it with your spy-glass, try it with your microscope, try it as you please, and in the end you will find that it is the wisdom of God and the power of God unto salvation."

Unprofitable Words

The words of a teacher who is ignorant of the subject to be taught are unprofitable. It is the business of the teacher to know the truth before he attempts to teach it. A curse of the present time is the superficiality of many who put themselves forward as wise men. A man gathers a few facts whose meaning he has hardly begun to see and he proceeds at once to set the world right with respect to philosophy and religion. Many business men whose prosperity is due to circumstances and not to their efforts and whose knowledge of literature and art and science is exceedingly small and whose moral judgments are crude and immature have the utmost confidence in their ability to state what is wrong with the schools and the churches.

Our words are unprofitable when we are ignorant of the needs of the persons to whom they are addressed. It is foolish to attempt to teach certain parts of the Bible to children. The child is not prepared to understand the psalmist's confession of sin. Paul did not write the Epistle to the Romans to children. We may hinder the growth of religious ideas and sentiments by making children familiar with words descriptive of experiences which they cannot understand. It is not logic but the needs of the pupil that determines what should be taught. Systematic study of the Bible is desirable but all our systems should be made with the definite aim of fitting the teachings of the Bible to the intelligence and the hearts of all to whom instruction is given.

Carelessness in the use of words is condemned by Jesus. By means of words we communicate thought and emotion. The good workman asks for good tools. We all use words as instruments of social intercourse to propagate what we hold to be the truth in religion and morals. We ought to have for use words whose meaning will not be misunderstood. Here also, there is a demand that we know the persons to whom we speak. The dictionary is a useful book to have at hand but it can never give us all the information we need about words. Every idea has more than one aspect and the words used to express ideas express those aspects that are familiar to the persons using the words. The opportunities for misunderstandings are numerous. It is necessary therefore that we constantly study words as they are being used by our neighbors. Any one who wishes may every day set down instances of misunderstanding coming from varying emphasis.

There is a vast amount of selfishness displayed in the use of words. A word means a certain thing to us and therefore we insist that it shall mean nothing else to any other human being, although men and women of culture use it to express much more than we mean by it. We impoverish the language for ourselves by our dogmatism. The ridicule we direct against men whose words are hard for us to understand is often a substitute for an honest confession of our ignorance. The sciences have their technical terms. If men employ these terms freely in common speech we have a right to object, but when they address students of philosophy, art, or science, they should not be ridiculed for using terms not familiar to the common mind. The defense of our opinions that consist in flippant remarks about what we do not understand discredits us and our views. We bring reproach upon the faith we hold when we defend it in this fashion.

Unkind words are unprofitable. These are not all spoken in the heat of anger. The most cruel words are spoken in cold blood. Our most deliberate thrusts we may wish to appear to others as not intended to hurt. We impart a bit of information with the air of one who has no suspicion that it will alienate friends and destroy the peace of churches and communities, although we have carefully planned to stab a rival and to hinder the progress of a public enterprise. The unkind word points out the weakness of another, not that help may be given thereby but that the speaker may gain an advantage. So common is the practice of spreading bad news with malicious intent that when one talks of the failure of a friend for the purpose of giving help in the most tactful and gracious way he is liable to be called a mischief-maker, a meddler deserving of sharp rebuke. Unkind words may be formally true. We may state exactly what was done or left undone. But our lack of sympathy for the person criticized may make what we say a lie of the meanest sort. We cannot tell the truth about those we hate. [Midweek Service, June 25. James 3:1-10; Matt. 12:36; 5:37.] S. J.

The World in Chicago—Some Results

The World in Chicago, which closed a few days ago, was not only one of the most extensive and largely attended expositions ever given in Chicago but was the greatest enterprise in which Chicago churches have ever united. The management has successfully conducted an exposition of unusual magnitude at the Coliseum for five weeks and has presented in the Auditorium each afternoon and evening, 61 times in all, a magnificent spectacular pageant of a most impressive character. The responsibility for the life of the exposition and for the successful presentations of the pageant have rested largely upon the shoulders of approximately 20,000 volunteer workers from the churches of Chicago.

It is stated that the attendance, including the workers, aggregated at the exposition and pageant somewhere between 400,000 and 500,000 people. The accurate figures cannot be ascertained at the present time. The World in Chicago did not have for its object a financial or commercial purpose, being strictly educational and religious. The effort which has been made was intended to give information with reference to the extension of Christian civilization throughout the world, the great missionary enterprise which is carried on by the missionary boards and societies, and this has been done in a most novel and interesting way. The management believes that the attitude towards missionary work, both at home and abroad, of thousands of people, who do not regularly go to church, has been changed from one of hostility or indifference to interest and encouragement. In every Chicago church from which workers were enlisted, there now exists a group of men and women thoroughly informed with reference to the importance of the work of missions, whose interest and enthusiasm can be diverted into some form of church activity.

The financial results of the exposition, which in the mind of the management have not been of first importance, will not be known for a few weeks, as some time will be required in closing up the accounts and turning considerable in the way of assets into cash. The total expense approximates $200,000. The enterprise was financed by 300 Chicago men who subscribed to a guarantee fund of $100,000.

George W. Dixon, president of The World in Chicago, made the following official statement on the last night, of the results of the exposition and pageant:

"This great missionary exposition and pageant has been open for five weeks—the first time, as we believe, that the Coliseum and the Auditorium Theater have been linked together in one enterprise. We understand, also, that it is the first time that the Auditorium has been occupied by the same performance for twelve performances each week, for more than five weeks in all.

"The directors are more than gratified by many of the results which have been achieved.

"There has been a spirit of unity among all the churches which it is impossible to exaggerate. As many as 550 churches have taken active part belonging to 22 denominations. These have all forgotten for the time being their denominational differences, and many have discovered how small and unimportant they are. All have found it possible to co-operate with the utmost enthusiasm in a common missionary enterprise.

"About 20,000 members of these churches, including the children, have been serving either as stewards in the exposition or participants in the pageant. Their loyalty, devotion and ability have not been exceeded in any city. An immense educational campaign has been accomplished among these people, of which the churches will feel the beneficial results for many years to come.

"The general public has attended the exposition and pageant in increasing numbers as the weeks have passed. The attendance at the pageant has exceeded that in any city in which it has been given, and multitudes who have never been brought into immediate touch with home and foreign missions have been led to understand and to appreciate some of their methods and results. A very gratifying feature has been the attendance of visitors, not merely from the city and state, but from all the surrounding districts.

"The directors are now planning a campaign during the coming twelve months, to conserve in the local churches the spiritual results of the exposition. These are likely to be shown in a number of different ways.

"Already it is clear that quite a few of the workers in the exposition and pageant will offer their services in the home and foreign missionary field. A widespread sympathy with, and support for home and foreign missions has been created, and it is believed that the financial support of the churches to the various denominational mission boards will be greatly increased as the result of the exposition."

The Two Processions

We always think of it in June. We look at the procession which that month brings, and then we remember the other. It is no long time between. May counts the rosary of her days and when she has dropped twenty-nine she takes the thirtieth gently in her flower-scented fingers, and smiles gravely, and drops a tear which April had left to her, and she gathers her arms full of flowers—snowball, lilac, bridal wreath and all the rest, and carries them behind a drum and fife, and stands with bowed head and wet lashes as a company of old men limp by—and then we know why May has been growing her flowers and keeping them until that day.

Just one day between—May thirty-first—and the other procession starts. The intervening day is to give the flowers a little opportunity to rest. For all that are left from Memorial Day will be needed in June.

Now the other procession forms. The music is not what we heard before. That was a fife and drum, with a thin chorus of cracked voices singing,

"We'll rally round the flag, boys,
We'll rally once again."

This is gayer and more boisterous music. Here comes a group of lusty young fellows singing,

"When we first came on this campus Freshmen we as green as grass"— and how now they exult in their great age and venerable wisdom; and they fall in line. Then come the girls, their white dresses partly hidden by their academic gowns; and they fall in line, singing songs less boisterous, more melodious, and whose burden is that they never, never, never will forget the happy hours they have spent with their loved alma mater.

Before this procession fairly breaks up, it begins to re-form, and it enters the church and down the aisle to the music of the organ and of stringed instruments hidden among the palms. The merry conversation is hushed. There is a painfully solemn endeavor to slow down to the absurdly slow tempo. The music is from Lohengrin, and what the words in the original are or were nobody seems to know, but everybody thinks they must have been, "Here comes the bride."

Yes, here comes the bride, and with her the scent of orange blossoms, and the gentle anticipatory strains of Lohengrin changing to the crashing harmony of Mendelssohn. And here comes the college graduate—John Smith, B. A., and Jennie June. Smith, B. A., or as the college diploma puts it—if in the accusative case—Johonum, or Johonam Junam Smith, B. A.

Here they come! Way for the procession! Way for the college graduate! Way for the bride! Here they come!

It is as it should be. The procession of old men had its march some fifty years ago. Four long years they trudged to music gay and sad. They ask but one day in a year now, and this year they have had it. Break ranks, Grand Army of the Republic! Beat the long roll for the June procession! Attention, college graduates! Ushers and bridesmaids, fall in line! The procession is about to form! The organist is ready! The aisles have been cleared! The ribbons have been stretched. Be sure you stand with the left foot on the heavy accent—no, not that way—like this! Do you see? Mark time till you get it—LEFT, two, three, four. Right, two, three four. HERE comes the BRIDE!

The Hale Statue Dedicated

A heroic bronze statue of the late Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale, erected near the Charles-street mall of the public garden, was unveiled recently in Boston. William Howard Taft, former Gov. John D. Long, Rev. James DeNormandie and Mayor Fitzgerald made addresses.

The former president told of his intimate association with Dr. Hale while the latter was chaplain of the United States Senate and of the inspiration which he gained through contact with the cheerful, helpful and hopeful spirit of the divine. This program completed, Edward Everett Hale, 3d, of New York, unveiled the work of the Bela Pratt. Mayor Fitzgerald accepted the statue on behalf of the city.

Thousands of citizens, high dignitaries, workmen from the streets and wage-earners who had known and revered this preacher, participated in the exercises about the statue. The surrounding space and the nearby sidewalks were packed with men, women and children eager to catch a glimpse of those taking part. There was considerable delay in spite of the efforts of a large squad of patrolmen, in admitting Mrs. Hale's carriage through the gates for which she had a special permit. When this was finally accomplished, the clergyman's widow found herself within a few feet of the statue and she listened intently to the stirring addresses.

As the little boy cut the cord which held the stars and stripes in place there was a mighty cheer from the multitude. The crowd was a long time dispersing because of the general desire to grasp the hand of the former president and his entire willingness to speak with old and young, distinguished guests or the humblest toiler in the throng.

Almost any place in Boston would be appropriate for a monument to Edward Everett Hale, but a more fit place than the Public Garden would have been the Common. It should have been erected under one of the great trees where he used to preach in the open air—his shaggy gray hair and furrowed face looking as if he had grown there and belonged to the tree.

We remember just how he looked and how he spoke.

One Sunday afternoon we conducted to his service a very conservative friend. "I want to hear him," he said, "but would far rather hear him on a literary or historical subject; for I am sure he cannot preach the gospel."

That afternoon Dr. Hale pleaded with tempted men to seek the grace of God that they might be the men God made them to be. He told them that they need not be slaves of their passions or victims of their temptations; but might rise to the glory of conquerors. He said that the glass of liquor need not be a man's master; that he could be its master; that God would give the tempted man strength to hurl the glass to the ground; to grind it under his foot; and, standing victorious amid its shattered bits defy it, saying, "Damn you, stay there!"

As he arose to this dramatic climax, stamping his foot and shaking his fist at the thing he had trampled on, he sent a thrill through his hearers. Our very conservative friend heard this imprecatory psalm in which Dr. Hale pronounced the word "condemn" in one syllable, and joyfully whispered, "He's orthodox!"

We should like to see Dr. Hale's monument erected in that spot.

Death of Professor Briggs

It seems very long since the trial of Prof. Charles A. Briggs for affirming that "there are three fountains of authority, the Bible, the Church and the Reason." Many things have happened since 1892. Dr. Briggs died Sunday, June 8. His trial resulted in the sundering of the ties that formally bound Union Theological Seminary to the Presbyterian General Assembly. It also resulted in his withdrawal from the Presbyterian ministry and his ordination to the Episcopal ministry. He brought small comfort to the Episcopalians, however, for he was a keen and constant opponent of their claim of apostolic succession.

Dr. Briggs had been ill since the last week in May. Pneumonia developed, which further weakened his constitution, making the end inevitable. He was the oldest professor of the Union Theological Seminary.

Dr. Briggs was born in New York on Jan. 15, 1841. He studied at the University of Virginia from 1857 to 1860, and the Union Theological Seminary from 1861 to 1863. He graduated from the University of Berlin in 1869.

He had received degrees of doctor of divinity from Edinburgh, Princeton, Glasgow, and Williams, and the degree of doctor of literature from Oxford University.

Dr. Briggs became pastor of the Presbyterian church at Roselle in 1869, remaining in the pulpit there until 1874, when he resigned to become professor of Hebrew and cognate languages in the Union Theological Seminary.

In 1891 he was appointed to the chair of Biblical Theology, and in 1904 he became professor of Theological Encyclopedia and Symbolics.

Dr. Briggs was editor of the Presbyterian Review for ten years, beginning 1880. It was in 1892 that he was tried by the presbytery on a charge of heresy and acquitted. The charges were based upon an address which he made in 1891.

It was asserted he taught that the church and reason were each the fountain of divine authority, which, apart from the scriptures, may and does savingly enlighten men; that "errors may have existed in the original text of the Holy Scriptures," and that "many of the Old Testament predictions had been reversed by history."

Other of his alleged heretical teachings were that "Moses was not the author of the pentateuch," that "Isaiah was not the author of half the book which bears his name," that the "processes of redemption extend to the world to come," and "that sanctification is not complete at death."

He was accused also of considering it to be a fault of Protestant theology that it limited redemption to this world.

The decision of the presbytery acquitting Dr. Briggs was appealed to the General Assembly and that body suspended him. The seminary refused, however, to remove him despite the action of the General Assembly.

The Christian World

A Phenomenal Village Church

Whiting, Ia,, is a village of less than 700 inhabitants, and yet on April 20th, a $35,000 institutional church and public library, the latter with a $25,000 endowment, was dedicated free of debt. A writer in The Advance (Congregationalist,) Chicago, gives the following account of it in part:

Whiting has less than 700 inhabitants. It is located in the heart of the rich Missouri Valley. Its people have the progressive spirit. Nothing is too good for them. They compel their little town to give them the advantages of a city. They attempt big things.

There was no public library, nothing in the nature of a Y. M. C. A. to appeal to the young life of a community. A bowling alley run by an ex-saloon keeper, a pernicious pool hall, a doubtful livery barn—these constituted the rendezvous for the boys. Such was the situation three years ago. This church set itself to the task of ministering to the needs of the young people by providing wholesome recreation and amusement for the culture of body and mind, as well as spirit. Why should there not be a church where the children and young folks could play as well as pray? The vision was followed by action. Today the institution stands on a corner of the main street of the little village, and from the standpoint of architectural beauty and utility, is a model. Its general exterior design is Romanesque, the interior being an adaptation of the Romanesque in the early Norman Gothic of the Twelfth Century with ceiling and hammer beam trusses of the auditorium of the same treatment. In the basement are the primary rooms, a recreation room 21x25 feet, two bowling alleys, a gymnasium 29x48 feet with 13 foot ceiling, shower baths and dressing rooms. On the main floor and north front is the library room, 27x42 feet, thoroughly modern in equipment and finish, and entirely disconnected with the other rooms of the building. The library is strictly public and undenominational, being controlled by an independent board of directors. Five prominent citizens of the town provided the endowment fund. The auditorium is one of the finest to be seen anywhere, having a seating capacity, including gallery, of approximately 400. On the third floor are kitchen, dining, and lecture rooms. The various rooms afford excellent facilities for class work in the Sunday-school. The building has steam heat and electric lighting throughout.

A Japanese Failure in Christian Union

Doctor Charles W. Eliot, president-emeritus of fair Harvard, in his Unitarian Festival address in Boston the other day, gave vent to his observation of an attempt in Japan to unite Christians on the basis of a creed. The Christian Register (Unitarian, Boston), of May 29, reports him as saying:

I saw a similar condition of things in Japan. There a body of Japanese Christians endeavor to organize a Japanese Christian church. They adopted a creed, the creed which is generally regarded as most comprehensive,—the Apostles' Creed. But they called in some missionaries to advise them about this action, and the missionaries told them that the Apostles' Creed would not do,—it was good as far as it went, but it did not contain essential doctrines of the Christian church; whereupon the Japanese Christians abandoned their effort. They declined to put into their creed several specified doctrines of the historical Evangelical Protestant denominations and gave up their movement rather than do so.

True, Doctor Eliot is speaking from an avowedly Unitarian point of view, but two facts remain: first, the Japanese brethren failed to get together in a Christian Union enterprise; second, the stumbling block was a proposed creed. Doctor Eliot glories in the failure, from his standpoint. We too may glory in it from ours with equal propriety. Perhaps, the Japanese Christians have well learned their bitter lesson that a creed is a mighty poor instrument to make use of, in any Christian Union enterprise. Creeds have always divided men in the past. Why should they divide them now? Creeds have failed in Europe and America. Why should one succeed in Japan? Christian Union will never in this world be brought about on the basis of a creed. Has Doctor Eliot forgotten the Chicago Quadrilateral of 1888? Union will come by way of the Cross, not by way of a Creed. Creeds only too readily invite intolerance, and intolerance at its very best is far from being a Christian virtue.

The Japanese Christians need not become too distressed over their conspicuous failure. American Christians have been trying their hands for some 300 years. A recent attempt was tried by none other than the illustrious Doctor Eliot himself, when about two years ago he proposed a "New Religion" as the basis of the union of all Christendom. By the way, what has become of Doctor Eliot's "New Religion?" Don't see anything about it nowadays in the newspapers that once thought the millennium was at hand with Doctor Eliot's proposal. Fact of the business is, that Doctor Eliot did not succeed with his denatured "New Religion" any more than have the Japanese succeeded with their creedal instrument. We would like to see what some Japanese scholar, corresponding to Doctor Eliot's position in this country, might have to say about Doctor Eliot's own well-advertised effort to get American Christians together some two years ago!

Quakerism in America

The Christian Intelligencer (Reformed Church, New York City) of June 7th, gives the following interesting paragraph on present day Quakerism:

The most conspicuous feature of American Quakerism of the moment is the leadership of young men and women. This leadership started some years ago in England, and was greatly advanced in America last year by the visit of a group of English Friends. The movement in England centers at Woodbrooke, where summer schools and summer conferences have been established. To Woodbrooke not a few young Quakers of this country have gone, and returning home, reported to other Friends the new life and plans. Into the Young Friends' Association have gone both liberal and orthodox Quakers. This association is not concerning itself much about union of the two great branches of American Quakerism, but is rather taking up educational and social reform. Some criticism is heard from older members of meetings, especially in the orthodox branch. Disregarded as it is by the association's members, the claim is made by young Quakers that they form today the most hopeful element in American Quakerism, and the surest promise that Friends are not to go out of existence as a religious body. Last summer there started at Hampton Falls, on the New England coast, a Friends' Summer School. It has now been given "Elmfield," which was the later home of Whittier, and where the Quaker poet died. It has been named the Whittier Fellowship Guest House. More than one hundred young Friends visited Hampton Falls and Hampton Beach last season, and more will go there this summer. Studies in Quakerism in England and America, in the services which Friends have rendered to religion, to peace, to the anti-slavery cause, are held, and there are springing up as one result other Quaker summer schools and conferences. All are advancing the interest of young people and giving Quakerism new life and usefulness.

United Brethren for Church Union

The General Conference of the United Brethren Chuch met at Decatur, Ill., and voted to combine forces with the Methodist Protestant Church. The two churches together will total 500,000 members. For two years past a joint committee has been at work, drafting a syllabus of union, including both a creed and the outlines of a form of government. The joint committee's report was submitted to the quadrennial General Conference of the United Brethren. Delegates from the Methodist Protestant Church were given the Christian courtesy of the floor, and spoke favorably upon the report. Bishop W. M. Bell, of California, responded for the United Brethren, making an impassionate plea to his brethren not to neglect this strategic opportunity.

The vote was finally taken. Not a single voice, it is said, was raised against the General Conference resolution which "commits itself unreservedly to the proposed policy of union with the Methodist Protestant Church." Those who did oppose were willing to defer their contest with the unionists until the voting in annual conference and local congregations. The question, it is provided, must first be submitted to the annual conferences. If three-fourths of these approve, it must be then submitted to a popular vote of the entire membership. If three-fourths of the people approve, then the bishops are to convene the General Conference for final ratification.

Congregationalists Rejoicing

The Congregational Sunday-school and Publishing Society has just closed a very profitable year of business, both at Boston and at Chicago. The annual business amounted to $551,636.45 and net profit to $26,963.55. Out of this net profit, the board of directors appropriated $18,757.33 in cash to the benevolent work of the society.

The Congregationalist (Boston) of June 5, makes the important announcement that Jacob J. Arakelyan has given to the Congregational Sunday-school and Publishing Society the well-known Arakelyan Press, valued at about $100,000, which has produced much of the Pilgrim Press literature. The Society has agreed to pay the donor an annuity for fifteen years. For years the benefactor cherished the design of bequeathing his well-known presses to the Society at his death, but he resolved, as he remarked, to become his own executor. The Congregationalist can rejoice that it is one of the very few religious weeklies that can be said to be printed on its own presses.

Jacob J. Arakelyan was born under the shadow of Mt. Ararat in Asiatic Turkey. He emigrated to America in 1867. He started with the Riverside Press and rose from position to position, until in 1883 he started a printing plant of his own. He is an enthusiastic Congregationalist.

American Bible Society's Annual Report

Probably the greatest agency in the world for the distribution of the Bible is the American Bible Society. Its report, just out, for 1913, shows conclusively that the Bible still is the most popular book in all the world.

The total issues at home and abroad amount to 4,049,610 volumes. These consist of 399,734 Bibles, 713,891 New Testaments, and 2,935,985 portions. Once more we report an advance over the issues of any year in the Society's history. When we realize that this is more than twice the issues of five years ago, and that for twenty-five years preceding that the annual issues averaged 1,500,000, this very noticeable advance becomes significant, and is a tribute in itself to the living power of the Scriptures. Of the total issues, 2,107,859 volumes were issued from the Bible House in New York, which is an advance over the issues of last year from the Bible House of 270,503 volumes; and 1,941,751 volumes were issued by the Society's agents abroad, being printed on mission and other presses in Turkey, Syria, Siam and Japan. The total issues of the Society in the ninety-seven years amount to 98,268,175 volumes.

Dr. Patton's Son a Roman Catholic

On top of the news of the retirement of Doctor Francis L. Patton, former president of Princeton, and latterly dean of its theological seminary, comes the announcement that his son, Paul Patton, has embraced the Roman Catholic faith. There is something almost freakish about a radical change of conviction like this. Paul Patton is an engineer on English government work in Bermuda, and it was there he became a Romanist. That is one side of the picture. Here is another side. The University Place Presbyterian Church, New York City, has among its members not less than 130 former Roman Catholics, while the First Presbyterian Church, of Newark, N. J., enumerates 150 former Roman Catholics. It is a notable fact, also, that in the past few years, not less than seven Paulist fathers have entered the communion of the Protestant Episcopal Church. No doubt, many go to Rome; and, likewise, no doubt, many come from Rome.

Religious Notes

The General Board of Education of the Kingdom of Spain by a vote of 30 to 20 adopted a resolution, which excepted from the duty of receiving religious instruction according to the tenets of the Roman Catholic church, children whose parents profess another religion, and also children, whose fathers, though Roman Catholics, express the desire that their children shall not receive official teaching in this subject, but undertake themselves in this case to give suitable religious instruction. How is that for Catholic Spain!

The London Times reproduced in facsimile last month, the page of the Freer MS., known as the Washington MS., in which occurs a supposed new saying of Christ. A translation was given the day before. This shows the world-wide interest in the Detroit art collector's discovery.

Church structures on Manhattan Island, N. Y., to cost $4,500,000 are now in the process of erection. Of this sum $3,400,000 are for Protestant worship and work and not a dollar of it is represented by mortgages. Of the Roman Catholic part, only $100,000 represents indebtedness.

Deacon J. Henry Baker, a lawyer of Baltimore, Md., is giving Baltimore some rigorous administration as president of the Board of Liquor License Commissioners. He has closed up 163 saloons, reduced the revenue by $100,000, but the churches are behind him.

The Ohio State Board of Health has issued an order prohibiting, among other things, the public communion cup during celebrations of the Lord's Supper. Watch the Episcopalians!

Eighty-nine Protestant Episcopal bishops will preach in New York City churches or chapels during the General Convention next October. Bishop Greer made the appointments.

The quadrennial General Conference of the Church of the United Brethren elected Doctor W. R. Funk as publishing agent for the fifth term of four years.

Hartford Theological Seminary, Hartford, Conn., announced at its commencement, the completion of a $750,000 endowment fund raised by President Mackenzie.

President Henry Churchill King is being boosted for the next moderator of the National Council of Congregational Churches, which meets in Kansas City.

The United Presbyterian and Associate Reformed Churches are eyeing each other: object, ecclesiastical matrimony.

From Near and Far

The new woman suffrage bill, which has passed both houses in Illinois and is awaiting Governor Dunne's endorsement, was introduced early in the session by Senator Magill and passed the senate more than a month ago. It gives women who are citizens, twenty-one years old, and have resided in the state one year, in the county ninety days and in the election precinct thirty days, the right to vote for all offices created by statute since the constitution of 1870 was adopted. A constitutional amendment will be necessary before women can be given the right to vote for state officers, members of the legislature and county officers.

John Timothy Stone, pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Chicago, and recently appointed moderator for the Presbyterians, sailed from New York a week ago. Before boarding the vessel in New York he announced the new committee of the Presbyterian general assembly, on closer relations with the Union Theological seminary. The committee is composed of Rev. Mark A. Matthews of Seattle, chairman; Rev. Edgar W. Work of New York, Rev. George Alexander of New York, Rev. William C. Robinson of Philadelphia, George V. Massey, Germantown, Pa., R. Taggart of New York and Frank J. Loesch of Chicago.

The committee of fifteen, in Chicago, in a new crusade against disreputable houses and hotels which cater to immoral women and their patrons, has compiled a list of 150 such places, said to be doing business openly in Chicago. Full reports on sixty-two of the cases have been sent to Mayor Harrison, Chief of Police WcWeeney and Dr. G. B. Young, commissioner of health. Attorneys have assured Clifford W. Barnes, president of the committee, that the evidence in all the cases is sufficient to bring about convictions of the proprietors of the places.

The figures on teachers' salaries recently compiled by the division of education of the Russell Sage Foundation show that thousands of rural teachers throughout the Southern States receive less than $150 a year. Taking the country as a whole, the average annual wage of carpenters is declared to be $802, of coal miners $600, of factory workers, $550, of common laborers, $513, and of teachers, $485. One Southern state rents its convicts to contractors at a little more than $400 a year and pays its public school teachers slightly over $300.

Beginning July 1 parcels may be sent C. O. D. through the United States mails. This will be effected through the use of the parcel post. Notice of the new plan was made known yesterday. A distinctive tag will be attached to each C. O. D. package. The form used consist of three parts—the first to be detached and handed to the sender, the second to be kept on file in the mailing office and the third to be attached to the parcel.

During the year 1912 the United States government spent nearly $20,000,000 for "its health departments, bureaus and all other health activities in its various branches." This estimate includes the public health service, the medical and hospital work of the War and Navy departments, the Department of Agriculture, and the Panama Canal sanitary service as well as the work of many minor bureaus.

A new woman suffrage bill, providing for a referendum in 1916, has been introduced in the Wisconsin legislature by the senate judiciary committee. It meets objections of Governor McGovern in his message vetoing the Glenn Bill, which proposed a referendum in 1914. The governor contended it was impractical to submit the question so soon after a decisive rejection at the polls.

The "Rural Organization service," a new branch of the Department of Agriculture, which includes the new "office of markets" as one of its principal activities, is now at work. Dr. Thomas N. Carver, professor of political economy at Harvard University since 1902, has been appointed as head of this service.

The first woman judge of delinquent girls sits on the bench of the Chicago Juvenile Court, as the assistant of Judge Pinckney. She is Miss Mary M. Bartelme, who for the past eighteen years has been "the public guardian of Cook County," official mother to hundreds of children.

As a result of a test of the "open window school" recently concluded in Philadelphia, in which it was shown that children were healthier in the low temperature rooms, both Chicago and Philadelphia have decided to increase the number of fresh-air schools.

The fourth centenary of the discovery of the Pacific Ocean by Vasco Nunez de Balboa is to be celebrated in Madrid this year. The Spanish government will celebrate by organizing a congress of Spanish-American history and geography.

Public Disorder and Higher Education

Baccalaureate Address by President Charles F. Thwing, LL. D.

Text: Matthew 24:6. "And ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars."

It is an insurging world. Man seems to be rebellious against his institutions. The longer existing and more natural are these forces, agencies, and conditions, the more rebellious does he seem to be. After many years of armed civil peace our nearest foreign neighbor of the South is in sedition. Over-seas, in the twelve months since we gathered in this place, England has passed through two crises which have demoralized industry, strained the English Constitution, brought havoc to the regular and recognized methods of life, flung millions into anxiety, and brought death to hundreds of lives. In this time the ancient power of Persia has been in the travail of revolution, the Italian Government has sought with menace and bloodshed to regain a long lost hold on North Africa, and certain parts and classes of the European and Asiatic Empire of the Czar have been saved from revolution by the crushing hand of military despotism. India, at peace for a time, knows that any day there may break forth the flames of unrest and of anarchy. Above all, China has within these last months expelled its rulers, and in the midst of provincial revolution established a republic for which every American has best wishes. Today, in our country, the hate of partizan passion within party and the hate of partizan passion without and against party inflames the mind and heart of every citizen. More than one half of the world is in rebellion. The world is an insurging world. The insurging is political.

An Age of Dynamics.

The insurging is also social. The Victorian age has, like a late staying guest, finally passed out. The era of good feeling has vanished. The social quietness, the mediocre respectability, the timid decorousness, the life which was comparative because it was not superlative, the era of ideals, but of ideals so low that they did not create despair in trying to attain unto them, nor so high that they quickened great enthusiasm in the probability of reaching them, have all gone, both in England and America. We have passed from an age of statics into the age of dynamics. We have come into the age of force, forces and forcefulness. We have entered from conditions into movements. The age of individualism becoming aggressiveness; of aggressiveness becoming unrest; of unrest becoming social and industrial reformation; of reformation becoming social and industrial revolution; of revolution tending toward anarchy, seems at last to have come upon us.

This state is industrial, moreover, as well as social and political.

The industrial unrest in the United States and in Western Europe is more than evident. Most great producers or distributors of goods, of steel, iron, coal, cotton, and woolen fabrics; most carrying systems, steam, electric and water, involving scores of trades and hundreds of thousands, even millions of workmen, are in constant jeopardy of positive interruption, or of annihilation. A twenty-four hour notice given by the Directors of Trades Unions and Labor Federations may stop thousands of trades, interrupt the recognized channels of communication, throw society into chaos and may bring certain countries like England with twelve days of rations ahead, to the actual borders of starvation. The industrial world is so builded together and tied up, part by and to part, that disorder in any one part produces, or tends to produce, disorder in every part. This unity belongs not only to industrial processes, but also to the industrial workmen. Workmen are banded together in ascending scales of comprehensiveness. The dock laborers have their union. The railroad employees have theirs. Both may be members of a Federation of Carriers, and the Federation of Carriers may be members of some higher unit. Not only are these unions national but also they are international. They cover the world.

Industrial Unrest.

This industrial unrest is indeed no new thing. But it is to be said that it tends to increase in intensity. Working men are becoming conscious of their power when they are joined together. They have entered politics and the Labor Party is a recognized political and civil body. Both in the United States and in England, the Labor Party becomes a distinct force in the great parties. Without its help, the Liberal Party in England would be unable to maintain itself in power. In America, the decision of the Labor Party to work with or against the Republican or the Democratic organization, would determine an election. But be it said, that not a few leaders of the working men have come to the conclusion that they can more effectively, as well as more speedily, get what they want to get, by Revolution than by Legislation.

Industrial war is, therefore, the declared resulting process. War is war, whether the warfare be rifles, or a strike, and picketing is picketing, whether it be along the Rhine, or about the docks of the Hudson or of the Thames; and in neither case can such picketing be described as peaceful.

It must, I think, be usually granted that the history of arbitration methods, conciliation boards, and other agencies for avoiding or adjusting strikes and lockouts, has for the past twenty-five years been rather a sorry record. Agreements, hard to arrive at, have been easily broken. Understandings become speedily misunderstandings. Misunderstandings produce suspicions, and suspicions eventuate readily in quarrels. The result is, that the employer of large numbers of workmen, and the great bodies of workmen themselves, are constantly, when not engaged in declared war, in a condition of armed neutrality. The white flag of truce flies no small share of the time, but it is easily and frequently displaced by the red flag. But be it said: the white flag stands for only a truce, and the red flag does stand for active and alert campaigning.

The industrial unrest is both the cause and result of socialism. Gladstone said, near the close of his unique career, that socialism formed the next question for humanity to take up. Towards the close of his also long life, John Stuart Mill made a similar intimation: "Socialism has for better or for worse come to pervade society in both Europe and the United States more generally and more deeply than is commonly believed."

Go to Oxford, or to Cambridge, and one finds socialism moving in the atmosphere, filling the hearts of many disciples, and of as many apostles. In scores of American colleges, little bands of these socialist workers and speakers are found. In theological seminaries, both among students and teachers, are enrolled adherents and expounders. I am not now declaring against the thing itself, or against this propagandism. I am simply interpreting such a condition as existing among college men and intimating that it is profoundly significant. For the belief of the abler and more serious college men of one age will become the belief of the people of the next generation, and the practice of the generation still following.

As I have said, this unrest is both industrial, social and political. But the movement has gone far beyond the legislative process in its radicalism. It seems to bear recollections of the Reign of Terror, and of the Commune. The French Revolution helped to give Europe (excepting England, which got its liberty in the peaceful Revolution of 1688) liberty and nationality. The present movement is not concerned with either party or nationality. Its cry is "A Living Wage." Its demand is for "Meat." (It has bread.) Its will is for "Opportunity." It wants the "Open Door."

Class Enmity.

A comprehensive remark to be made about these movements more or less allied, and about the people who constitute these movements, themselves more or less diversified, is that these masses, on the one side, workmen, employees, and on the other side, the classes, capitalists, or employers, are exceedingly antagonistic to each other. They regard themselves, or at least are inclined to regard themselves, as enemies. The workmen often, too often, hate the employer, and the employer often, too often, is indifferent to the workmen. Advantages gained by one, are regarded as a loss to the other; disadvantages suffered by one, are interpreted as advantages gained by the other. The workmen think of their employers as tyrants, and believe that the employers look on them as machines to be run at the highest efficiency, and, when worn out, to be flung on the human scrap-pile. The employers regard, or give some reason for believing that they regard, the workmen as men who are chiefly interested in doing the least work for the most money, who are willing to break their promises, careless of their employer's rights, regardless of their own duties, without conscientiousness or zeal. Such antagonisms are not universal, but such antagonisms are altogether too general. This condition, inexpressibly sad, has arisen in part at least from the remoteness of the employer and the employee. The growth of all industrial undertakings, to embrace thousands or tens of thousands of workmen, makes it impossible for the individual employer to know the individual workman. The workman comes to be known as a number, and ceases to be a personality. Humanity is thus submerged on both sides and with this submersion spring up dislikes, recriminations, enmities of all sorts.

I suppose it must also be confessed that the leadership of these movements is inadequate. It is a leadership intense and narrow. It is inclined to see one side only. That justice lies with the workmen and injustice with the employer and capitalist is too often the presumption that lies behind all reflection, and that forms the basis of executive procedure. The duty owed the people, the general interests of the community, have a small part in deliberation or decision. That the employer is completely free from guilt is never for one instant to be intimated. Many years ago the reported remark from the head of a great railway system that "Let the public be damned" became a noisome stench in the public nostrils.

It is true that there are exceptions to the narrowness of the leadership under which workmen move. John Mitchell is an exception; but the dislike for one of his large type helps to prove the proposition as it refers to America. John Burns is also an exception, but the dislike of many workingmen for John Burns helps to prove the chief proposition.

Now, in this condition, sketched so imperfectly in broad lines, "What can the colleges and the universities do to make things better?" The question is significant. For the higher education does not desire to nurse a fugitive and cloistered virtue. It desires to serve—as it ought to serve—the highest, broadest, deepest, and most enduring interests of man.

The higher education can help its students to look at facts as they are, and to weigh the evidence which these facts present. Of course, the colleges have always been seeking to achieve this result. The colleges have always been trying to teach the significant fact that two and two make four. A significant fact, indeed, for always there are some in the community who are trying to squeeze two and two into three, and an equal number who are trying to enlarge them into five. In the training of this power of looking at facts as they are, and in weighing evidence, lies the worth of education. But the college has a special duty laid upon itself of transmuting this general obligation into a duty specific and particular. For to the great social and industrial facts one is specially liable to be blind. The facts are not like the reforms of the Gracchi—remote. They are immediate. So close are they that it is difficult to see them as they are, to interpret their relations, to point out their significance, or to lay down a course of conduct based upon their meanings. But they are pregnant with new births for men. Their nearness generates passion. Truth's white light has a small chance for shining. For better or worse, for destruction, or for construction in this difficult environment, they must be interpreted. Such interpretation, the college can inspire its men to seek to make. It should help men to see these phenomena sanely and steadily, and to see them whole.

The Human Sciences.

The college, further, may give greater place to what I call the human sciences. These sciences include history, economics, government, and sociology. The increase in the emphasis laid on these subjects has, in a score of years, been vast. It is hardly possible to exaggerate the increase. It is not for me to depreciate the worth of the natural sciences, either as intellectual disciplines or as revelations of the wonders of the creative process. Let the natural sciences have their full and adequate place. But I do believe the social and industrial conditions demand that college graduates shall go forth with some understanding of the complexity and seriousness of these conditions. For under these conditions, the people are misled. Political and civil harm results. The disease spreads. The patient grows worse. Where can help be found? I know too well the imperfections and weaknesses of the colleges. But if help is coming, it must come in accordance with the great human laws which are as real as, though harder to understand, than the great laws of nature. These laws, these principles, of social, political, civil, and industrial well-being are studied, considered, related to each other in the colleges and universities. The men who have been students of these laws and principles are above all others best qualified to apply these laws to the body politic and social. Humanity goes on repeating its experiments which have failed. Its memory is short. The colleges stand for accumulated thought. They represent and present the history of human experimentation. The colleges should save men, at least somewhat, from repeating their great social errors and mistakes. The result of all the help the colleges can give will be poor enough, but these results are the most precious and effective which humanity in its present stage of cultivation can attain unto.

But there is a further method which the colleges may use in overcoming the anarchistic tendencies of the social and industrial movement. This method consists in the establishment of departments of the human sciences for the special advantage of men of mature years who are especially interested in these subjects and who have not been able, by reason of their limitations, to give themselves a proper education. This suggestion is by no means new. It bears memories of movements which have a somewhat prolonged history. The workingmen's colleges of fifty years ago, in which the great Maurice and the versatile Kingsley were founders and sponsors and supporters, embody the same great idea. Today no better exponent of the movement is found than is incarnated in Ruskin College at Oxford. The difficulties in laying such a foundation are neither few in number nor slight. The ordinary members of a college faculty are seldom able to undertake such a task. Their duties are altogether too heavy for any such permanent additional service. For a brief time they may take such work upon themselves, but not as a lasting service. A special staff, therefore, is to be organized; and such a staff, competent in mind and conscience, is hard to secure. Furthermore, many men desiring to become students are found to lack a proper general education. They have not the intellectual qualifications to take up special social studies, than which no subjects are more complex. Their eagerness and enthusiasm go a certain way—with some men, a long way—in overcoming the lack of trained mental power; but enthusiasm cannot be accepted as a substitute for a trained intellect.

An Opportunity to Advance Social Peace.

I am also inclined to believe that the regular college officers may make a most effective use of their own wisdom and counsels in securing the great end of social and industrial peace. It is a perilous thing for a professor or president to give specific advice to a new student regarding the choice of a calling. Principles he may lay down. Their application should be committed to the man who must bear the responsibilities of the choice. But officers should feel free to intimate, and perhaps do more than intimate, the opportunities open in social service as a vocation, or open even as an avocation. I have known the head of an institution of five hundred students to make plain suggestions to hundreds in respect to a life's calling. Jewett, of Balliol, was a supreme master in such guidance. It is at this point that the college may render especially effective service. I have referred to the lack of wise leadership in the great social movements. Cannot the colleges do more in securing such leadership? Cannot the college train men up into such intellectual power and with such human sympathies that its graduates shall feel the impulse to enter into such communities and be able to merit such leadership? Many men in college are, as I have said, more or less socialistic. If they, entering life and taking part either formally or informally in these tremendous affairs, can keep their judgment large and clear, they should in time be able to give great help in offering right direction to these movements unto the happiest results.

In quite a different field, and one more or less non-academic, it is possible for the colleges to put forth efforts. I have referred, as a sad feature in the social and industrial condition, to the antagonism of the masses and the classes. Can the colleges do aught to mitigate such reciprocal enmities? Of course, college men, mingling and meeting together and going out into their diverse callings and relationships, are better prepared through common knowledge and acquaintance to promote comraderie. But I also believe that a simple and genuine religious basis and atmosphere would aid in dispelling antagonisms. Is there any such basis on which more men, college and non-college, could succeed in standing? I know of one, and of only one. That is Christ's Sermon on the Mount. In this Great Discourse, that part which forms the most fitting basis is known as "The Beatitudes." One need not be a Roman Catholic as such, or a Protestant as such; one need not subscribe to the occidental interpretations of Christ's character or words, interpretations which the orientals say are wrong or false. But if men would agree to accept of the words of the Sermon on the Mount in respect to the Supreme Being, in respect to altruistic and selfward duties, there would be formed a deep, as well as a broad foundation for men helping each other. I wish to appeal for a place for the Ten Beatitudes. I would write them into a Creed:—"I believe in humility of spirit and humbleness of life; in the comfort of those who mourn; in the blessedness of those hungering and thirsting after righteousness; in mercy; in the vision of God belonging to the pure in heart, and in the peacemakers as the children of God; and I also believe in the willingness of enduring persecution for righteousness' sake, and in the blessed assurance that those who endure shall have great reward."

A Revival Needed.

It may not be further out of place for one to say that there is a need today of a revival of the humanity of humanity. One can say this without running the risk of being judged as a follower of Comte. There has been a revival in the study of, and of love for, nature. From being an unknown enemy of the ancients, nature has become through the stages of poetic interpretation, of aesthetic appreciation, and of scientific research, a known and great friend. A similar transformation and elevation is surely taking place in the study of humanity. The movement for arbitration and for peace among nations is a token of what has been achieved and is a promise of what is to be secured. The present may be a near tide in the process. The sense of the value of the individual human life seems to be just now suffering an eclipse, but it is a temporary one. The value of men as men, the worth of humanity as humanity, the significance of the human, is ever to be emphasized. Man is neither a thing nor a brute. He is a man and because he is a man he is like unto God.

On to Toronto

A Preview of the International Convention

By Reuben Butchart

From many standpoints the selection of Toronto, Canada, as the next meeting place of the International Convention, was a fortunate one. The tide of American tourist travel already setting that way, indicates the scenic value of the route and the interest which surrounds the second city of Canada. Every summer Toronto becomes the Mecca of many thousands of sight-seers from all parts of the continent. They come for Toronto's sake, to enjoy the view of the biggest nearby American city with a style all its own; they come also because Toronto is on the route to the great Canadian playgrounds of the north, to Muskoka, Temagami, and the thousands of square miles of territory yielding natural scenery and sport, between the waters of the Ottawa river on the east, to the Georgian bay on the west.

Toronto is easily the most commanding city on the great lakes. It is distant from Buffalo by rail 117 miles, and this by a circuitous route around the western end of Lake Ontario. It is due north of Niagara Falls 48 miles, all of which may be traversed over a river and lake route of great scenic interest on a line of palatial steamers, which make six round trips daily. From Toronto there may be made excursions to any of the numerous summer resorts on Lake Ontario, the Muskoka and Kawartha lakes, or down the St. Lawrence river by way of the celebrated Lachine rapids to Montreal, Quebec and the Saguenay. Her citizens enjoy the privilege of lake travel by beautiful and commodious steamers to Niagara Falls, St. Catherines, Hamilton, Kingston, Olcott, N. Y., and Rochester, N. Y., and other points. Therefore, in a word, the attractions of Toronto in its physical setting cannot be exaggerated.

Toronto is a metropolis. It does not owe to its size or any local advantage, such as a big industry, the importance which it enjoys. In the first place it is the capital of the greatest province of the Dominion—Ontario. It is therefore at the center of the legislative, judicial and educational life of a large section of Canada. It is the second commercial city of Canada, Montreal only being greater, possibly because of its being a seaport. The trade of Toronto is growing by leaps and bounds. In 1912 its bank clearings were $2,170,230,376; its building permits were $25,369,478; its customs import values were $120,000,000, and its annual civic tax assessment will be in the neighborhood of $7,121,371.

Toronto is served by three great Canadian railway lines, the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern, one of them being the first really transcontinental line and the others potentially so. A street railway serves its citizens locally with little to be desired. Civic traction lines have also been constructed and electric rural lines radiate northward, eastward and westward. The paving of Toronto is in the main asphalt, its lighting is by a unique and beautiful electric system of low-set lamps placed at short intervals over both sides of its 412 miles of streets. The current for street railway and lighting, also for the homes of its citizens and factory power, is generated at Niagara and transmitted by the cables of a government electric commission, which incidentally serves nearly the whole of western Ontario and bids fair to give Ontario a manufacturing franchise of great value. The lighting of Toronto is a point of civic pride.

Of course "seeing Toronto" is a feature never omitted by American tourists wherever bound. The splendid street railway will take the knowing visitor anywhere; the numerous electric coaches serve the stranger. The line of travel includes first the "downtown" section with its views of the great through streets, Yonge, and Queen and King. Here are to be found the big wholesale and retail houses, the hotels—King Edward, Prince George, Walker House, Queen's and others—the magnificent City Hall, costing about $2,500,000, Massey Hall, where the convention meets—the beautiful old churches, St. James' Cathedral, St. Michael's Cathedral, Metropolitan, (Methodist), Osgoode Hall, (the law courts) and the St. Lawrence Market.

The real residential section of Toronto begins about one and one-fourth miles north of the Bay, at College Street, a great thoroughfare. Centrally and above College is the great show place of Toronto—the Queen's Park which, besides being the home of many fine old trees, is adorned by the great architectural beauties of the University of Toronto which comprises many magnificent buildings. It is also the home of the Parliament buildings of the province, a massive series of brown stone in Moorish style of architecture and costing approximately $3,000,000. Nearby is the immense new complex of buildings of the Toronto General Hospital, one of the most complete hospitals on the continent. There are many fine churches the tourist will see in a drive around, which will include also the more famous residential streets of Sherbourne, St. George, and the district of Rosedale. Farther up on the heights, stand the veritable castles of the multi-rich. They are the show places, if not the actual pride of the average citizen.

But we must hurry on to the Convention. Toronto could not adequately be described in the entire space of The Century.

Massey Music Hall is the gift of a wealthy citizen in order to equip the city with a modern and commodious meeting place. It is the Mecca of great artists, of conventions and meetings. This June over 4,000 delegates to the great Pan-Presbyterian Congress met in session. The hall is beautifully decorated and seated, accommodating 3,500 so that all may see the speakers. It has commodious exhibition space, and accommodation of the comfort variety. Its managers will not permit the distribution of free advertising. A magnificent organ will be at the disposal of the Convention. Nearby is the great Methodist Cathedral (Metropolitan Church); also St. James Cathedral. In both buildings there is ample accommodation for all conferences and overflow meetings.

Toronto has many fine hotels, notably, the King Edward (Convention Headquarters), Prince George and Queen's. If you wish to secure rates for either hotel or lodging in some home, write C. O. Reynard, 16 Harbord St., Toronto, Can. He has charge of entertainment.

A unique feature of the next Convention will be the inauguration of the General Convention. The churches of the brotherhood are asked to send representatives, one for every church and one for every additional one hundred members after the first hundred. A splendid program is being prepared, arranged on similar lines to recent conventions. The Commission on Unity will occupy Thursday night, Oct. 2nd, at which several distinguished men of other communions will speak. Mr. J. Campbell White is one of them.

A strong local committee of management has been at work for some weeks. Of this the very capable president is J. D. Higgins, (16 Leader Lane); the secretary is Prof. H. F. Dawes, (600 Manning Avenue). Promoting the Convention from the United States side is in the hands of A. M. Harvuot, of 1749 Brewster Avenue, Cincinnati, O. As many as 5,000 it is expected, will attend, Toronto having so many extra attractions to offer the visitor. The Canadian Committee will strive to have 1,000 brethren and sisters to meet the hosts from the United States. Come and meet them.

A Dream of Fair Letters

They Were Never Written, but They Ought to Be—Sometimes.

BY REV. ERNEST BOURNER ALLEN, D. D.

If a church letter told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, what would it say? If church clerks were compelled to tell the exact facts about members, instead of sending the formal letter which is usually sent out, how arduous would be their duties!

I had a dream the other day in which I seemed to see a church letter we had just voted for Mrs.———— (the name escapes me now). It read as follows:

"To the Congregational Church at Holyland, greeting.

"This will certify to you that Mrs. ———— has been a member of our church for ten years. During that time she has been seen several times each year at the church services.

"We have also seen her at prayer meeting on not less than four occasions. Twice she baked a cake for a church social, and once she made a pledge of ten cents per week for the running expenses. Upon this pledge she has made four payments, and the balance remaining is $2.45.

"Mrs. ———— has also assisted at several receptions and at one annual bazaar. She once wrote the pastor a letter commenting upon a sermon and criticising the church for asking its members to contribute. She has also for two years past sent small packages of old clothes for the missionary barrel.

"We are very glad to have her take her letter, and hope the ministrations of the church in Holyland will satisfy her more fully than we have been able to do. Faithfully yours,

"Simeon Steadfast, Clerk."

In my dream I also read another church letter which was granted to Mr. ———— (his name escapes me). This letter I saw very plainly.

"To the church at Topnotch, greeting.

"This will certify that Mr. ———— has been a member of our church twenty-three years. During that time he has attended irregularly ten years, and stayed away the rest of the time because he was not elected church treasurer. He has been known to contribute to the church budget, but this is only in the memory of our oldest members.

"Mr. ———— has frequently cheered the pastor by his criticisms of various sermons, reports of which he had seen in the daily press. He has also encouraged his wife to attend the Ladies' Society on an afternoon when there was a free pure-food demonstration. He has been generous in calling the attention of his friends to the faults of church-members and the universal hypocrisy of Christians. He asked for a letter from the church, thinking that it might give him a little prestige as a newcomer in the community where Topnotch church is located.

"Sincerely yours,

"Simeon Steadfast, Clerk."

I wakened soon after this part of my dream, and found I had been suffering from a severe cramp in my arm, due to an uncomfortable position.

When that was relieved, I fell into a doze again, and in that subconscious state I saw the letter our church had just sent to the church at Sunfield, introducing our good sister Fairwell. It opened in the usual formal way, and then went on:

"You are fortunate in having Mrs. Fairwell come among you. Young and old will miss her here. She has been 'full of good works,' and is greatly beloved.

"If every church had more like her, the Kingdom would come in that community more quickly. We love to hear her pray. Her works keep time to her profession. She has a kindly heart and a peaceful tongue. She knows how to lead a soul into the Kingdom of God. 'Her children arise up, and call her blessed.' She is one of the saints of God to those who sorrow or suffer, who are sick or discouraged. She is worth any fifty members we have, and we shall miss her sorely."

Then I woke up and wondered what my church letter would say, if it told the whole truth.

When I recovered, I resolved to ask you how your letter would read. Write it out, and be honest. Then set to work to make it read as it ought to.—Christian Endeavor World.

Heard It Before

Dr. J. M. Buckley, the well-known editor and divine, addressing a New York Sunday-school, related an incident that greatly interested the children. He told of meeting a ragged, hungry-looking little girl in the street on a winter day, and when he questioned her she recited a pitiful tale of a sick mother and younger brothers and sisters without food. After giving her a silver dollar the good doctor followed at a safe distance to see what she would do with the money.

"Now, children, what do you suppose was the first thing she bought with that dollar?" said Doctor Buckley. "Hands up."

Up went the hands, and one child after another ventured a guess, but none proved correct. Finally a little boy whose upraised hand alone remained was asked for his answer to the question.

"A basket," he sung out.

"Correct," said the doctor "there's a boy who thinks. Now, son, come up here on the platform and tell us why you think it was a basket."

After considerable coaxing the boy reached the platform, but seemed unwilling to talk. "Go on," urged the doctor, "I want these boys and girls to learn to think, too."

The boy still hesitated and Doctor Buckley took from his pocket a silver quarter. "I'll give you this," he said, "if you'll tell us what makes you think the little girl bought a basket first."

"Be-be-cause," stammered the youngster, at last moved by the sight of the money. "I was over in Hoboken last Sunday and heard you tell the story there."—Harper's Magazine.

Temperance Parade, Washington, D. C.

On Sunday afternoon May 25, a great temperance procession and rally was held in Washington, D. C., in which more than three thousand Sunday-school children under eighteen years of age participated. The children formed a line six blocks long which was viewed by throngs of people along the sidewalks. They marched about eight blocks headed by an escort of mounted police who cleared the way and also added to the imposing appearance of the procession. The Commandant of the Marine Corps kindly sent all available drummers and buglers who furnished martial music for the parade. The Boy Scouts acted as honorary escort at the front and as guard at the rear. Two monster simultaneous meetings were held. Secretary Daniels was the chief speaker, it being his first appearance as a part of a temperance demonstration in Washington. We quote the following pointed utterances from his address: "Drunkenness is the crime which embraces every other crime." "We have lived to see that no one longer glories in the attributes of a drunkard." "The old doctrine that a young man must sow his wild oats is folly." "Men who drink are not capable of holding public office." This demonstration originated with Mrs. D. P. Blaine, national lecturer and organizer of the W. C. T. U., who has had wide experience in arranging temperance demonstrations among the young people in different states. It was held under the auspices of the Sunday-school Association of the District of Columbia, the W. C. T. U. co-operating in the arrangements. Mr. W. W. Milan, president of the Sunday-school Association, of the District of Columbia, and who is an officer in the International Sunday-school Association, and Mrs. Blaine are planning to have similar demonstrations in the cities and towns throughout the country.

Bishop Doane and His Dog

Bishop William Crosswell Doane of Albany, N. Y., died May 17 in New York City. He was probably the most famous of Protestant Episcopal bishops. He was bishop, scholar, poet, all in one. He died at the ripe age of 81. His theology may be gauged to some degree from the following poem:

"I am quite sure he thinks that I am God—
Since he is God on whom each one depends
For life, and all things that his bounty sends—
My dear old dog, most constant of all friends;
Not quick to mind, but quicker far than I
To Him whom God I know and own: his eye,
Deep brown and liquid, watches for my nod;
He is more patient underneath the rod
Than I, when God His wise corrections sends.
He looks love at me, deep as words e'er spake:
And from me never crumb nor sup will take
But he wags thanks with his most vocal tail:
And when some crashing noise wakes all his fear,
He is content and quiet if I am near,
Secure that my protection will prevail.
So faithful, mindful, thankful, trustful, he Tells me what I unto my God should be."

Cheaper Postage Stamps

Postage stamps are to be cheaper, not to the consumer but to the government. A new and simpler method has been devised by Benjamin H. Stickney, mechanical expert. He has invented a printing press which is to print stamps in a continuous roll at the rate of 12,000 a minute.

Further than that the same press is apt to revolutionize printing from engraved plates; it is regarded as bearing the same relation to the development of the science of plate printing as linotype machines bore to type composition. The machine is perfected and is set up and operating in a secret room of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It is expected to go into full commission early next month.

This plate press eliminates twenty-three processes in the present method of printing postage stamps. The paper is fed automatically from the roll, inclosed in a safe-cylinder, to the press which prints the stamps, dries the ink so that there is no trace of "offset," gums the back of the stamp printed roll, dries the gum, breaks the hard, glazed solid face of the gum, perforates and counts and either rolls up the strip of stamps or slits them into strips of a single stamp's thickness for use in stamp selling machines. It also rolls them up or cuts into sheets which are automatically fastened into packages of the required number of sheets.

On an annual bill of half a million dollars for printing postage stamps the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is anticipating a saving of $275,000. This is a 57 per cent decrease. The Bureau of Printing and Engraving has a mechanical genius who worked out this idea, Benjamin R. Stickney, mechanical expert and designer under Director Joseph E. Ralph, is the man. Director Ralph discovered that Mr. Stickney has a mechanical faculty highly developed, and proceeded to make use of it for the benefit of the government and more particularly of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. Stickney was a $1,100-a-year machinist in the bureau when Director Ralph took office. Appreciating the ability of the machinist Director Ralph offered Mr. Stickney promotion involving transfer to other work. Mr. Stickney declined the honor with thanks, declaring his thorough devotion to mechanics and his unwillingness to seek advancement in any other line. Mr. Stickney's salary is now $3,500 a year.

The plate printing press of which Mr. Stickney is the inventor, in its inception is not a new idea. The patents are in his name, although the rights are in the government for which he devised it. The necessity for such a machine has been widely discussed; many minds have applied themselves to its problem, but Mr. Stickney alone has made feasible what had almost been regarded as impossible.

The range of topics discussed by the Congress of Mothers, recently in convention at Boston, covered almost everything pertaining to child life and the home. These topics were presented by men and women who are recognized as national leaders in the nation-wide child welfare movement and the betterment of the American home. Speakers of note heard at the various sessions of the Congress were: Bishop Lawrence, F. P. Dyer, Miss Julia Lathrop, chief of our new national Children's Bureau; Prof. E. P. St. John, Mr. Joseph Lee, Miss Lucy Wheelock, Mrs. Henry Osgood Holland, Hon. Philander P. Claxton, Rev. B. S. Winchester, Henry F. Cope, Mr. David Snedden, Mrs. E. C. Ripley, Dr. G. Stanley Hall, Prof. Colin Scott, Mrs. David O. Mears, Hon. Logan Waller Page and many others.

Ten nations—Austria-Hungary, Italy, Great Britain, France, Brazil, Sweden, Norway, Peru, Russia and the United States have accepted proposals made recently in a circular note to the members of the diplomatic corps. Mr. Bryan will begin negotiations for drafting formal conventions with these countries. The treaties will provide for an international commission to study all questions of controversy which cannot be settled by diplomacy, and the contracting governments agree not to begin hostilities or declare war until the report of the commission has been made. After that the governments are at liberty to act as they see fit under the circumstances.

Two big machine shops at Hyde Park, Mass., of which Governor Foss is the controlling owner, have been closed by a strike of over 1,400 workmen. Wage increases up to twenty per cent are demanded. Strikes in other factories in which Governor Foss is interested are threatened. Negotiations are in progress which, it is hoped, may result in an early settlement of the trouble.

The Anti-Saloon League of Maryland has determined to take up formally with every church official board or governing committee of the temperance denominations in the state, the matter of the church, or some member paying the expenses of the pastor to the great National Anti-Saloon League Convention to be held in Columbus, Ohio, November 10-13.

POEMS OF THE SOCIAL AWAKENING

The American Black

(A Study in Race-Consciousness.)

Night! Night!
And of the dawn no promise. Wrong is right,
And right is wrong!

Long, long ago, ah long,
I roamed the forests vast and awful, bending
Around me with their leafy aisles unending,
And smelt their dense sweet savors many a league,
And fought or loved their Shadows silent—striding
Without a fear; or, when a hard fatigue
Befell, would sink to utter sleep, confiding
In the fierce gods o' the Jungle I confest;
Ah, that delicious, peaceful, dreamless rest!
No hubbub of the kraal-folk now I hear,
No spear-songs, no war-music wild and thrilling;
Not now I shoot the arrow, hurl the spear,
And rush with warrior-rage unto the killing;
The old is dead,
Or, if it live perchance,
It dwells in the so distant battle-dance
Unfindable again, and poisoned lance
With foe's blood wet and red,
That into Past and Place its ghost has vanished.

Instead,—
Instead,—
White faces, houses, streets; white ways, white works;
Faces that frown and yet are not unkind,
Faces that smile where yet no kindness lurks,
(The gods were angry or were gracious, one!)
Houses that wear a shutter and a blind,
Streets all alike, and work that's never done—
Work endless, pitiless, that craves and craves
Slaves for its worshipers, themselves its slaves:
Work without aim or meaning, save to breed
Money, the mother of more work, and greed,
Its father; work whose drudging devotees
Bear heavy loads with harness on their back,
The white men's golden, and we black men's black,
And none has joy or ease:
The poor seek riches, and the rich seek more,
And both must have our service, hard and sore—
And so we serve, and share not, nor rebel,
(For one must suffer when he is in hell)
And wear the yoke with silent, sullen shame,
And dream of Freedom that is not a name.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

An Address to Graduate Nurses

Within the past three years, the heroic spirit of Florence Nightingale, founder of the first school for nurses, passed to her rest and reward. Though of delicate physique, and a hard worker all her life, she lived to the advanced age of four-score and ten years. She was of noble birth, and spent her early life in her beautiful English home. Her wise father gave her a thorough education, including the classics and modern languages. Her advice to women long after was: "Prepare yourself as carefully for the business of life as man prepares himself."

She spent her young womanhood in studying hospital conditions in her own country and in Europe, and secured all the training possible in those far-off days. She took the full course at the new school at Kaiserworth, Germany, established for training deaconesses in the Lutheran Church. Her work in the Crimean War is best known, where she endured hardships and faced dangers beyond the soldier in the trenches, or the heroes in the charge of the Light Brigade. For two years she had charge of the hospital service there, and her name has become famous in song and story. Longfellow's tribute to her tells of "dreary hospitals of pain—of cheerless corridors—of cold and stony floors," and says:

"So, in that house of misery, a lady with a lamp I see, Pass through the glimmering gloom, and flit from room to room."

"On England's annals through the long hereafter of her speech and songs, That light its ray shall cast, from portals of the past."

"A lady with a lamp shall stand, in the great history of the land,
A noble type of good, heroic womanhood."

Florence Nightingale's Greatest Achievement.

But her greatest achievement was not so much her labors in the Crimea, as her profound study of sanitary and medical systems, her statesmanlike grasp of their problems and possibilities, which enabled her to bring about great reforms in hospital administration—our modern systems of military hospitals must be credited to her.

Even more significant than that, was the use to which she put the fund of fifty thousand pounds, given to her by a grateful nation on her return from the Crimea, in founding a school for training women for the profession of nursing.

To this type of "good, heroic womanhood" you owe the profession of your adoption—happy is any calling to have a woman like Florence Nightingale for its founder and patron saint!

Her nurses' training school was established about the close of the fifties of the past century. Before that, professional nursing was largely in charge of religious sisterhoods—at first, Roman Catholic, but after the founding of Kaiserworth in 1839, by Pastor Flindner, by an increasing number of Protestant organizations. We had no training schools for nurses in this country, before the early seventies of the past century. During our war between the states, there was not a single white-capped, white-gowned, young woman, hovering over the sick and wounded with her thermometer and hypodermic syringe; the care of our soldiers was left to Sisters of Charity, convalescent patients, and volunteer women, without training. Bellevue Hospital in New York City, was the pioneer, when it opened a school for training nurses in 1873, in accordance with Miss Nightingale's plans and advice.

Revolution in Modern Medicine.

The growth of the movement in the forty years since it was started, shows that it came in the very nick of time; modern bacteriology revolutionized the care of contagious diseases, and aseptic surgery introduced a variety of treatment hitherto undreamed of—these advances in medical and surgical work demanded a deftness of hand, and intelligent comprehension of causes, which only a professional training could give. At a Nurses' Congress held in New York City, more than a year ago, it was stated that there were now seventy-five thousand graduate nurses in the country—and doubtless a large number has been added to their ranks since then. The American Year Book for 1910 states that there are 1,096 training schools for nurses with 29,320 students in attendance. The census report on trained nurses is not yet available.

The domain of trained nurses is constantly widening, and their training is becoming more accurate and specialized.

This field of work is no longer limited to the home and the hospital; in many of our larger cities, nurses assist in the medical inspection of the public schools, as well as in educational and preventative work, especially in tuberculosis. In the Welfare Movement, nurses are taking an active part in the prevention of infant mortality; they are found at milk stations, directing its distribution, instructing the mothers, and visiting them in their homes. They are also engaged in factories and department stores, looking after the sanitation and all other things bearing on the health of the employees.

Life's Crowning Fortune.

Emerson says: "The high prize of life, the crowning fortune of a man, is to be born with a bias to some pursuit, which finds him at once in employment and happiness."

I am taking it for granted that the members of this class have selected their profession, because they have a bias toward it; they have successfully completed the exacting duties of a two years' course of training, and this has tested the sincerity of their call to this service. I can therefore congratulate them as belonging to those whom the sage of Concord counts as having won one of the high prizes of life.

To realize the advantages of this profession to its lowest terms, they will secure adequate compensation for their services, and are capable of achieving the great boon of financial independence by their own labors; the calling of trained nurses is probably better paid than any other open to women without capital. It demands hard work, but work is also one of the prizes of life. The full day, with every hour crowded with work, is the happy day. I can conceive of no greater calamity than for one to wake in the morning, wondering how she can fill the empty hours of her idle days.

In addition to the blessings of hard work and good pay, the profession of nursing demands high standards of those who follow it—good health, good character, and a reasonably good education is required before one is even permitted to enter upon the course. The discipline of their training all tends to develop noble traits of character. No profession, with the possible exception of the army and navy, teaches unquestioning obedience to authority, the physician's authority, like that of nursing—and that is fine discipline in these days when liberty is carried so far that it runs into license. The nurse inevitably learns a measure of prudence, both during her years of training, and her independent practice, for entering the innermost sanctuary of the home at a time when sickness, possibly death, breaks down all barriers, she hears more family secrets and sees more family skeletons than the lawyer, the doctor, or the minister. Her own success, as well as regard for the ethics of her calling, requires that she shall be superior to gossip, dignified and self-contained.

Dignity of the Profession of Nursing.

And the profession of nursing itself is one of the noblest, and therefore the most satisfying of all vocations. It has its root in a heart of compassion for the sick and suffering, and is of like spirit with Him, who is so often represented as moved with compassion at sight of the pangs and sorrows of those about Him. His peerless teaching would have lacked something without this—it was an essential part of what has been called the "Program of Christianity." When the Baptist, with the shadow of the prison and of coming death dimming for a time his clear faith, sent to ask if he were really the Christ, his answer was, "Tell John the things ye see and hear; the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the deaf hear, the lepers are cleansed, the dead are raised, the poor have the Gospel preached unto them." It was the proof of His divinity, offered by Himself.

The program of your profession is the same as that of Jesus—the ministry of healing to all the sicknesses of this great and needy world; it is your high calling to follow, as far as poor, faltering, human feet can, in the very footsteps of Him, who was Healer of bodies, as well as Saviour of souls." I. W. H.

My Task

FLORENCE JONES HADLEY.

A homekeeper? Ah, yes, dear heart, and more;
Keeper of hearts for those love gave to me,
Upholding weary hands that else might fail,
Smoothing a little head upon my knee.

A homekeeper am I; this is my task:
To make one little spot all snug and warm,
Where those so bruised and beaten by the day
May find a refuge from the night and storm.

Gladly I serve—love makes the serving sweet;
I feel no load—love makes the burden light;
A happy keeper I of home and hearts—
Serving, I reign—a queen by love's own right.

Disciples Table Talk

Central, Shreveport, La., Celebrates.

The Central Church at Shreveport, where Claude L. Jones ministers, celebrated the fifteenth anniversary of its organization June 1. This church has developed to its present $50,000 status from a little dingy store room, in which the original congregation of eleven members met, in 1898, when the church was organized as the result of a meeting held by C. L. Jones, state evangelist. For eighteen months the work was carried on in this building when a lot was purchased and a frame church was erected. Here the church continued from the date of dedication, May 20, 1900, to the erection of the Tabernacle building. The church held services in the Tabernacle for five years, when preparations for the new building necessitated its removal. On January 14, 1912, the present magnificent new building was dedicated.

Mexico, Mo., Church Prospers.

At the annual meeting June 4, the church at Mexico, Mo., W. A. Shullenberger, pastor, discovered itself at the close of one of the best balanced and most substantial year's work in its history. Every department gave evidence of unusual strength. Both Sunday-school and preaching services have been handicapped by a lack of sufficient room. Because of this a building movement is gradually crystallizing leading to the erection of a commodious annex on the double lots recently purchased north of the present building. The total budget amounted to $7,807.91. Of this amount, $2,516.32 represented the church's contributions to missions and benevolences. These included Foreign and American Living Links, the C. W. B. M. Living Link at Hazel Green, Ky., and a half scholarship to the same school from the circle. State Missions, the Honor Roll of the Ministerial Relief and eight other missionary enterprises were remembered. The Sunday-school showed an average attendance of 469.5 with average offerings of $21.77. There were 908 members of the church on the revised roll of which ninety-seven were accessions during the year. The three Endeavor societies have a membership of 131, with an average attendance of 103. The C. W. B. M. membership is 131, and that of the Mission Circle 47. Mr. Shullenberger is soon to enter the fourth year of his pastorate at Mexico.

Advocates Practical Training for Ministers.

One of the splendid features of the Michigan state convention, which was held at Saginaw, was a men's banquet. J. E. Beaton presided and a chief speaker of the evening was John H. Booth, church extension secretary. Mr. Booth advocated special training for ministers; that is, for ministers in rural communities he would have them know about agriculture, dairying, etc., and for the ministers in the cities he would have training in special social conditions. Next year's convention will be held in St. Louis, Mich., and the session for Bible-school Methods will convene at Owosso sometime next winter. The following officers were elected for next year: President, M. H. Gerrard, Battle Creek; first vice-president, T. B. Preston, Ionia; second, Dr. Dixon, secretary state board of health, Lansing; third, Robert Stewart, Woodward Avenue church, Detroit; recording secretary, George W. Knepper, Ann Arbor; treasurer, Perry Brown, Barrytown; superintendent, R. L. Handley, Kalamazoo; trustees, A. E. Jennings, Ann Arbor, Dr. Dixon and I. L. Cornell, Traverse City. The ministers adopted a report from the country pastors' commission, which has been investigating conditions for several years, that rural churches be made social and educational centers; that pastors be furnished with several acres of ground; attend agricultural college several weeks in the year, and be given permanent charges, and that they read a list of books.

Miss Annette Newcomer Popular Convention Speaker.

One of the most interesting of the many good things at the Oklahoma state convention, which was held at Guthrie early this month, was the work of Miss Annette Newcomer. Miss Newcomer is a resident of Des Moines, and holds the position of state secretary and organizer of the Christian Women's Board of Missions in Iowa. She has recently made a tour of the world, visiting and studying mission fields. Her work at the Oklahoma convention was heartily appreciated. Other leading workers on the program were: D. A. Wickizer and wife of Tulsa, W. W. Pares, of Anadarko, J. L. Ramsey, of Shawnee, T. C. Perry, of Cherokee, Clay T. Runyon and wife of Kingfisher, H. T. Laughbaum of Oklahoma City, J. T. Towery, of Holdenville, James M. Miller, of Vinita, A. G. Smith, of Enid, Mrs. Mary Lucy, of Perry, Mrs. W. T. Dorris, of Blackwell. About three hundred congregations were represented at the convention.

East End, Pittsburg, Aggressive.

In the less than four years' pastorate of John Ray Ewers in East End church, Pittsburgh, Pa., as many have been added as were upon the list when he came. Fully 278 persons have entered the fellowship of the church during this period. The church has just purchased the property adjoining the present location, a lot 50x140, which will be used for a parish house. A large brick house will be utilized for the Sunday-school and for young people. June 8 was observed as Childrens' day. The offering surpassed any other year, being $427. The total for church and Sunday-school will be about $1,100, possibly $1,200. Thirteen responded to the invitation, all confessions but two. Ninety-three have entered the church this year.

New Building for Third, Indianapolis.

Work has begun on the construction of the complete building for Third Church, Indianapolis. The first story was built several years ago. The work is to proceed in such a manner as not to interfere with the regular services in the assembly room. The completed structure will cost about $85,000 and will be one of the most commodious churches in the city. The building will be seventy-seven feet wide by 135 feet long, and the main auditorium will have a seating capacity of 1,200. In addition there will be the assembly room on the first floor, which will be used for Sunday-school and entertainments, with a seating capacity of six hundred. The style of architecture will be classic, and the severely plain style will prevail both inside and out. The building will be of a rough face gray brick trimmed in Bedford stone. T. W. Grafton is pastor of the church, which now has a membership of about nine hundred. Mr. Grafton came to the Third Church from Kansas City about a year ago, and all departments of the work are prospering. It is the purpose to have the church completed in time for dedication by November. The architect declares the new church will provide more conveniences and show a more practical utilization of all available space than any church in Indiana. Many ideas have been obtained from modern churches in other communities.

An Event at Huntington, Ind.

"Never before in the history of Huntington, Ind., has there been such a demonstration of friendship and appreciation as that tendered Mr. and Mrs. Elmer Ward Cole of the Central Christian Church Sunday morning, when the entire church congregation, with city officials, members of the Commercial Association and many of the pastor's friends joined in an hour of rejoicing in the celebration of the fifth anniversary of Rev. Cole's pastorate in Huntington." Thus comments a local paper on the reception given Mr. Cole and wife June 1, their ministry in that place covering the past five years. When Mr. Cole came to Huntington there was an indebtedness of $22,000 on the church property. Today there is only one-fourth of that indebtedness standing. In the evening of the anniversary day Mr. Cole preached on "An Appreciation of the Christian Ministry."

Hiram college has recently received $25,000 from the estate of Mrs. Letta E. Cooley of Cleveland, Ohio, widow of Lathrop Cooley, who for many years previous to his death has been a trustee of the College and to whom the college was previously indebted for its nine-inch telescope, and for other benefactions. This gift will go to the establishment of a chair in the department of Christian Literature and Service. Two thousand dollars has also been received from the estate of Solomon Metzler of Wauseon, Ohio, a Hiram student of the earlier days as part payment of a bequest of $3,000. In addition to the benefactions above mentioned, endowment subscriptions amounting to over $50,000 and conditioned on securing a total of $100,000 have been received during the past few months.

A bequest of $1,000 has just been paid to the Board of Ministerial Relief, Indianapolis, Ind., from the estate of Mrs. Lathrop Cooley of Ohio. There is especial significance in the fact that Sister Cooley was both the wife of a preacher and the mother of one. This thousand dollars will be known as "The Lathrop Cooley Fund" and the interest on it used perpetually to pension aged ministers and missionaries and their widows, together with the $50,000 already devoted to the same end and the larger sums that are yet to come. This bequest also aids materially toward reaching the $30,000 of offerings that will secure an extra gift of $6,000.

A number of good things have been brightening the pathway of First Church, Joplin, Mo. The baccalaureate service for the graduating class of the high school was conducted in the First Church. The annual memorial of the Odd Fellows was also held there. The offering for children's day was nearly twice the apportionment. Additions are being made to the church at regular services. A fine workers' conference has just been held in which a definite work has been outlined for each remaining month of 1913, a revival being included, for October. G. J. Chapman ministers in this field.

M. L. Pontius closed his first year as pastor of Central Church, Peoria, Ill., Sunday, June 1. During the year he has preached 94 sermons, made 33 special addresses, officiated at 18 funerals and 35 weddings, made 400 pastoral calls, and received 76 persons into the church. The church building burned Jan. 7, of this year and this has greatly handicapped the congregation in their efforts. Plans are being consummated, however, which will provide a new $50,000 church building.

The friends both of Prof. Colman Bancroft and of Hiram College will rejoice to learn that after nearly forty years of service as a teacher, thirty-six of which have been spent as teacher and professor of mathematics in Hiram, he has received special recognition from the Carnegie Foundation for the advancement of teaching in the form of a retiring allowance available at the end of the present academic year.

J. T. McKissick, corresponding secretary for Tennessee, reports 726 additions to the mission churches in that part of the southland, since the beginning of this missionary year—October 1. Of this number, one-half were by baptism, and the other half by letter or statement. He further reports a church organized in Blountville with fifty members.

At Taylor, Texas, where W. H. Bagby ministers, a beautiful manse of seven rooms and modern in all its appointments, is in process of erection, and the thorough overhauling of the church building and the installation of a pipe organ are assured improvements. The cash to pay for the parsonage is in bank.

At a recent meeting of the Board of Trustees of Hiram College, Ben D. Phillips of Butler, Pennsylvania, was elected trustee to fill the unexpired term of his father, the late Thos. W. Phillips of New Castle, Pennsylvania. The newly elected trustee is a former student and loyal friend and supporter of Hiram.

T. A. Lindenmeyer, Bridgeport, Ill., delivered both the memorial address and high school baccalaureate sermon in that town. Mr. Lindenmeyer reports an average attendance of 233 in the Sunday-school there. He also states that he has permission to hold a meeting for some needy field, in July or August.

The congregation at Vernon, Texas, where L. H. Humphries ministers, is rejoicing over the dedication of their $15,000 building, at the hands of I. N. McCash. William Pearn, evangelist, writes in hearty praise of the forces there. W. L. Harris and Frank Shaul followed the dedication with a meeting.

"The finest church building in Kansas" will be dedicated in July at Atchison, where Jesse Bader ministers. G. L. Snively will have charge of the services. On June 29, Mr. Snively will dedicate the new church at Ardmore, Okla., assisted by M. S. Johnson, the minister there.

An interesting feature of the annual report of First Church, Cedar Rapids, is the report of the Junior Church, which has a membership of seventy. The treasurer's report showed cash on hand for the new building, $45,288.62. Walter M. White ministers at Cedar Rapids.

Preparations are being made to observe "Christian Endeavor Day for Home Missions" June 29. Programs and literature may be had free of charge on application to the office of the American Christian Missionary Society, 108 Carew Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Vernon Stauffer has passed the examination for doctor's degree at Columbia University. He is now engaged upon his dissertation, the subject of which is "Illuminism in America." Mr. Stauffer's new work at Hiram College begins in September.

At the installation of the new officers at First Church, Bloomington, Edgar D. Jones, minister, was installed as educational director, Charles P. Hanson as superintendent. The Sunday-school force in this school includes nearly seventy-five.

George Darsie, Central, Terre Haute, Ind. reports his school thoroughly graded, with an enrolment of 1,141, and with a force of seventy officers and teachers. This school is now in a contest with Anderson, Ind.

Cecil J. Sharp, pastor of the Calumet Avenue church, Hammond, Ind., is being boomed by his friends for mayor of that town, because of a speech he made in which he won the association of commerce to consideration of a deep sewer system.

George W. Knepper, pastor of the church at Ann Arbor, will sail for Europe the latter part of this month. He will spend most of the summer in England with possibly a short trip to the continent.

There has just come to hand an announcement of the marriage of Henry W. Hunter, minister at Higginsville, Mo., to Miss Viola Anna Bruening, of that town.

Fourth Church, St. Louis, enjoyed a "home-coming" June 13, all St. Louis churches co-operating. L. A. Chapman ministers at the Fourth.

C. R. Scoville dedicated the new building of First Church, Lynn, Mass., June 15. Thos. Penn Ullom ministers to this work.

O. W. Winter preached the union memorial sermon this year at Villisca, Ia. The sermon was published in full by local papers.

Prof. O. H. Prichart, of Bethany, Neb., has been elected president of Eureka College, to succeed C. E. Underwood, resigned.

An institute for ministers and Sunday-school workers will be held in Haskell Hall, University of Chicago, June 22-27.

J. W. Street, Mackinaw, Ill., gave the address at the dedication of the new building at Twin Grove, Ill.

"Fathers' Day" was celebrated at Third Church, Indianapolis, early this month.

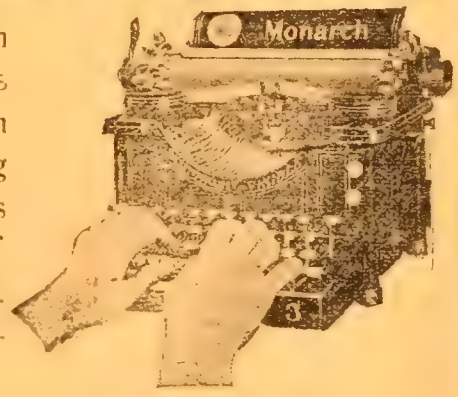
Monarch Light Touch



THE extremely light action of the Monarch Typewriter endears it to all operators who use it. The typist who takes pride in her position finds great satisfaction in being able to turn out as much work, and as good work, per hour, toward the end of the working day as during the morning. Other conditions being the same, she can always do this on a Monarch. There is for users of this machine. The mechanical reason for the Monarch light touch is found in the action of the Monarch type bar, an exclusive and patented feature which gives this remarkably light touch.

We would remind the business man that Monarch light touch means more work and better work, because less physical strength is expended by the operator. Therefore, cost per folio is reduced making the Monarch a business economy.

Ministerial Relief Gains

The month of May, 1913, shows an increase of more than $1,400 over the month of May, 1912. This is due mainly to a bequest of $1,000 from the Cooley estate, previously reported. The receipts for the year to May 31, is more than $10,000 of an increase over the same period of last year.

We trust there is not now a church or individual contributor on our list for any past year that will fail us a liberal offering this year. We have reached the one dollar a day support to our most needy pensioners and we cannot afford to do otherwise than to continue this support. This, however, will require a continued increase in our receipts. If your offering has not yet been sent in, please look after the matter and do not fail. Board of Ministerial Relief.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truiy artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monumen. to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

BEECHER THE MAN

BY CHARLES M. MORTON

BUSINESS MEN AND RELIGION

CHICAGO

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointed by churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

Give the Graded Lessons a Chance

Have the Graded lessons come to stay? Most say yes. A few say no. Some few say they are still an experiment. The vast majority of Sunday School workers, including the experts, say they are here to stay, and they declare that they are already a marked success.

Let those who have not found the graded system to be a success in their schools, examine the literature they are using, and note whether they were hastily prepared by some publisher to meet the sudden demand for such material, or whether they are the careful work of some expert internationally recognized as a master in his line. We guarantee that very few will find them to be of the latter sort.

What is the standing of Frances W. Danielson, Josephine L. Baldwin, Milton S. Littlefield, Marion Thomas and Josiah Strong? They are some of the editors of the BETHANY GRADED SERIES.

The Battle of Armageddon

When Theodore Roosevelt spoke at the time of the Chicago convention he said, "We stand at Armageddon, and we battle for the Lord." It was a stirring declaration, and with it he ended what, judged from any possible point of view, whether favor or disfavor, must be regarded as an epoch-making speech. Men make such allusions to Scripture when they are in earnest. Whether they are right or not, they turn to the Scripture if they think they are right, or if they want to seem to be right. The Bible is the quarry from which the metaphors of earnest life are blasted in moments of high earnestness.

What is Armageddon? It is the equivalent of the Old Testament Megiddo, where Josiah fought with Pharaoh-Necho. There were other battles on the same field. Many great wars of antiquity were represented on that terrible field. I rode over it on horseback ten years ago. The soil is fertile with blood that has been shed there from the time of the Crusades back beyond the twilight of the world. But the battle that broke the heart of the prophets of Israel was that in which the good king Josiah fell. He was so brave, so loyal, so upright, so zealous; only a later generation had heart to admit that in his zeal he fought unwisely; that in his assurance that he was fighting for God he fell a needless martyr. The sun of the nation touched its horizon when he fell; and the night did not long delay.

That terrible battle, in which the liberties of Jerusalem were lost, took strong hold on the imagination of all subsequent generations. When John on Patmos had his vision of the world and its destiny, he saw the conflict of all good and all evil in one death grapple on the historic field of Megiddo. He saw the future legions drawn as on the field at the foot of the Galilean hills; but in that battle he saw, through much strife and bloodshed, the triumph of the cause in which Josiah fell—the final conquest of the Christ.

When shall the great battle of Armageddon be fought? It is now beginning. It is to last, perhaps, ages.

Think of the conflict in the midst of which now we struggle. In all the battles fought on the ancient field of Megiddo, the capacity of any one man for conflict was perhaps two dozen arrows, which he could shoot a hundred yards. It was so when Josiah fought; it was so sixteen hundred years later when the Crusaders fought there. But now each man's capacity is perhaps three hundred rounds of ammunition which his modern rifle will carry a mile with deadly precision. One man's power may even be represented by the effectiveness of a shell of fifteen hundred pounds, hurled a distance of a dozen miles.

Consider the inventive genius of man, applied to ends both bad and good. Here is a physician at his microscope giving his life to discover the germ of typhoid fever, or a cure for cancer, in order that some malady which has been a terror to the human race for thousands of years may cease. And here is another man working just as hard over some new high explosive that will sink a ship or destroy a town.

The Panama Canal is nearly finished. The seven seas will soon be one. Shall it be for peace or war? A few days ago I attended an aviation meet, and in the air above my head men mounted up on wings like eagles; shall this be for the good of the world or to drop down lyddite shells on those they would destroy?

Far out at sea we receive the message of friends in other ships out of sight below the horizon. What miracles fill the modern world! Some of them we use to save life; others to destroy life.

The world never had in it so many men and women as just now. At first we are tempted to say the world never saw a time when one person counted for so little. But the truth is, there never was a time when one person could do so much good or evil as just now. In the battles of the past, one man counted for a possible dozen arrows; now each man counts for all the wonderful energy, physical and moral, of this miraculous age.

"We stand at Armageddon," said Theodore Roosevelt. The world stands there. And the battle is to be fought to a finish. It is for every man to be sure he is on the side of right. All real interests of human life must ultimately be expressed in moral terms. All real good is ultimately moral good. All battles at last are moral battles. There are no issues but moral issues.

"We are living, we are dwelling, in a grand, an awful time;
In an age on ages telling, to be living is sublime."

Take courage, brother. Our Captain leads us to victory. But be sure your armor is bright and your sword sharp, and your heart courageous. For the battle will be long and terrible. Listen! Hear the trumpet call! The battle of the ages is on. "We stand at Armageddon, and we battle for the Lord."

The Peace of God

The foundation of the peace of God is truth and justice. Jesus came not to send peace but a sword because men were living in error and sin. It is the false prophet who cries, "Peace, peace," when the people are corrupt and base in their lives. The advocate of peace must therefore be first of all interested in right living. If he overlooks great wrongs, he has no place among those who are asking the world to turn away from the arts of war and to give its attention wholly to science, art, industry, commerce, and the religion of good will.

The war within the soul comes to an end only as the desires are recognized and assigned their proper places. The lover of pleasure does violence to the intellectual and social nature of man. He harnesses his intelligence to his passions and appetites and he tries to satisfy his social impulses without assuming the obligations that belong to a social being. The ascetic has denied to many natural impulses a rightful place in a good life. Thinking to end the war within himself, he has by self-torture added to the fierceness of the conflict. Peace within does not come by suppression of desires but by their organization.

When we are troubled and vexed, the way of peace may be that of self-examination. Are we living so as to satisfy ourselves? If we are not, whose is the fault? We often blame our surroundings for the disorder of our experience when in fact we are introducing disorder into the surroundings. The fussy school teacher has troublesome pupils always. The badly organized preacher is never able to find a congregation that has any religion and that will deny itself for the sake of the gospel. Selfish people always have bad neighbors. The busybody is out reforming the world when he ought to be reforming himself.

International peace is a subject that is receiving much attention from philanthropists in all civilized countries. The waste of war is being emphasized strongly. Students of economics are pointing out the cost of war in money. Believers in the gospel of Christ are asking the nations to consider the human cost. The injustice of war is forcing itself upon the attention of men. The ambition of princes and military leaders, greed for money, religious fanaticism, a sense of honor inherited from savages, these are causes of wars. It is in the interest of peace that the world should know why wars originate. Patriotism is made to cover a multitude of the meanest sins that disgrace humanity.

Wars in the industrial world are probably more significant than wars between nations. The police power of government is often used to suppress the violence of industrial conflicts. But no intelligent man thinks the duty of the government is done when violence is suppressed by force. He knows that there is a cause somewhere for the lack of sympathy between laborers and their employers. He therefore counsels justice, not submission. He inquires whether the fault lies with individuals or with the industrial system. God is not on the side of any men who are in the wrong. They may have custom and precedent on their side, but if they are wrong, they are wrong, and there will be no peace until justice is done. Compromise will never secure lasting peace.

The cause of peace will be promoted by the establishment of courts in which the majority of men have confidence. If neighbors disagree respecting property rights, they do not have to try their case in the court of force; they can appeal to courts established by all the people for the adjustment of difficulties. Disagreements between employers and employees are easily settled if there is a tribunal in which both have confidence. International disputes require international courts. We still have armies and navies because we do not have faith in each other. We doubt that courts can be established that will render impartial decisions between nation and nation. Perhaps our suspicion is well founded. If it is, it is not a ground for abandoning the advocacy of peace for all the world. It simply means that we must go farther back and reform our lives so that we shall be worthy of confidence and be capable of believing in the integrity of men of strange customs whose interests may seem to be in conflict with ours. The religion of good will must be preached throughout the whole world. Having learned to respect all men, we shall be prepared to live in peace with them. The ambassador of Christ has ever been an apostle of peace. [Midweek Service, July 2. Ps. 119:165; Isa. 32:17; John 14:27.] S. J.

Advertisers as Preachers

An old colored preacher chose as his text, "There are many adversaries." Being a man of limited education he read it, "There are many advertisers." From that text he preached an admirable sermon, showing how many ways there are of advertising the Gospel; how many people there are who advertise it; and how each of his hearers ought to be an advertiser of the Gospel.

This text and the use of it come forcibly to mind as one hears of the presence in the pulpits of Baltimore of a large group of advertising men.

Fifty thousand and more Baltimoreans of every calling, from clergymen, lawyers, physicians, and business men to mechanics, laborers and factory operatives, heard a score of "live wires" of the national advertising men's convention flash logic, philosophy, business sense, and publicity methods in trade and religion from the pulpits of the leading Presbyterian, Methodist, Lutheran, and Baptist churches of Baltimore today. It was the great Sunday feature opening of the 1913 convention.

That altruism in business has supplanted the old greed of the merchant, and that the doctrine of "caveat emptor" has actually given place to a modern spirit of service was the theme of the lay sermon delivered by Herbert N. Casson of New York in Brantley Baptist Church.

"The spirit of American business is not the spirit of greed," said Mr. Casson. "It is not the spirit of mere money mastery. It is not the brute instinct by which men learn only to have and to hold. Actually, altruism has become the most practical thing in the world. Actually, business men are finding out that it pays best to do right and to deal justly with their neighbors.

"Stores are actually taking the side of the customer as against themselves. They are thinking first of the welfare of the buyer. They are offering money back to buyers who are dissatisfied.

"It always has been true that co-operation is better than competition. It always has been true that love is better than hate. It has always been true that honesty is the best policy; but it is only in recent times that the men of the business world have realized these moral truths."

Wilbur D. Nesbit, the Chicago humorist, occupied the pulpit of the fashionable Mount Vernon Place Methodist Church and talked to millionaires and others.

"My text," said Mr. Nesbit, "is 'In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread.'

"There may be a few people in the world—in fact, there are a good many—who eat their bread in the sweat of other faces. But they only die some day. Great tombs may hold their dust and magniloquent eulogies may be pronounced over them, but mankind shall forget them. Only men who put their names on time's pay roll are counted in the statistics of eternity.

"The expression of the universal inspiration is work—just plain, common, dirt digging, nail pounding, floor scrubbing, ink slinging, house building, city making, country helping, world bettering work.

"We like to fancy that civilization came as the result of the divine spark which fired the souls of men and drove them on and on out of the mental darkness of savagery and into the light of order and law. But it wasn't that at all. It was work—common, unfashionable work.

"Civilization in some of its fundamentals is the ability to do the hard work in an easier way. The occasion which fills the pulpits of Baltimore with laymen today has to do with a form of work which is at least one of the greatest constructive forces in American life—advertising.

"The only theory I have concerning advertising is that to write convincing advertisements you must believe in the article advertised and in the concern advertising it. And that isn't a theory—it really is a principle."

S. Grosvenor Dawe, chief of the editorial division of the chamber of commerce of the United States, found the Bible admonition for the modern conception of advertising in Zachariah: "Speak ye every man the truth to his neighbor." Mr. Dawe spoke from this text at Christ Unitarian Church.

"It is in the interchange of commodities that we see the need for speaking the truth," he said. "We also must realize that the great average man desires to speak the truth, yet the liar has made it hard for the truthful man to win.

"The remedy rests in a union of truthful men, so that the way of the liar may be hard. It is out of some such thought as this that the modern demand for an ethical standard in advertising has arisen."

The old colored brother's sermon was true. There are many advertisers: and some very true Christian men are foremost in this new crusade for honest advertising.

Our Efficient Post Office Department

Many years ago a Wisconsin postmaster found in his letter box a letter bearing on the envelope the four letters "H. G., N. Y." He judged that the "N. Y." meant New York, and sent the letter thither. The New York postoffice promptly delivered it at the office of the Tribune. "H. G., N. Y." meant "Horace Greeley, New York."

Greeley opened the envelope, and found therein a dollar bill and nothing else. Then he looked at the post-mark, and said: "That is from my old friend, John Doe, of Oshkosh, credit his subscription one year." Sure enough the subscription book showed that a remittance was due, and the transaction was completed, at a distance of a thousand miles, with only four letters of the alphabet.

Most notable of such incidents is one told of Mark Twain.

One evening Brander Matthews and Francis Wilson were dining together at the Players' Club of New York, when the former made the suggestion that they write a letter to Mark Twain. "But," objected Mr. Wilson, "we don't know where he is," for it was at a time when Mr. Clemens was away traveling somewhere. "Oh," said Professor Matthews, "that does not make any difference. It is sure to find him. I think he is some place in Europe, so we had better put on a five cent stamp." So the two sat down and composed a letter which they addressed to

Mark Twain
God Knows Where.

Within three weeks they received a reply from Mr. Clemens which said briefly, "He did."

The Minimum Wage

Never were men so sensitive about the matter of adequate compensation to workers as they are today. A while ago we were talking about "a living wage." Now we are talking about "a minimum wage." These two phrases do not mean the same thing. At first thought it might seem as if a minimum wage was something less than a living wage. But a minimum wage is not a mere subsistence wage. It means more than sufficient compensation to secure shelter, food, fuel and clothing. It means enough compensation to enable the worker and those dependent upon him to live in health and comfort, and it allows a small expenditure for those things that we call insurance, education and amusement. The English Trades Unionists were opposed to the Trade Boards Bill which aimed to insure for them a living wage, because the phrase living wage meant to them just enough money to pay for the bare cost of subsistence. The phrase "to maintain the worker in health" that appears in many of the minimum wage laws means that the worker shall be supplied with enough compensation to enable him to live an active, free, intelligent, wholesome and enjoyable life. In brief, the purpose of the minimum wage is to secure for workers American standards of living.

In a Strange Town

What do you do with your spare time in a strange town? There are many tests of character unconsciously applied, and this is one of them. When you are at home your habits are largely formed by the customs of your neighbors and by their expectation of what you will do. But when you are away from home, and staying in a hotel with no one to molest you or make you explain, that is the time you show the sort of man you really are.

When you are away from home, which do you inquire for, the prayer-meeting or the picture-show? What sort of entertainment appeals to you when you have no reputation to sustain?

The impression largely obtains that the character of a town is determined by the people who inhabit it. This is true in part only. Very largely the character of a town is determined by the people who visit it.

Investigations of the vice commission of the several cities indicate that a very large proportion of those who keep the places of vice in operation are men from out of town who behave away from home as they would be ashamed to act at home. Some of the disreputable peep-shows of Paris are not bona-fide examples of the sins they are supposed to display, but are shams manufactured for, and supported by, the tourists who observe them and pay for the questionable privilege.

There are towns on the map that have been radically changed, some for better, and others sadly for worse, by the people who visit them.

What do you do with your spare time in a strange town?

The Christian World

Christian Women in China

The Continent has the following item of interest: Mrs. T. N. Thompson of Tsining, Shantung, writes of a recent convention of women. "The districts represented were parts of four counties, Christians coming as far as sixty miles in some cases, on barrows and afoot. The leaders were Chinese. Women spoke from the platform without hesitancy, speaking with eloquence and spirit, putting us Americans in the background as speakers. Miss Ho, a woman in the early twenties, addressed the audience of women and men on the subject, 'Duty of Women in the New Republic.' The subject of foot binding was introduced by a Chinese woman of influence of the Methodist mission. Some eighty women promised willingly to unbind or to influence others to unbind. This subject is just beginning to take hold of the women in our district. The subject of family prayers showed a fairly representative number present as already observing this duty. The subjects were all especially applicable to the Chinese women—such as 'Equal Authority of Husband and Wife,' 'Partiality Between Sons and Daughters,' 'The Duty of Sending Girls to School,' 'The Duty and Power of Women in Prayer,' 'Wearing Apparel,' 'Cleanliness and Order of the Home, as taught in our mission schools;' 'Dedication of Children to the Lord,' 'Guarding of Speech Against Gossip and Tattling.' The subject of 'Marriage Engagements' was most thoroughly canvassed by the leader and caused many women to laugh at their old heathen custom of engaging their children in babyhood. It is safe to say that the next generation of Christians in this district will not countenance any such heathen practices."

Two Seminaries Merge

The Seminary of the South, formerly Cumberland Presbyterian property, and Lane Seminary have merged finally. Behind the merger is a dramatic story, given by The Continent (Chicago, Presbyterian) of June 12, as follows: There is more than one happy augury in the final signing and sealing of the compact that consolidates the Seminary of the South with Lane Seminary at Cincinnati. As is needless to tell those familiar with the history of the case, the Seminary of the South represented by inheritance Lebanon Seminary in Tennessee, which was the theological training school of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church prior to reunion with the mother body of Presbyterianism. When, however, the unfortunate outcome of unfortunate anti-union litigation in Tennessee made it impossible to continue the Lebanon school at its original location, a provisional alliance with Lane strengthened the Cincinnati faculty with two experienced teachers from Lebanon—Professors Stephens and Farr.

What has just now happened is the transformation of that provisional alliance into organic consolidation, expressed by the inauguration of Doctor Stephens in the church history chair and Doctor Farr in the New Testament chair of Lane. This formal act of merger indeed changes nothing from the practical conditions of the last three years, but it is a happy certificate of the success attending an experiment in co-operation between one of the oldest American institutions of Calvinistic theology and the teaching spirit of what once was rated to be an anti-Calvinistic Church. The perfect growing into one of these two forces at Cincinnati is a tangible parable of the complete and seamless reunion achieved in the church at large between Presbyterianism and Cumberland Presbyterianism. There is no difference left in any remotest corner of consciousness save in those reverently closed halls which memory dictates to history.

The Kennedy Millions Cause Trouble

Several years ago John S. Kennedy, an obscure millionaire, died in New York City. Little was known about him, and yet he left a fortune of about $60,000,000. Much of this vast wealth was left to various agencies of the Presbyterian church, U. S. A. Nearly $3,000,000 was left to the Home Board of the church. The board voted to invest it all as permanent endowment in Manhattan real estate. Soon enough the question arose whether it would not be wise to lend some of this money to Presbyterian congregations about to build church edifices and in need of such capital. In 1912, the General Assembly decided to experiment with $500,000 of the Kennedy legacy, by transferring said amount from the endowment fund to create a building loan fund. But Doctor D. J. McMillan, secretary of the Church Erection Board, strenuously opposed the Assembly's order, on the ground that it was legally impossible to make such a transfer, but at the time it was thought that Doctor McMillan and a minority of eight members of the board who stood with him had acquiesced. The Continent (Chicago) gives the following account of Doctor McMillan's dramatic resignation at the recent Atlanta assembly: But instead they came to Assembly with an opinion from rival lawyers setting forth that the proposed diversion of Kennedy funds would be an outright unlawful breach of trust.

In order to confirm the transfer of the half million in question it was necessary for two-thirds of the Assembly to vote in favor of it. Ordinarily the count of a standing vote would have been thought sufficient. With this formidable opposition looming up, backed by legal opinion, the utmost care was requisite, so on this account a roll call was ordered—a resort perhaps without precedent in Presbyterian legislation. And the result was most impressive—yeas 619, nays fifty-four. A hundred or more commissioners refused to vote.

Dr. McMillan was dazed, for he had believed he had the church with him. But he immediately realized that such an outcome amounted to a vote of "want of confidence" in his administration and gallantly accepting the tacit rule of representative government, he acknowledged the defeat by offering his resignation. The Assembly referred the resignation to the board, which will accept it at the first meeting it holds in its New York office. Probably some members on the minority will also resign. It has been long since the church has seen such a dramatic overthrow in its official circles.

A Bishop That Is a Bishop

Bishop C. H. Brent of the Protestant Episcopal Church, is the great missionary bishop of the Philippine Islands. Imagine the consternation of the newspaper reporters, when they saw this church dignatary arrive on June 1, in the steerage of the Cunard liner, Caronia. Yes, the bishop came with 1,441 steerage passengers, principally British and Scandinavian workmen. On landing, he told the reporters that it was his desire to fraternize with the multitude, which he said was the stuff that the States were made of—the ancestors of the Americans to be. He said he had not gone among the home-seekers because he wanted to investigate steerage conditions, but wanted to be among workingmen. He had enjoyed the companionship of the immigrants immensely, and found that, as far as the attitude of his fellow passengers was concerned, they did not seem to care any more for a bishop than they might for a burglar. "If the people I met in the steerage of the Caronia," said the bishop, "are typical of those who have been coming here recently, the country has reason to feel proud of them. I never saw a cleaner and more intelligent lot of men and women." The bishop praised the quarters and the food of the steerage, and said many commendatory things regarding the courtesy of his fellow-voyagers. The route traveled by the bishop from the Philippines to London was the Trans-Siberian Railway. Being questioned as to the suggestion that the Japanese might take the Philippine Islands, he smiled. At present he said, the islands were under better government than ever before, and the people were quite content. Bishop Brent comes for the general convention.

Big Benefaction to Seminary

The Christian Intelligencer reports as follows: The announcement has been made that Rutgers College and the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, New Jersey, are each to receive two hundred thousand dollars from the estate of Mrs. Mary Bogert Wessells Pell, who recently died at her home on Riverside Drive, New York City. She was descended from many of the oldest families of New Netherland.

Her father, Wessells Wessells, was born in New York City, but on his marriage to Miss Zabriskie, of Bergen County, New Jersey, moved to Paramus, where their only daughter, Mary, was born. She early united with our Church in Paramus during the pastorate of the Rev. E. T. Corwin, D. D., who has continued during all these years the spiritual adviser of the family. It is perhaps due to his suggestions that so large a sum has found its way to the institutions of the Reformed Dutch Church. She married Captain John H. Pell, of Passaic, New Jersey, a member of the New York bar. She had no children and Captain Pell died a few years ago, leaving her with no relatives nearer than cousins. She has lived a very quiet life, with a few devoted friends.

The larger part of her estate is represented by the famous Benedict Corner at Courtlandt street and Broadway, where her Bogert ancestor lived in the simplicity of little old New York before the Revolutionary War. By the sale of this property under will, the corner goes out of the family for the first time in two hundred years. The "unearned increment" by which these institutions are to profit, has greatly enhanced the value since the simpler days of the forefathers.

The Sun Setting on a Glorious Life

The sun is gorgeously setting upon the life of Professor J. W. Beardslee, D. D., LL. D., of the Chair of Biblical Languages, Literature and Exegesis in the Western Theological Seminary (Holland, Mich.), of the Reformed Church of America. Within six months past, Professor Beardslee has celebrated three glorious anniversaries, his seventy-fifth year, his fiftieth year as a minister of Christ, and his twenty-fifth year as a professor in the seminary. It is not given to most men to celebrate a diamond, a golden and a silver jubilee within six months. Among other joys that have come to this ripened saint of God is the joy of seeing his own son, Professor J. W. Beardslee, Jr., succeed him as professor. By vote of a General Synod he was made professor emeritus.

In gratitude for the blessings of God, Professor Beardslee, in May, presented to the Western Theological Seminary, a memorial library building, a very substantial affair, which will prove a blessing to countless generations of theological students. In presenting the library, Professor Beardslee said in part: "I have but a few words to say in transferring the library building to the General Synod of our Reformed Church. One year ago I asked permission to build it as an expression of my love for the church in whose ministry I have been privileged to serve for fifty years, and of my desire to increase the efficiency of this seminary to which I have given the best years of my life. Here it stands, no longer mine but given to God and His Church to help in winning the world to Christ our King and Redeemer. I have put into it the best material I could obtain. I have planned it for a special purpose, to make more pleasant and more inspiring for the students of our seminary the critical study of the Bible, whose inspired teachings must ever be the light and guide of every soul that would find God and everlasting life. Other libraries are dedicated to science and art and literature, to foster and guide the intellect in its search after truth; this library is designed to furnish help for those who devote their whole life to dig down to the roots and understand those profound spiritual truths which the soul of man must know to some extent if he would come into the full inheritance of life and peace for which His Maker designed him. This thought inspired my desire to erect this building, and I can truly say that I am glad God has given me the privilege of placing it here, rather than keeping the money it has cost in my own pocket."

It is rare when a professor presents, at his own expense, a fully completed and equipped library of this character. Generous laymen frequently do this, but not generally a theological professor. We are glad to give this space to so gracious an act in a servant of Christ in the evening of his life, while the sun is going down.

English Congregationalists Raise Funds

The Congregationalists of England and Wales have shown their strength in the face of their peculiar disabilities. As is well known, the established Church of England is supported by state taxes. Dissenters or non-conformists have to strike out for themselves. And yet the sturdy descendants of the old Independents or Congregationalists have just completed raising a Central Fund of $1,250,000, which insures an income of not less than $500 per annum for all accredited Congregational ministers.

The capital is being invested in trustee securities, yielding about 4 per cent. Eventually an annual income of £10,000 ($50,000) a year will accrue from the capital. This income will be administered by a central committee whose grants in and of locally raised stipends will be made on the recommendations of the County Congregational Unions. This will act as a check upon the peril that attaches to endowments, of stipends being paid without a full*quid pro quo* in service.

"Bible Study Club"

For several weeks past the editor of this department has been getcertain literature that looks like a newspaper periodical, called "Bible Study Club." It took less than sixty seconds to detect that it was another "Pastor Russell" disguise. A certain "V. Noble" is "secretary" of the "Club," which offers to supply Bible study literature for nothing or for nominal cost. Should you drop into the office that "V. Noble" tells you to write to, you would see this legend on the door "Pastor Russell Lecture Bureau." There is absolutely no doubt whatever that "Pastor Russell" is still playing his old deceitful game of deluding the public. We, with others, do not question his right to send literature to whomsoever he pleases, but we decidedly question the morality of the Russell characteristic of sending said literature under one dummy arrangement or another. Just why "Pastor Russell" has consistently followed out a policy of misleading the public in order to warn the public of the winding up of the world's history in 1914, is beyond our comprehension.

President Wilson Again Appoints a Preacher

President Wilson is showing his godly training and strong Christian sense of fitness by appointing prominent Christians to high office. The other day he announced that he had offered the post of American Minister to the Netherlands at the Hague to Doctor Henry Van Dyke. He could not have made a more ideal offer. Doctor Van Dyke is of Dutch descent, a minister of great power, a poet and literary man of finest discrimination. His distinctions in the world of literature and his intimate acquaintance with European literature and life, make him more than acceptable to the Holland government. This appointment reflects President Wilson in a beautiful light. President Wilson is determined to put men of character, intelligence and ability in the diplomatic service; millionaires and politicians need not apply, apparently.

From Near and Far

Mr. Harry W. Laidlaw, organizer for the Inter-Collegiate Socialist Society in his report recently made public, indicates that socialism is spreading among our American colleges. He states that chapters of this society are now to be found in forty-nine American colleges. This is an increase of twenty since January 1. There are also five graduate groups. Some of the colleges which have growing chapters, named by Mr. Laidlaw are Yale, Brown, Harvard, Princeton, Amherst, Williams, Swarthmore, Alleghany, Marietta, Pennsylvania, Cornell, Columbia, Michigan, Oberlin, Ohio State, Ohio Wesleyan. Samuel A. Eliot, Jr., grandson of ex-President Eliot of Harvard, is the president of the Harvard Society, and John Temple Graves, Jr., is the secretary of the Princeton chapter.

The International Woman Suffrage Alliance during its recent session adopted a resolution declaring in favor of a policy of general political neutrality, but of militant antagonism toward parties which oppose woman suffrage. It was agreed to raise $12,500 a year to prosecute the movement. Several donations for the current year were announced. These include $500 from Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, the president of the alliance; $500 from the Duchess of Marlborough, formerly Miss Consuelo Vanderbilt; $500 from Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont and $250 from the Countess Heller. The various societies represented guaranteed the remainder of the $12,500.

Earl Grey, the British foreign minister, whose position is becoming more and more commanding, declared that if the American ambassador came with proposals of making more remote any appeal to blind force, "he will find in this country and in the British government a ready response." Earl Grey amplified this by adding that the United States is most fortunately placed in taking such an initiative. Peace proposals from such a quarter, he asserted, come free from suspicion of being inspired by any feeling of pusillanimity or any national necessity.

Mothers' pension laws have been passed by fourteen states, eleven having acted this year. Seven of them are suffrage states—Illinois, California, Colorado, Oregon, Utah, Idaho and Washington. The others are Iowa, Nebraska, Ohio, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, Missouri has authorized Kansas City to adopt the system, and other states are trying it in a limited way in some cities. When a woman is left destitute it has been found better in every respect for the state to board the mother and children together.

There is reported large increase in the number of students of theology in German universities. For a time there was notable declension, and it was interpreted as indicating a diminished interest and faith among the people. The seventeen Protestant universities during the past winter were attended by 3,386 theological students as compared with 2,825 the winter of a year ago, showing an increase of nearly one-fifth. Berlin University has the largest number, 555; Leipzig is next, with 466, and Tübingen next with 336.

Dr. Harry F. Ward, secretary of the Methodist federation of social service, has accepted the position of professor of social service in the school of theology of Boston University. For ten years he was head of settlements and institutional churches in Chicago in the Polish quarter and stockyards district. As chairman of the committee on labor conditions of the City Club of Chicago, he organized the industrial committee of the churches of Chicago, and was made chairman of the committee on church and labor.

Telegrams condemning Senate Bill 501, known as the Gorman Bill, which is being opposed on the ground that it will make saloon licenses vested property rights, were sent to Speaker McKinley and Governor Dunne by officials of the Illinois Christian Endeavor Union and the Chicago Church Federation Council. The Christian Endeavorers hint in their message that the liquor interests have contributed liberally to a fund to push the bill through the general assembly.

Rev. Gottfried Hahn, just ordained a minister in the German Evangelical church, at St. Louis, has departed for Purulia, India, where hundreds of lepers are cared for and taught to look upon Christianity as their hope. He followed in the footsteps of eleven others of his family, including his aged mother, who passed their lives in the same colony, serving year after year in ever constant danger of contracting the disease. Like Father Damien, the martyr, Mr. Hahn regarded his course merely as his duty.

Thirty missionaries speaking twenty-four languages have been employed during the fiscal year by the Chicago Tract Society to work among the foreign born in Chicago, according to a report just published by the society. One thousand one hundred and seventy public meetings were held, 72,770 homes were visited, 13,695,440 pages of literature printed in thirty-seven languages were distributed and $20,376.27 was spent during the year.

Emperor William of Germany ascended the throne twenty-five years ago last Sunday week, and his quarter of a century anniversary has been celebrated in Berlin and throughout the German empire with elaborate ceremonies and genuine enthusiasm. The festivities opened with a review of the imperial military volunteer automobile corps in Berlin, followed by a jubilee equestrian tourney held in the stadium erected for the next Olympic games.

In Chicago there are 750 theaters and seventy-six other sbuilding. One-half of the amusement houses are used exclusively for the display of moving pictures and have a seating capacity of 300 or less, but the average capacity is 400 or a total of 300,000. There will be an added seating capacity of 300,000 when the new theaters are completed in the fall. It is estimated that the daily attendance is nine hundred thousand.

President Harry Pratt Judson, of the University of Chicago, announced at the Eighty-seventh Convocation on June 10, the gift of $300,000 for the erection of a building to be used as a social center and gymnasium for the women of the University. The donor is Mr. La Verne Noyes, a prominent citizen of Chicago. The building is to be a memorial to his deceased wife and will be known as the Ida Noyes Hall.

Chicago leads all other cities in the volume of parcel post business. According to a statement issued at the Postoffice Department the amount of parcel post stamp sales aggregated $1,254,469 and the number of parcels handled at Chicago from Jan. 1 to March 31, was greater than at any other postoffice. New York during the same period had sales aggregating $818,138.

The city council of Kansas City, Mo., has adopted a pennant for that city, to be used on all occasions where a flag is appropriate. The pennant will be of light navy blue. The shield of the city is to be in the left-hand corner, with the words "Kansas City, a good place to live," in white letters.

Mayor Harrison has issued a proclamation setting aside June 26 as children's day. This year the newsboys of the city are being given an outing at Washington Park under the auspices of the Volunteers of America.

That missionaries in India are buying girls by the thousands at 10 cents apiece in order to save them from immoral lives in the temples, was the statement made in the St. Louis Y. W. C. A. last week by Sherwood Eddy, Y. M. C. A. secretary of Asia.

At a missionary conference in Canton, China, under the presidency of John R. Mott, resolutions were adopted urging the international conference to be held in Shanghai to take steps looking to the union of all Protestant denominations in China.

Dr. Juichi Soyeda, a Cambridge graduate and former vice-minister of finance of Japan, has arrived in this country, bringing a message of patience to his countrymen here who are angered by California's discriminatory land law.

Funds aggregating more than a quarter of a million dollars are bequeathed to various activities of the Presbyterian church by the will of J. Milton Colton, a former Philadelphia banker. The estate is valued at $1,500,000.

Women from the Chicago Commons and the Woman's City Club went with inspectors of the city department of health last week and peered into half a score of insanitary basement bakeries on the West Side, Chicago.

A childless couple, said to have been the wealthiest in Switzerland, committed suicide the other day "because of sheer lack of interest in life." The husband was only forty-one years of age, and the wife still younger.

A $200,000 Y. M. C. A. building for colored men, made possible by Julius Rosenwald's initial donation of $25,000 and which is the largest and handsomest structure of its kind in the world, was dedicated in Chicago recently.

In New York City the board of estimate and apportionment has approved a transfer of $25,000 from the funds of the street cleaning department for the purpose of a sane Fourth of July observance.

When Colonel Roosevelt goes to the Argentine Republic on a lecture trip in the fall he may extend it to a trip around the world, which will keep him away from America for two years.

Secretary Bryan has joined the Washington, D. C., "alley cleaning brigade." He spoke at a meeting of the committee of one hundred recently on the subject of slum elimination.

Porto Rican children are more apt than American children in their studies, according to Miss Grace E. Josselyn, a missionary, who spoke in Evanston, Ill., recently.

Jacob J. Hauser, of Mobile County, Alabama, owned a blind tiger. Although worth $75,000 he must go on the country road chain gang. So says the Alabama supreme court.

The Newberry Library

By W. N. C. Carlton, Librarian

The Newberry Library in Chicago is a free library of reference, established in 1887, and maintained by a moiety of the estate of Walter Loomis Newberry, a pioneer merchant of Chicago who died in 1868. The trustees of the estate, Mr. E. W. Blatchford and Mr. W. H. Bradley, made a partition according to the terms of the will in 1886 and the early part of 1887, and the organization and formation of the library began in the latter year under their direction.

During the first six years of its history the library was housed in temporary quarters, but in 1894 it took possession of the beautiful and imposing building which had been erected for it on the site of the historic Ogden house, the only house in the fire district which escaped destruction in the great fire of 1871. The style of architecture of the building is Spanish Romanesque and the material is Connecticut granite. The partition walls are of brick and tile and the floors of red English tile. Every effort has been made to render the structure as fire-proof as possible, since it contains one of the most valuable book collections in the United States.

The original plans of the Trustees contemplated the gathering of a general collection of reference and source books on all subjects. Later, however, a coöperative arrangement was entered into with other Chicago libraries under which the field of knowledge was roughly divided between them, and a policy of non-duplication of expensive books was adopted. The principal fields of knowledge and branches of learning which fall within the province of The Newberry Library under this arrangement are: Bibliography and the History of Printing, Religion and Theology, Philosophy, Psychology and Ethics, History, Political Science, Geography, Biography, Language, Literature, and (in part) the Fine Arts. In each of these divisions the Library possesses innumerable treasures, books of interest and value for all time and which are always available for inspection by any reader, student, or visitor. The formalities required in the use of the collections are only such as are absolutely necessary for the proper care and administration of the books and the convenience of the many who use them.

In the literature of religion and theology the Newberry collection is especially rich. Besides endeavoring to acquire the great and best books of the past in these subjects, it purchases currently the best of the religious literature of the present day. It gathers the printed editions of the sacred books of all forms of serious and reverent religious faiths in the original languages in which they were written and in the best English translations. The same is true of the writings of the foremost religious thinkers of all times and countries. The collection of editions of our English Bible and the history of its printed text is a notable one. Included in it are two beautiful copies of the first issues of the first edition of the Authorized Version published in 1611, commonly called also the King James version. There are fine illumined manuscript Latin Bibles, written during the centuries prior to the invention of printing. The beauty of the writing and the decorations in these volumes render them works of art as well as monuments of the loving care and devotion of the medieval scribe. There are also editions of the whole or parts of the Scriptures in over one hundred different languages, so that it is possible for every "stranger within our gates" to see and read the Holy Bible in his native tongue, whether that be Chinese, Japanese, Hebrew, Arabic, Sanskrit, Polish, Russian, or even the Tagalog of the Philippine Islands. The oldest manuscript in the collection is a copy of the Gospels in Greek, written at some time in the twelfth century of our era. An interesting feature which is most useful in assisting readers and students is the extensive Sermon Index, compiled and kept up to date by the library assistants. Using as a heading the biblical text on which the sermon has been preached, hundreds of sermons are carefully indexed by author and title in chronological order. The inquirer has but to name the text in which he is interested and reference to this index will show him at a glance just what sermons the library has on this text, when and by whom they were preached, and the exact volume and page of the printed work in which they occur.

The historical collections, already important, are growing more so with each year's increase. They are naturally strongest at present in books relating to the history of America and Great Britain. The history of the European countries, however, is by no means neglected, and the scholar and general reader in this field will find much to reward his studies. An excellent selection of works devoted to American family and local history is very popular and much used, attracting visitors from all sections of the country. Special indexes are maintained for the better study and utilization of this genealogical material which is constantly being investigated with fruitful results to those concerned.

The most valuable individual collection in the library is that presented by Mr. Edward E. Ayer in 1910. It is a noble gathering of the most precious historical material, both printed and manuscript, relating to the early history of our country and more especially dealing with the Indians of North America. No general description can adequately set forth its importance to historical scholars. It may safely be said, however, that no historian of any phase of the history of the aborigines of North America can make his book an authoritative one without having consulted the Ayer Collection in the Newberry Library. Amongst its treasures are superb copies of the Bible translated into the Algonquin Indian language by the missionary John Eliot, and published in 1661 and 1663. The books in this collection embrace the entire history, character, manners, customs, arts and crafts, myths, religions, and languages of the North American Indians. Included also are Indian drawings on magney paper and skins, portraits of Indians, engravings, photographs, watercolors, etc., illustrating Indian life, costume, and manners. The history of the Hawaiian and the Philippine Islands is similarly treated in this unique gathering of historical material.

In the department of literature a rich collection relating to English and American literature is gradually being built up. At present this division is the largest in the Literature group. It numbers many treasures in the way of original editions, and chief among these are the copies of the famous four Folio Editions of Shakespeare which were printed respectively in the years 1623, 1632, 1664, and 1685. Another rarity of great interest is the first edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, printed in 1667.

The literatures of Greece and Rome, France, Italy, Spain, and Germany, are well represented by collections embracing the writings of the classic authors of each of these countries.

Of related importance to the literary collection is the great linguistic library of Prince Louis Lucien Bonaparte, which was acquired in June 1901. This is a collection of over 16,000 volumes and pamphlets, gathered as data for the study of the nature and history of man as developed through speech. It comprises printed specimens of every known language possessing even the most rudimentary literature, and has proved of the greatest usefulness to the university professors and students of language in Chicago and vicinity who make good use of this collection.

The music division of the library is notably rich in both useful and unusual works necessary for the student or practitioner of music. The first lists of books recommended for it were drawn up by Mr. George P. Upton, the well known authority on this subject. In 1889 the musical library of Count Pio Resse, of Florence, Italy, was acquired by purchase. It included a very large number of rare and famous titles, and was particularly rich in works written by Italian authors on the theory and history of music. In 1891 the Hubert P. Main collection of English and American Psalmody was acquired. A notable benefaction to this department was the library of Theodore Thomas which was given by his family. It comprises the printed works on music which he used, a set of his concert programs complete from the beginning of his musical career in 1855; and the music scores used by him in conducting, with the manuscript changes or directions made by him in their original text.

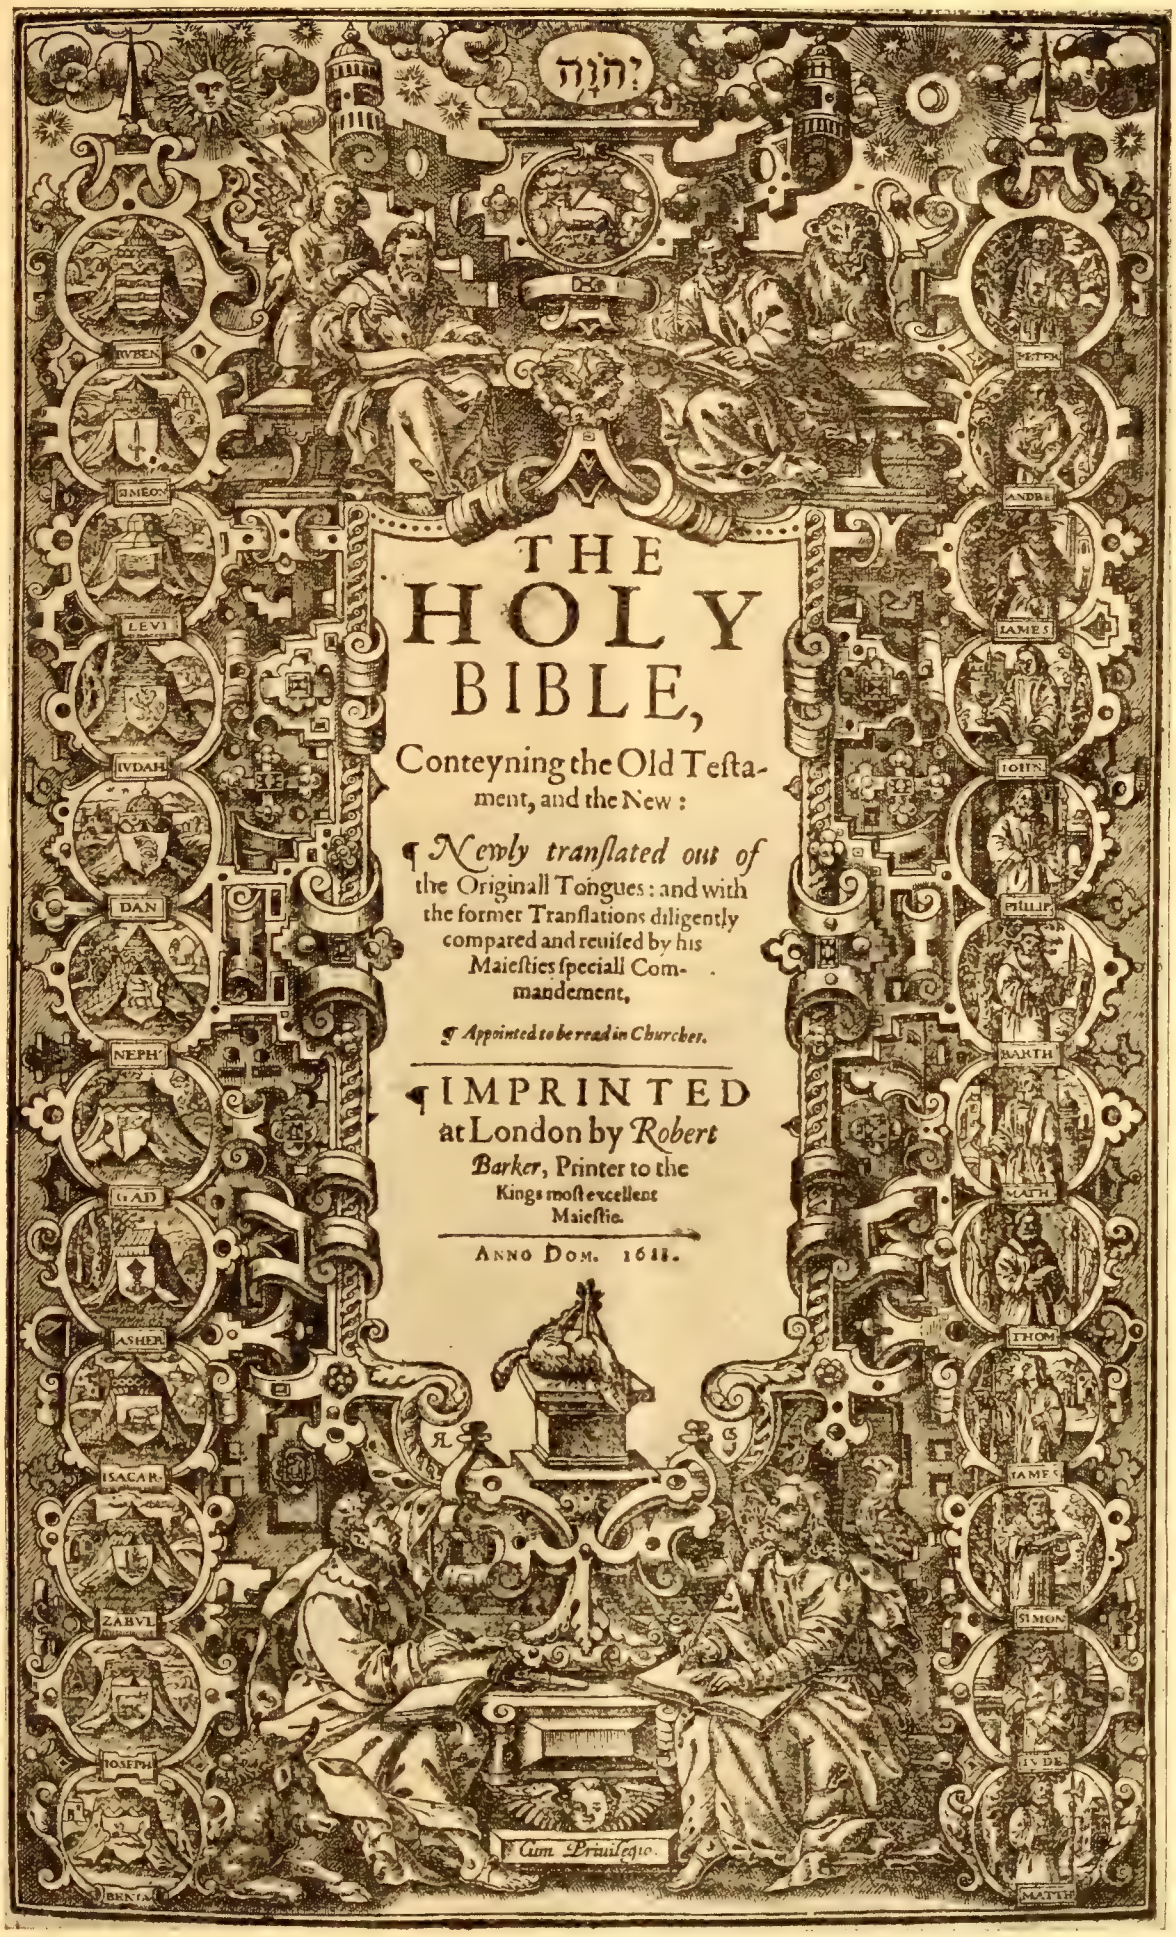
In the Exhibition Room, a display of rare or beautiful books, manuscripts, or prints may always be seen by visitors. Sometimes the exhibit is made up of specimens of early printed books, showing the development and progress of the art from its introduction into Europe in the fifteenth century through the first fifty years of its history. Again, a display of the rich bindings reveals scores of books magnificently bound by the most famous binders of the last three hundred years. At the present moment the exhibition being shown is made up of illuminated manuscripts, European, Chinese, Japanese, Hebrew, Arabic, Turkish, etc., many of them being of extraordinary interest both textually and artistically. By these means the rich contents of the institution are constantly being brought to the attention of the public in an educational way.

The library welcomes all classes of readers from the most learned investigator to the boy or girl seeking information for school use. The needs and requests of the individual readers are infinitely varied, but every effort is made to supply the information desired. The majority of the books are, naturally, mainly intended for the use of professional scholars, but much material can be readily adapted to the requirements of pupils and untrained readers when necessary. The library is performing a noble educational function in the community and both through its books and its personal service is contributing much toward the higher intellectual and spiritual life of the great city.

The question is frequently asked, What is the difference between the Newberry Library and the Public Library? In spite of the fact that every effort has been made officially to make the difference clear there are still many persons to whom it is not known. To make clear the facts is the purpose of the following paragraph.

The Public Library is the institution whose chief and principal aim is to provide the books most generally wanted by and best suited to the needs of the great mass of people and to allow them to use these books in their own homes, schools, workshops, parks, and even playgrounds. The community, through the Public Library, accepts the duty of supplying this social need as a part of its general educational machinery for its social welfare. It can readily be seen that, with such a purpose, the desires and needs of the majority are the first consideration of the public library; the requirements of the scholarly or intellectually advanced minority of the community necessarily take a subordinate place. Now the principal object of great reference libraries like the John Crerar Library and the Newberry Library is almost the opposite of that of the municipal institution. Private munificence has through them, made it possible to provide especially for the intellectual and educational needs of the minority. This minority is their first consideration in matter of book selection and book acquisition, and they strive to serve its interests in every possible way save that of permitting the books home use. One reason for this exception is that upon the reference libraries there also falls the responsibility of gathering and preserving for future generations the permanently valuable portion of contemporary book production. This object would be largely defeated if the rare or expensive books so gathered were subjected to the wear and tear and loss due to circulation outside these libraries. This policy of not generally circulating valuable literary and historical material is sanctioned and approved by experience throughout the civilized world.

Thus, through its public library and its great reference libraries, Chicago is fortunately able to minister to the various intellectual needs of all its citizens.



THE ORIGINAL EDITION OF THE KING JAMES BIBLE.

I will govern my life and my thoughts, as if the whole were to see the one and read the other; for what does it signify, to make anything a secret to my neighbor, when to God, (who is the searcher of our hearts) all our privacies are open.—Seneca.

Henry Ward Beecher---the Man

By Rev. Charles M. Morton

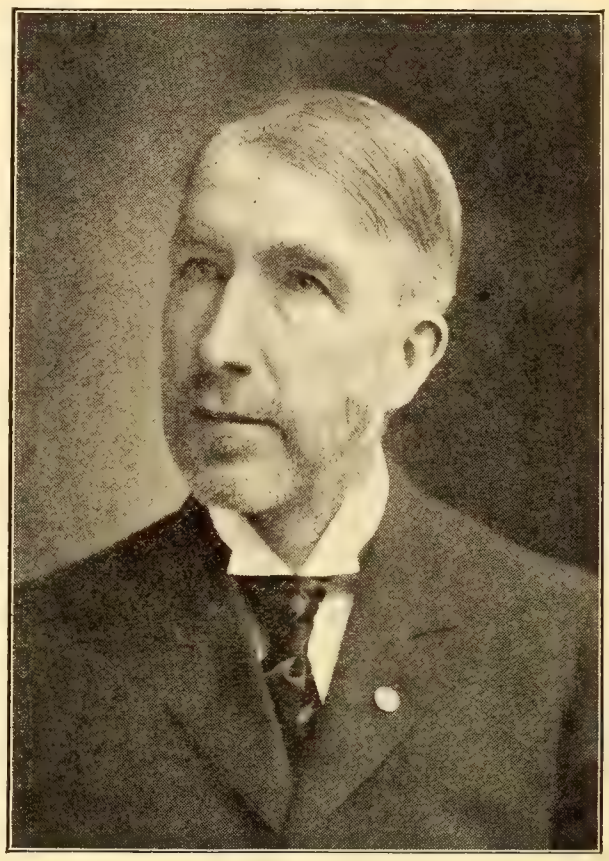
I came to Chicago with an empty sleeve just before the Civil War ended and found employment as office boy with the Young Men's Christian Association. A little later I began to try to live a Christian life. Every now and then a fine looking, well dressed man would call at the rooms to see Mr. D. L. Moody, and I soon learned that his name was William Reynolds, that he was the head of a Peoria packing house and that he was one of the most active Christian men in Illinois. He always gave kind attention to the office boy. Little by little the directors promoted me until I became the superintendent of the Association and Mr. Reynolds noticed my promotions in his hearty, enthusiastic manner. By this time I had come to love him with all my heart.

One day, in the winter of 1869, Mr. Reynolds came to me and said, "Morton, the Third National Sunday-school Convention will be held in Newark, New Jersey, on April 28 and I want you to go." I said it would hardly be possible for me to get away. "I will get permission for you to leave your work. You must let me pay all your expenses. Be sure to be ready. I will call for you on the 26th." When he came, I was ready. It was a grand trip East for me and in New York we stayed together at the Fifth Avenue Hotel.

The third National Sunday school Convention was most interesting and instructive. The prominent Sunday-school men and women of the United States came together, with Hon. George H. Stuart of Philadelphia, in the chair. For three days and evenings audiences crowded the First Baptist church of Newark, to hear Henry Ward Beecher, Dr. John Hall, the venerable Stephen H. Tyng, Dr. J. H. Vincent, Edward Eggleston, Ralph Wells, B. F. Jacobs, H. Thane Miller and many others. Very few of those grand men are with us today.

On the evening of the first day of the convention, after a thrilling address by H. Thane Miller, of Cincinnati, President Stuart handed a piece of white paper to Edward Eggleston and Mr. Eggleston brought it to me. It read, "I will call you to speak after the next hymn." I shook my head very positively at Mr. Stuart, but he only smiled, and soon I was standing amazed and bewildered before the vast audience. I had strength enough to tell something of what the Lord had done for my soul.

William Reynolds was sitting in his chair, studying the ceiling of the auditorium, with a mischievous twinkle in his eye, and he did not seem to know that his poor traveling companion was in distress. In a little while the truth came out and I knew why I had been called suddenly to speak to the Convention. Henry Ward Beecher and some of his church officers were there looking for a lay pastor to care for their beautiful Plymouth Bethel, which had just been dedicated, and William Reynolds had made a suggestion.



Rev. Charles M. Morton.

On the second day of the Convention, Mr. Beecher spoke on "The Mission Work of the Sunday-school," and he told of his new enterprise for the people of his city. Perhaps Mr. Beecher never made a more effective address than this. Its influence on the Sunday-school work of the country was very great. He said, "If they won't bite at the bait I put on in the pulpit, I will bait with something else. I will try other means, until I have exhausted all means, to reach every class, every family and every heart. For I never see the worst outcast soul but I think of the tear-drop and the blood-drop of Jesus Christ, and there is that in the single thought of Christ that turns all contempt, all indignation, all reproach instantly to pity and to sorrow, and for His sake I will go down to the poorest, and lowest and meanest man that lives and wait patiently on him."

A few weeks later, Mr. George A. Bell, the superintendent of the Plymouth Bethel came to Chicago and asked me to be the pastor of the Plymouth Bethel. The invitation was gratefully accepted and early in August, 1869, my wife and I went to live in Brooklyn. Mr. Beecher was in the White Mountains, waiting for his hay fever to go away. I had never spoken to him and was almost dreading my first meeting with the great man. When he returned home in October, he came to me, put his hand on my shoulder and said, "Charles Morton, you were very kind to leave your friends in the West and come to us." Then he said he and his people would stand by me in every way. He never failed me during the eight years we spent together. When I apologized one day for taking so much of his time, he said, "Charles, when you have come a thousand times more, then come again!"

One morning in the winter of 1870 he called on me and laid a one hundred dollar bill on my desk, saying, "I fear you are finding many poor people this cold weather." I thanked him and asked if he would be interested to know how the money had been used, if I would make a record for him. He said he would, and when the money was spent I laid before him a long list of the unfortunate ones and their difficulties. He gave much time to the list and finally asked how many of the people had been really benefited. When I replied that I believed more than half of his money had accomplished good, he said, "That is more than could reasonably be expected."

A year or two later, on Sunday morning, after having given his notices, he said to his congregation, "If the minister of Plymouth Bethel comes to you in behalf of the very poor, I ask you to do for him what you would do for me." My poor people were always well cared for after that morning. The business men of Plymouth church, with H. B. Claflin, E. H. Van Ingen and Stephen V. White at their head, kept me well supplied with every needed thing.

Mr. Beecher told me something of his new theology, and I was much interested, never having received a theological education. "The old way," he said, "was to bring the soul into the kingdom by the pain method. That was my father's way." Mr. Beecher hoped the new theology would save the soul without painful conviction of sin.

Mr. Beecher said that he was always surprised when he learned that he had preached a great sermon. Perhaps his Friday evening lectures were among the most helpful of his addresses. Sitting in his big chair at the crowded prayer service he wonderfully cheered and encouraged the people who carried heavy weights in life.

Much of the time Mr. Beecher was like a happy boy. One Monday morning he met on the street a Fulton market business man who said, "Henry Ward, your old gun was pretty well loaded last night." "I saw your bald head shining under the gallery," said Mr. Beecher.

Horace Greeley had a farm at Chappaqua and Mr. Beecher had one at Peekskill. Each prided himself on his knowledge of farming and each was a little jealous in a good natured way of the other. Some one told Mr. Beecher that Greeley was raising fine rutabagas. "Yes," was the reply, "but they cost him nine dollars apiece."

Going through the hall of his house one afternoon I heard earnest voices in the rear parlor. When I came in, Mr. Beecher said, smiling, "Charles Morton, this woman won't give me enough money to buy a pair of pants." "No," said the good wife. "Indeed, I won't." She was the treasurer of the family and he had overdrawn his monthly allowance. From time to time, Mr. Beecher suffered from black depression, lasting now and then for days. When I called on him one Saturday evening, his eyes were dull and his color was dark. He asked, "What do you do when you cannot fix your mind on any text and when you cannot even pray?" I replied that I often found it difficult to select a text, but could always pray a little. "Be thankful to God," he said, "for I have two services tomorrow and can get no light and comfort for either of them." It was generally supposed that his sermons came to him without much care and study.

Of Mr. Beecher as a manager of finance I have a little knowledge, and am almost sure that he would not have been an eminent banker. He told me of a man who called on him late one afternoon for the "loan" of ten dollars, saying that he had had nothing to eat for ever so long. "Charles, there was not a dollar in the house and the banks were closed. I asked him to stay and have a meal with me. He declined rather gruffly, saying that if I would not trust him with the money he did not want my food. Then I made a check for the ten dollars and told him to take it to the ticket taker at the Fulton Ferry, who had accommodated me in that way." Of course the check was honored and Mr. Beecher never saw or heard of the man again.

In the summer of 1875 or 1876, a young minister who was a friend of mine, wrote me from the Adirondacks, saying that his new church building in the country was ready to be dedicated, and that the congregation was worried about the large church debt. He thought Mr. Beecher was the only man who could help them out and he wondered if I would try to persuade him to undertake the journey and the work. It was almost time for Mr. Beecher's vacation and for his annual hay fever, and I had little hope that he would consent to go. To my surprise, he said at once, "You say he is a young preacher and that his people are not rich. I am reminded of my first pastorate in Indiana where a well-to-do man gave me his clothes before they were badly worn. Of course, Charles, we must go." When we had reached the place of meeting the sight was well worth seeing. The farmers and their families, from far and near, crowded the auditorium. Mr. Beecher preached from Matthew 22:35-40, and the farmers listened eagerly while he told in their own language of the commandments of Love. He likened the two tables of stone on which the ten commandments were written to two great pans of milk and the greatest commandment of all to the strong hand of the dairy man which sweeps away the rich cream from the surface of the contents of the pans, leaving nothing but skim milk. Perhaps a more delighted congregation never came together. I do not remember the financial results of the service, but I never heard more about their church debt. Mr. Beecher believed that when a man has fallen in love with the character of the Son of God he will find himself trying to imitate Him.

We went together from the Adirondacks to the Thousand Islands. The travel on the railway was light and for a long time we were the only occupants of the car. Although I had been an officer in his church for years he had never spoken to me at any length about the great church trial. I was astonished when he suddenly opened the subject and poured out his grief and indignation. Then he arose and paced up and down the length of the car, like a caged lion. For a few minutes, the agony of the great preacher was terrible.

One evening there came into my office a bright looking young man with a letter from Mr. Beecher, which said, "This young man is the son of one of my old church officers in Indianapolis. He is studying for the ministry and called on me to get my advice about his coming work. I send him to you, thinking that as you are more nearly of his age you may understand him better. My own impression is that he is more interested in preaching sermons than in saving souls." The last sentence of the little letter struck me like a six pound shot. Unconsciously, I had been for several months making the same mistake and I began to reform at once.

Early in my work at the Plymouth Bethel, as I visited from house to house, I was surprised at the large number of husbands and fathers who never went to church. Our Sunday-school room was well filled with boys, girls and young people. There came to me the idea of a Bible class for married men to be held in our large reading room and to have its own officers. For several weeks I kept the thought of such a class before a number of the non-church going men and finally appointed a Sunday for the beginning. Only seven were present but all seemed pleased and interested. Little by little the class grew until the reading room was crowded. After awhile men came to me and asked if they might join the class although unmarried. "Well, you expect to be married some time, do you not?" "Yes, sir." "Then we will take you into membership." I noticed that when death came to the homes of hard working men, a few of them had money enough to pay the funeral expenses and we planned a Burial Fund for the members of the class, each member to pay one dollar when a member died. A few passed away every year and much help was given. The men were proud and happy to feel that they had a part in it. The class bought a great silk banner, beautifully inscribed, and every New Year's day we marched to Mr. Beecher's home to greet him.

In the second series of his Lectures on Preaching, given at Yale College, pages 188-90, Mr. Beecher honored our class with royal mention:

"The Bible class of married men is a phenomenon. The gentleman who teaches it was a soldier who lost his arm in the service. He is singularly well fitted for this work. He has a large number of poor, plain but excellent men, but they were not all such. He has gathered up from the street the degraded, the literally lost. At first his class was small—nine or ten; but he worked with them faithfully, and set them to gathering up their abandoned companions. Among those brought in were drunkards, the most degraded and despicable. There were men who by their careless habits had wasted their earnings and disbanded their families. Some of them were living in crime. And yet, last January about a hundred of these men came up in a body and called upon me, and a better looking set of men I never beheld. They were clothed and in their right mind. We received at one time some forty into the church, out of this body of men; and one of the most affecting things I know of is that this class, two or three times a year, gives an entertainment to all the parents of the children in Plymouth Bethel. They give it themselves. We furnish the room and lights, but they order a supper, with cake, confections, ice cream, tea and coffee. They have music and also some amusement—tableaux, or something of the kind. They invite all the fathers and mothers of the children of the Plymouth Bethel. Each of the members of the Bible class wears his little rosette to show he is a manager, and each one is expected to be on the floor to entertain the guests, and to see that every one is happy, talked to, and fed. To see these hundred and fifty men—one of whom said in relating his experience, "I know all about rum—I have made it, I have sold it and I have drunk it to the very uttermost,"—to see such men in the house of God, entertainers, calling in the parents of the wandering children, is enough to make tears come from anybody's eyes. I don't believe you ever could have reached those men except by taking the Word of God in your hand, calling them together in a place where they felt at home, and then going step by step with them through the truth, teaching them Sunday after Sunday, and while you are doing this, calling out their sympathies, making them work for each other,—for that is what this class is still doing, one here and one there, raising contributions by which they are able to sustain men and get on their feet till they can get work again. There have been literary hundreds of families regathered."

The memory of Henry Ward Beecher is beautiful. His heart was great and his mind was wonderful. He spoke to scholar, farmer, business man and laborer in their own language. He was the warm friend of rich and poor, white and black, and the people of every nation. He was loyal to the Heavenly Father. Without doubt the severe mental suffering of his last years shortened his valuable life.

Business Men and Religion

Some Findings of a Toledo Preacher

A Toledo clergyman recently sent a list of one hundred and twenty questions to the most prominent business men of the city, requesting permission to enter the very citadel of their minds and souls for their deepest and most honest thoughts about religious problems. The replies came back with frankness, promptness and earnestness, showing not only that men who popularly are supposed to be engrossed in materialistic things are thinking about religion, but also their readiness to express themselves.

The conservators of orthodoxy might hesitate to go to business men for theology, taking the position of Dr. Pankhurst of New York, who, when a reporter came to interview him about certain statements Columbia University students had been making about the Deity, said that he was more concerned as to what God thought about Columbia University students than what Columbia University students thought about God.

However, in looking for the practical effect of the oceans of sermons, it is well to pause and scrutinize what the Toledo clergyman got from the business men.

Belief in God General.

First, they were practically unanimous in expressing the belief that there is a God. As to his nature, opinions varied from that of "a force manifesting itself in everything, and most highly in man," to that of "Our Father."

As to the purpose of human existence, some had found no satisfactory answer; others believed in a divine aim not wholly apparent to human minds. Still others thought we are here simply to live, beget and die, like the birds. Others looked upon existence as "the inevitable result of natural law." A thoughtful Michigan manufacturer defined man as "a germ of divinity operating under laws of limitation." Some believed that man is here in preparation for a future life.

To the question, "Is man morally responsible to God, and will God punish evasions of responsibility?" some replied affirmatively and many others in the negative, setting forth hereditary tendencies and faulty environment as excuses.

As to immortality there was great perplexity. A few feared that death ends all; others believed in the sort of immortality embodied in the solidarity of the race; others thought that the bad die, while the good live on; others that life here and beyond is progressive.

As to whether God guards and guides human life, many of these business men had seen so much of the hard side of things as to question the probability, though nearly all were willing to welcome the comforting idea of providential oversight, provided it could be reconciled with things as they seem to be.

Churches are Indorsed.

The greatest surprise came in answer to the question, "What good is the church in the world?" Not one unkind word or weak indorsement of the church was received. Following are expressions from the answers:

"The church stands first in the world's institutions for the good of mankind in every relation of life." "The church is the foundation of civilization; without it degeneration would inevitably follow." "It creates and keeps alive high ideals," "It emphasizes the spiritual against the material." "It keeps us close to God."

A Page of Human Interest

JOSEPHUS DANIELS, EPIGRAMMATIST.

Josephus Daniels, the fifth Secretary of the Navy from North Carolina (and the first man to represent that state in the cabinet since the war), bids fair to become as famous for his epigrams as his ideal statesman, George E. Badger, with whose portrait, and the sword of John Paul Jones, he was photographed, shortly after he was established in the secretary's offices, whose windows open on the executive wing of the White House, across the way.

"Every man's work is born when he comes into the world," said Secretary Daniels, "and the man whose eyes are open to see this special service is the man who lives after his body returns to mother earth!

"Your truly great man," he said upon another occasion, "has a single-barrel mind, that travels a straight line. * * *

"Your truly great man does the work whereunto he is appointed, and seeks no fame through the performance of the duty that is so clear to him he feels the compulsion."

"The ideal of civilization is when moral power alone will settle all disputes among nations."

The straight line in which Secretary Daniels' mind traveled from earliest youth led to the editor's sanctum, wherein he himself was not only the editor, but the owner of the paper. The ambition was born when he was 18 years old, and he was running a small sheet which told the news of the day, very much condensed on account of lack of space and type. That was only a few years after he was captain of the Swiftfoots, and they beat the Snow Hills. by the phenomenal score of 19 to 16.

"I showed up at fielding, all right," laughed the secretary, "be cause my hands were so big the ball couldn't pass me!" —Chicago Record-Herald.

CAMPAIGNING FOR BRYAN.

The last time William Jennings Bryan was campaigning for the presidency, Colonel C. W. Bolen of Michigan, was on a train that was delayed by a washout in the southwestern part of the country. Bolen's remarkable personal resemblance to Bryan soon resulted in the circulation of a report that the Nebraskan himself was on the train. The people from the nearest town had congregated about the rear coach and were shouting lustily for Bryan. Colonel Bolen tried to persuade them that he was not Bryan, and added that he was a stanch Republican, both of which facts were true.

These announcements, however, brought forth only laughter. cheers, and renewed requests for a speech. Finally Bolen yielded, and delivered to the crowd a hot Republican speech, thinking that in this way he would do much damage to the Bryan cause.

A few weeks later Bolen got up a speaking acquaintance on the train with a man from the town in which he had made the speech.

"Our town was not much for Bryan," remarked the stranger, naming the town, "until he happened to pass through there one day, and, after pretending that he was not Bryan, made a rattling good speech from the platform of the car. As result of that accident the town has flopped over to Bryan completely."—Sunday Magazine.

THE POET'S LIFE.

"Walt Whitman wasn't as successful as the English poet, Alfred Noyes, in making both ends meet with his poetry," said a Philadelphia editor. "Walt's muse had nothing like the shallow, commonplace, commercial quality of the young Englishman's.

"I used to visit Walt Whitman in his old age in his little two-story wooden house in Mickle street, Camden. One day—it's a pleasant souvenir, this, of old-time Philadelphia—one day in December I said to him:

"'Well, Walt, how are things going this winter? Any Christmas subscriptions needed?'

"'No,' said the old poet. 'No, indeed. I'm working now. I'm working for George W. Childs. He pays me $50 a month.'

"'Good!' said I. 'And what's your job with Childs?'

"'Riding in the horse cars,' said Walt. 'I ride about the city, I talk to the drivers and conducters. I find out which of them need winter overcoats, and, guessing their size, I notify Childs, who fits them out forthwith. It's easy, pleasant work, and it saves Childs a lot of trouble over measurements and so forth.'" —Chicago Record-Herald.

JANE ADDAMS TELLS STORY.

Miss Jane Addams once said at a luncheon of the Chicago Civic club:

"We women have still much to fight for. Our battle will be long and difficult. Well, let us frankly admit it. There is nothing to be gained by such rose colored phrases as William White employed.

"William White's brother had killed a man in cold blood.

"'Well, William, how about your grother?' a visitor to the town asked him one day after the trial.

"'Well,' said William, 'they've put him in jail for a month.'

"'That's rather a light sentence for a cold-blooded murder,' said the gentleman.

"'Yes, sir,' William admitted, 'but at the month's end they're going to hang him.'"—Chicago Daily News.

AN ELASTIC TIMEPIECE.

Doctor Henry Van Dyke, some years ago, appeared before one of the Copyright hearings being conducted by the Congressional Committee on Patents in Washington. The list of speakers was a long one, and in an effort to conclude the session at a reasonably early hour the Chairman was allotting time very sparingly. Thomas Nelson Page, who had been granted ten minutes, talked so entertainingly that half an hour elapsed before his hearers took note of the flight of time. It was then Doctor Van Dyke's turn.

"How much time do you need, Doctor?" inquired the chairman, consulting his timepiece a trifle anxiously.

"Ten minutes—by Mr. Page's watch," replied Doctor Van Dyke, and amid the merriment which followed he was invited to talk at as great a length as he desired.—Lippincott's Magazine.

THE POOR PREACHER.

The preacher has a hard time. If his hair is gray, he is old. If he is a young man, he hasn't had experience. If he has eight or ten children, he has too many. If he has none, he should have and isn't setting a good example. If his wife sings in the choir, she is presuming. If she doesn't she isn't interested in her husband's work. If a preacher reads from notes he is a bore. If he speaks extemporaneously he isn't deep enough. If he stays at home in his study, he doesn't mix enough with his people. If he is seen around the streets, he ought to be home getting up a good sermon. If he calls on some very poor family, he is playing to the grand stand. If he calls at the home of the rich, he is an aristocrat. Whatever he does, someone could have told him how to do better.—Exchange.

DR. HALE AN EXTRAVAGANT EATER.

"Edward Everett Hale," said a lawyer, "was one of the guests at a millionaire's dinner.

"The millionaire was a free spender, but he wanted full credit for every dollar put out. And as the dinner progressed, he told his guests what the more expensive dishes had cost. He dwelt especially on the expense of the large and beautiful grapes, each bunch a foot long, each grape bigger than a plum. He told, down to a penny, what he had figured it out that the grapes had cost him apiece. The guests looked annoyed. They ate the expensive grapes charily. But Dr. Hale, smiling, extended his plate and said:

"'Would you mind cutting me off about $1.87 worth more, please?'"—Exchange.

LIKE OLD-FASHIONED STEAK.

Frederick Towsend Martin said, after a visit to one of the Bowery missions, in which he takes a profound interest:

"The misery we encounter in these missions saddens and at the same time edifies. If the rich would only be more charitable!

"But the very rich, the very successful are prone to look on failure and defeat with cruel, hard eyes. It is from the lowly that true charity may be expected."

With a smile and a sigh Mr. Martin added:

"Like the old-fashioned New England beefsteak, man needs a great deal of pounding before he is even a little tender to others."

FAITH ILL-DEFINED.

Discussing the lamentable fact that, according to the last census, half the American people never go to church, Canon Hughes Scott said at a dinner in Denver:

"The trouble is, perhaps, that Americans have a wrong idea about church. They think the church wants them to believe a lot of outworn dogma. This is not true.

"Yes, the trouble is that the people define faith as the little girl defined it in school.

"'Faith,' the little girl said, 'is believing what you know isn't true.'"—Chicago Record-Herald.

COMPREHENSIVE SCRIPTURE KNOWLEDGE.

A well-known Member of Congress, who was a candidate for re-election, was addressing an audience in a New England village. Warming to his subject, he paused dramatically after repeating a Biblical injunction peculiarly applicable to his line of discourse, and then exclaimed:

"But I do not need to quote Scripture to the good people of Winchester, everyone of whom, I am sure, knows his Bible thoroughly, from Genesis to Exodus!"—Lippincott's Magazine.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

Blue Ridge Conference of Y. W. C. A.

At the recent Blue Ridge Conference, one of the national secretaries spoke of the Young Woman's Christian Association as, "The least known of all the large organizations in the world;" if the rest of the world is as ignorant as was the writer of this article before she attended the conference, the charge is certainly correct.

This remarkable organization has 253,406 members in this country—54,691 are students in 660 colleges and universities, the rest are in city and county work. It employs 169 general secretaries, who are specially trained for the work—twenty-three of these (all American women) are laboring in the foreign field, in India, China, Japan and South America. Besides these general leaders, there is a small army of assistant and associate secretaries for various lines of special work, which swells the number of officers employed by the association to the amazing figure of 1,269.

It spent last year for administration $397,631. A large part of this was given by generous friends; Miss Grace H. Dodge, president of the association, contributes annually toward its support $68,000, and Miss Helen Gould (now Mrs. Shepherd), Mrs. Cyrus McCormick, and others give regularly and munificently for administrative expenses.

Besides this large amount, the city associations spent last year over four millions of dollars for their local work. Philadelphia has just completed a campaign for buildings in various parts of the city, in which $750,000 was raised. There are Young Women's Christian Association Buildings in 172 cities, and the number is constantly increasing.

It conducts ten summer conferences during the year, which cover all parts of our country. The aim of these gatherings is stated in their circulars as being for "spiritual inspiration, discussion of the interests of girls and young women, and recreational fellowship."

The Blue Ridge Association, which represents the southern branch of the movement, held its annual conference at its beautiful new home at Black Mountain, North Carolina, from June 6 to 16. The association buildings are located in the midst of a superb amphitheater, at an elevation of 2,700 feet above sea level; back of them, the mountains are 4,500 feet high, and from the veranda twenty-one peaks are visible, eight of them being more than 5,000 feet in elevation. The central building is appropriately named Robert E. Lee Hall, and its noble architecture suggests Arlington, the home of the Lees.

The association property, of nearly 1,000 acres, extends to the top of the mountain ridge, and is covered with virgin forests; through these rush rapid mountain streams, and the music of falling water is always in one's ears. The unrivaled flora of this favored region was in its full, consummate flower; the pink azalea had gone, but the yellow was in glorious bloom; great thickets of mountain laurel and rhododendron made the greenwood a veritable garden of beauty.

But more beautiful even than mountains, or forests, or flowers, or crystal streams were the 450 young girls, who had come up to this annual gathering of the young womanhood of the South. The atmosphere that breathed from them was even more tonic than the bracing mountain air—a dynamic force of high spirits, of fearless outlook on the world, coming partly from inexperience in disaster and defeat, and partly from untainted belief in the ultimate victory of all good. This intoxicating air of courage and hope was better for one, battered and disheartened by life's hard blows, to come and bathe in, than the fabled fountain of youth.

And underneath all this gayety and optimism, there was a deep current of earnestness; they came for social touch, and for recreation—but for something more! The greater part of each morning was devoted to classes in Bible and mission study, and every girl in attendance was expected to enroll in at least two of them, and do reading and study in connection with the subjects.

In the evening, there was always an inspiring meeting, sometimes in the large auditorium, to listen to some distinguished speaker from the South, sometimes a vesper service, conducted by the association members. One of these was of thrilling interest; two delegates from the World's Student Federation, which had just closed its biennial convention at Lake Mohonk in New York, arrived while the conference was in full swing, and one of the vesper services was turned over to them. As these two splendid young women told of this great gathering, of over three hundred delegates from forty different countries, and of the blessed tie that was binding the whole world into one great brotherhood and sisterhood, one could hardly overestimate the effect of such a message on these young lives. They could not fail but catch a world vision, which was bound to make life ampler and nobler, and fit them for better service for their Master, and those for whom he died.

It would indeed be a callous and skeptical heart that could fail to see in such a meeting as this signs of hope and promise. The object of the association is: "To bring young women to such a knowledge of Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour, as shall make for fulness of life and development of character, and to make the organization an effective agency for the extension of the kingdom of God among the young womanhood of the world."

Does not such a gathering, with such ideals, bring to mind the old prophetic words which foretold that in the latter days, sons and daughters should prophesy, and the Spirit of God should be poured out on his handmaidens?

The movements among the young people of the church are notable contributions toward the attainment of some of its highest ideals. The Student Volunteer Movement, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Society for Christian Endeavor, are all interdenominational (and international), and all have helped to demonstrate the practicability of Christian union. I have read somewhere, that when the idea of applying steam to ocean travel was being first urged, a body of so-called scientists met in New York City, and proved to their own satisfaction that it was impossible, because the amount of coal necessary to take a vessel across the ocean would sink it before it left the harbor—and while they were proving its impracticability, a ship steamed safely across the Atlantic! While preachers, and editors, and theologians have been splitting hairs about terms on which churches could unite, these young people's societies have proven the possibility of union—by simply uniting! They have crossed the ocean that divided Christians, while leaders were sitting on the shore, devising plans to accomplish the great deed. They have united on the idea that is growing everywhere, that the gospel of this age is the gospel of a person, not of a church, or a creed. Loyalty to Christ, likeness to Christ, service for Christ, have been the common doctrines on which they have united, and surely, His blessing has been manifest in their world wide growth, and world wide work.

The Factories

(Margaret Widdemer, in McClure's Magazine.)

I have shut my little sister in from life and light
(For a rose, for a ribbon, for a wreath across my hair),
I have made her restless feet still until the night,
Locked from sweets of summer and from wild spring air;
I who ranged the meadow-lands, free from sun to sun,
Free to sing and pull the buds and watch the far wings fly.
I have bound my little sister till her playing-time is done—
Oh, my little sister, was it I?—was it I?

I have robbed my sister of her day of maidenhood
(For a robe, for a feather, for a trinket's restless spark),
Shut from Love till dusk shall fall, how shall she know good,
How shall she pass scatheless through the sinlit dark?
I who could be innocent, I who could be gay,
I who could have love and mirth before the light went by,
I have put my sister in her mating-time away—
Sister, my young sister—was it I?—was it I?

I have robbed my sister of the lips against her breast
(For a coin, for the weaving of my children's lace and lawn),
Feet that pace beside the loom, hands that cannot rest;
How can she know motherhood, whose strength is gone?
I who took no heed of her, starved and labor-worn,
I against whose placid heart my sleepy goldheads lie,
Round my path they cry to me, little souls unborn—
God of Life—Creator! It was I! It was I!

Come out and gather posies; the very air is sweet.
Come out, with hearts of gladness, ye big and little children,
Into our Father's garden, made for our strolling feet,
The flitting butterfly,
The fragrant winds that sigh,
The tiny clouds that hover above us in the blue,
The bird's song high and clear,
Make heaven draw more near,
In everybody's garden the world once more is new!

—William Zachary Gladwin.

What a good God have we, that remembers us in our low estate, thinks upon us when we are poor and needy and is nearest to us when we need Him most! He is a sun to comfort us, a shield to protect us. He gives us grace, He gives us glory, He gives us Himself. Oh, what a good God have we!—John Mason.

Pioneer Ohio Church Celebrates.

June 14 and 15, the Austintown, O., Christian church celebrated its eighty-fifth anniversary. This church is the mother of all the Christian churches in this part of Ohio. Established in 1828 it was for years the only one of its denomination for miles around, and people walked from Girard, Mineral Ridge, Niles, and Youngstown to services there. It has always been a flourishing church. The membership is large for a country church; it numbers between 125 and 130 now, and has remained steadily above 100 ever since the beginning. At a time when there are over eight hundred abandoned country churches in Ohio, the Austintown Christian church maintains its own pastor and keeps up a strong interest in its work. Men of strong Christian character have always been associated with the Austintown church, and it is probably for this reason that it is such a strong and vigorous institution. John Henry, a remarkable character, was one of its earliest pastors. From 1882, the pastors were as follows: Alcinous Baker, 1882 to 1885; he is now living in Alliance. Rev. Cushman was pastor in 1885-86; L. H. Bush, '86-89; B. S. Dean, now professor in Hiram college, '89-90; L. Osborne, '90-91; E. V. Zollers, '91-94; J. H. Goldner, 1894-96; W. G. Voliva, the noted follower of the prophet Dowie, '96-97; D. R. Moss, '97-98; L. J. McConnell, '98-99; P. H. Wilson, 1899-1902; M. L. Jenny, '02-05; C. B. Stevens, '05-06; W. H. Thompson, '06-12; and the present pastor, A. J. Cook. The list of elders who have served during the last eighty-five years includes William Hayden, Alexander Spear, John Henry, Ira McCollum, Joshua Kyle, William Lanterman (widely known for his intimate knowledge of the Bible), Alfred Peters, L. S. Crum, George Alders, T. C. Hanna and H. K. Rayen, the last three constituting the present board of elders of the church.

Dr. Breeden's Fortuna (Cal.) Meeting.

"Dr. Harvey O. Breeden never faced more difficult conditions," writes Mrs. H. A. Hansen, of Dr. Breeden's recent meeting at Fortuna. "For nearly two weeks he faced a stone wall of indifference seldom experienced by an evangelist. It became oppressive, until, at last, realizing the crisis, all hearts and shoulders and prayers were placed beneath the burden. The walls of Jericho fell. The church was packed to the doors and the town felt the influence of a veritable Pentecost. Dr. Breeden preached the gospel with force, dignity, breadth and power to the end, and accomplished a remarkable work. The church entered upon the meeting with fear and trembling because of the strength of the opposing forces which in every way tried to make the meeting a failure. They tried to undermine the influence of the pastor, C. H. Forster, and to keep the people away from the meetings. The saloon forces and other corrupt influences of this section of California were defeated a year ago through the efforts of the church, and it was feared that the strong feeling created against the church and the pastor would hinder the success of the meeting. Among the results were eighty-three accessions in nineteen days of invitation, most of them by confession of faith and baptism. Many whole families were added to the church. The editor of one of the leading newspapers, formerly a member of the legislature and a man of great influence came with his wife and boy. Aside from these accessions the meeting created a tremendous influence so that now the forces of the Kingdom of God have gained an ascendancy in these parts that will never be taken away from them."

Ministerial Relief Name Contest Closed.

June first was the time set for the close of the contest for a name by which to designate the relation between a veteran minister and an individual or church furnishing him support, writes the Board of Ministerial Relief, Indianapolis. As soon as the matter can be adjusted announcement will be made as to the name, the winner, and the prize article to be furnished by Mrs. Barclay. This may take some time and the board asks those who have sent in names to please wait with patience the announcement. The following is the closing list of the unpublished names received up to and including June first: "Errett Shekel Fund," "Shekel Relief Fund,' "The Bearer of the Evening Light," "Guardian of the Vanguard," "Junior Guardian," "Ministerial Deferred Fellowship," "The Love in Deed Circle," "Veteran's Defense League," "Veteran's Defense," "Defender," "Defender Church," "Christian Veteran's Fellowship," "Service Link," "Secret Service Manna," "Loyalty to Christ Fund," "Loyal Loan Fund," "Loyal to Christ's," "Loyal Loving Lift," "Brother Keepers," "Volunteer Supporters," "The Veteran Ministers' Fund," "The Pioneer's Guard," "The Vanguard's Cooperative Link," "The Old Pilgrim's Protector," "Christian Friends for Jesus' Sake," "Arm in Arm, Heart to Heart," "Bearing the Old Soldier's Burdens," "Loving Link," "Benefactors," "Recognition of Service," "Comforter," "Comfort," "Comfort Fund," "Old Guard Guarantor."

C. M. Chilton Addresses Drake Graduates.

C. M. Chilton, of St. Joseph, Mo., addressed the graduates at Drake University this year, taking as his theme, "The Responsibility of the Educated Man." "Every man owes to society the best that is in him," said Dr. Chilton. "It is even more emphatic that the educated man do this for he is the one that should devote himself entirely to the public good. Society should not be left at the hands of the demagogues. The man without education is not the man to lead municipalities and states as is the case in many instances. The last few centuries has made a wonderful change in education. It has brought the universities much closer to the people of all classes so that now there is a bond of union between the church, state, government, and agriculture. This is because of the new ideals in which the university aims to develop for the highest work. The range of the educated man is now much wider and he is now making the cities, states and governments. The corrupt cities that now exist are so, because the educated men have forgotten their high mission in life and have left the burdens to the uneducated and those who are looking for gain and profit at the expense of others. Men with democratic ideals are needed to quash these few and who will take up the burdens that rightfully belong. to them. They are the ones who should exercise influence. Every educated man should become a leader."

C. M. Chilton.

Oklahoma Conention's "Working Program."

"It was rather a working program than a speech-making program," writes D. A. Wickizer, corresponding secretary, of the convention program of Oklahoma recently carried out. The following report of the year's work done by state workers is evidence of the truth of this declaration: Number of days' service, 1,083; sermons preached, 936; baptisms, 687; other accessions, 496; total, 1,183. Total amount of money raised on salaries in cash, $3,527.76; amount raised otherwise in cash and pledges, $9,662.47; total amount of money raised by state workers, $13,190.23. Report of corresponding secretary shows 209 additions under his direct work; 341 addresses given during the year; total number of communications sent out, 2,778, 1,700 of these written by the secretary himself; total number of miles traveled, 11,110; total amount of money raised and received by the secretary, $3,215.06; due yet on life memberships, $2,000, making a total of $5,215.06. Including the amount received from the C. W. B. M. the entire amount received and paid out during the year was $13,805.23. The same state workers were continued another year: D. A. Wickizer, corresponding secretary; H. S. Gilliam, Bible-school superintendent; Clay T. Runyon, president of Christian Endeavor societies. All bills paid and $70 in treasury with which to begin new year. A strong effort is being made to place an evangelist in each of the four districts of the state this year.

The convention of the churches of the fourth district of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society was held in Heyworth, Ill., June 3-4. The opening session of the C. W. B. M. interests began with an unusual attendance George R. Southgate gave a study of the whole field constituting the fourth district. John R. Golden gave proof that something worth while may be expected of the committee on Social Service appointed by the State Board of which Mr. Golden is a member. Superintendent George W. Brown presented interestingly the subject of the rural church. Other speakers were L. O. Lehman, on Ministerial Relief; C. L. De Pew and Miss C. P. Maus, on the Sunday-school; C. E. Underwood, for Eureka College; F. W. Burnham gave a report of the "Commission on Christian Union"; J. Fred Jones, on state work. There were three new congregations organized in the district since last year's convention. One of these is the newly opened mission in Ottawa. The convention approved the action of the board in providing for the purchase of a building there and recommended that our support be concentrated in this inviting field. The board of last year was re-elected: George R. Southgate, president; L. Hadaway, vice-president; and H. H. Jenner, secretary.

J. Frank Green, corresponding secretary for Michigan, sends the following items on Michigan missions: Muskegon mission jumped from the "baby church" to the biggest church in the fourth district. Fifty-five men came into this church by primary obedience during the year. Cadillac and Coldwater, both splendid cities, have received the attention of State Missionary Society. Cadillac has already been transformed and Coldwater is coming up rapidly, with a splendid pastor at the helm. Henderson, Chapin, Easton and twenty-two other churches have been aided in the locating of suitable preachers. The church at Battle Creek (mission) gave for missionary work in Michigan last year, the sum of $200.

R. Ray Eldred, writing from Longa, Congo, under date of April 25, says, "I am happy to be able to write that this has been the greatest year the mission has ever known. The number of baptisms so far has reached 1,201. A letter I have just received from the Lotumbe brethren says that there seems to be revival in several of their outposts. When you remember that in the last nine months there have been 331 baptisms and 468 for the year, you can see that the revival must be something extraordinary."

Mrs. W. K. Azbill died at Cleveland, Ohio, and was buried beside her daughter Ethel in "Crown Hill," Indianapolis, Ind., June 7.

She was a devoted disciple of Jesus Christ. Mrs. Azbill was a faithful helper in all her husband's labor in Jamaica as a missionary of the C. W. B. M. and in Japan as a leader of an independent mission, and in Honolulu where he labored to establish a mission for Orientals.

Cambridge City, Ind., church observed homecoming and rally day June 15. Delegates from New Lisbon, Newcastle, Dunreith and Dublin were in attendance. The program for the day ineluded, among the speakers, C. E. Shultz and Judge Ed. Jackson, both of Newcastle.

B. E. Utz reports that Spokane Bible College has closed its first year's work with gratifying results. University Place is now being surveyed. This is to be the home of Spokane University, which is the outgrowth of the Bible College movement.

The foreign society stands in great need of three strong, well educated men, two for Japan and one for India. They ought to be under thirty years of age, in good health, and with some experience as Christian workers, writes F. M. Rains.

Sunday, July 13, will be observed as "World's Sunday-school Day." Order of service may be secured from the International Sunday-school Association, Mallers Bldg., Chicago.

First Church, Piqua, O., has recently rededicated its improved building. Over $3,000 was spent in improvements on the Sunday-school rooms. W. J. Young is the pastor here.

The medical work at Luchowfu, China, is very large. About one-fifth of all the medical work of the foreign society was done in this great station during the past year.

W. B. Slater, of Davenport, Ia., recently gave an address at the hall of the Volunteers of America, in that city, his theme being, "The Great Love of God for Humanity."

The receipts for Foreign Missions for the first seventeen days of June amounted to $32,790, a gain over the corresponding days of June, 1912, of $2,016.

Over $5,000 was raised on a recent Sunday by First Church, La Fayette, Ind., for the building fund. G. W. Watson, minister, had charge of the campaign.

Dr. Louis F. Jaggard, Monieka, Congo, Africa, writes "On Easter Day twenty-two were baptized and eighteen evangelists sent out."

A. B. Philputt addressed the 263 members of the graduating class of the Shortridge High School, June 8, his theme being, "What is Your Life?"

Geo. W. Watson delivered the baccalaureate sermon to the graduates of the Jefferson High School, La Fayette, Ind.

The First Church, Akron, Ohio, in the future will support the mission station at Shanghai, China.

The old Clinton, Ind., building has been razed, and a contract is soon to be let for a new structure.

Woodhull

Entered into rest, Tuesday evening, May 13, 1913, in the home of her daughter, at Evanston, Cincinnati, Ohio, Caroline Ellen Woodhull, née Gaylord, in the sixty-ninth year of her age. For many years a resident of Angola, Indiana, her life became identified with the church in that community in an unusual degree. In the midst of a congregation justly famed for its wealth of spiritual character, her life shone with a radiance of Christian grace and beauty all its own. Her very name was redolent of constant and chaste devotion to her Lord. The old, the middle-aged, the young,—all revered her and approved of her saintly life. Lifted far above the conceits and antipathies of average mortals, her whole nature was responsive to the many-sided interests of the Kingdom of Christ. In all things she showed herself a pattern of good works. The unexpected tidings of her death caused a multitude of hearts to grow still and faint from thinking how great a loss the ministries and fellowship of the church on earth have sustained in her death. Like William Blake, the painter-poet, she hath gone into that country which all her life she wished to see. Her body rests in the Angola cemetery. She leaves two worthy daughters to perpetuate her spirit, Mrs. Miner Lee Bates, of Hiram, Ohio, and Mrs. Grant K. Lewis, of New York City. Vernon Stauffer.

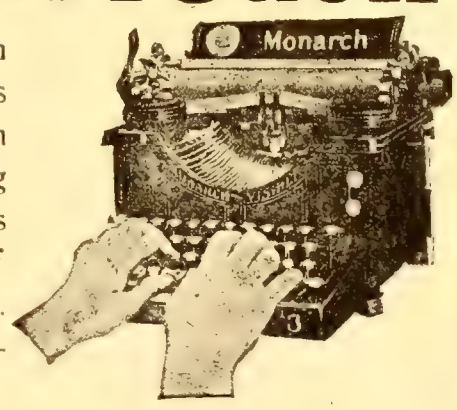
Monarch Light Touch



THE extremely light action of the Monarch Typewriter endears it to all operators who use it. The typist who takes pride in her position finds great satisfaction in being able to turn out as much work, and as good work, per hour, toward the end of the working day as during the morning. Other conditions being the same, she can always do this on a Monarch. There is for users of this machine. The mechanical reason for the Monarch light touch is found in the action of the Monarch type bar, an exclusive and patented feature which gives this remarkably light touch.

We would remind the business man that Monarch light touch means more work and better work, because less physical strength is expended by the operator. Therefore, cost per folio is reduced making the Monarch a business economy.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointed by churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

Theodore Roosevelt Speaks

The tremendous influence of periodical literature on the lives of the young is illustrated by the following excerpt from the autobiography of the former president, now appearing in some of our metropolitan dailies:

"Take my beloved 'Our Young Folks,' the magazine of which I have already spoken, and which taught me much more than any of my text books. Everything in this magazine instilled the individual virtues, and the necessity of character as the chief factor in any man's success—a teaching in which I now believe as sincerely as ever, for all the laws that the wit of man can devise will never make a man a worthy citizen unless he has within himself the right stuff, unless he has self-reliance, energy, courage, the power of insisting on his own rights and the sympathy that makes him regardful of the rights of others."

Our new system of Sunday School story papers will have as their chief aim, individual character-building. Are you informed regarding our complete line of Sunday School literature?

A Forgotten Virtue

Hope is a forgotten virtue. That is to say, we have not forgotten to hope; but we have forgotten that hope is a virtue. We think it a matter of temperament. We even count it a defect of judgment. We like to live with men of hope, but we are afraid to have them invest our money. Hope, as the modern world esteems it, is a matter of good digestion and not of principle. But the Bible places it midway between the virtues of faith and love.

It is no longer customary to speak abusively of other religions than the Christian. The law of Christian courtesy holds here as everywhere. It was not the spirit of Christ to speak disparagingly of any man's honest effort to attain the truth, no matter how futile the attempt. The Christian world professes a profound sympathy with the attempts that are represented by the oldest and best of the non-Christian faiths, to answer the questions that arise in the soul of man. We like to think of these religions as imperfect attempts to interpret the same great truths which underlie the Christian religion, truths which must express themselves in any true faith.

Nevertheless the whole spirit of our study is comparative, and if this method reveals to us some excellent things in the ethnic religions and shows us how like in some respects they are to our own, it also reveals to us some most remarkable differences, and I think I am justified in saying that the strength of Christianity is largely in those things in which it differs from the other religions of the world.

Now whatever may be said in praise of the ethics of Confucius or the gentleness and compassion of Buddha (and no one will pretend that there are any nobler extra-biblical faiths than these), it would be generally admitted by students of comparative religion that the Christian religion excels every other faith that has been known on earth, in the material which it offers for hope. It is one of the great and distinctive characteristics of the Christian religion. Hope belongs to all mankind and springs eternal in the human heart. No religion is utterly without it, and no religion gives so much to us or so reasonable ground of hope as the Christian religion.

The ground of hope as the Bible reveals it is first of all in the kindness of the merciful and loving God. The pledge of that hope as the Bible reveals it is in the gift of God through Jesus Christ for whom God spoke his word of confirmation and encouragement and gave tangible evidence of his love to all the generations that shall live on earth. It is further remarkable that from among the great variety of conflicting hopes which men cherish the Christian religion selects those which are not only most permanent but most deep and precious, and these are the hopes which it pronounces legitimate and true as assured by the character of God and the cross of Jesus Christ.

You do not need to go to Africa to prove that hope dies when the Christian faith dies. The non-Christian world is very nearly hopeless. There is no other religion than the Christian that can inspire with a great and beautiful hope, but heathenism is not more hopeless than civilization without Christ. Men are not saved by learning nor by culture. These things are good so far as they go, but they do not go deep enough to inspire the soul of man with a great and saving hope.

There is hope for the triumph of the gospel in the world. The progress of the temperance movement, the conviction of criminals high in official position, the rising demand of the public for righteousness, all are indications of what the world has to hope for. The kingdom of God is surely coming.

There is hope for our dead friends whom we have bid farewell in words of human affection and of Christian faith. They are not lost to us because they are not lost in God. Their faith in life is our hope for them in death. There is hope for ourselves. Unworthy as we are, and wicked as we are, our hope is grounded in the love of God and in his gift to us in Jesus Christ. Believe it, my brother, my friend, the hope of the gospel is for you.

In the Tate Gallery in London hangs Watt's great painting entitled "Hope." There is a lowly but beautiful figure sitting isolated in the world, blindfolded and seeing not even the light of the single star above her, though its light illumines her face, holding fast her harp of which every string is broken save one, and listening to the music of that one string. There are times when faith seems to fail us, though faith is never more real than when we suppose we have lost it and yearn for it with a great longing. There are times when love seems dead and we believe ourselves unloved, though thank God we never are. But even when faith and love seem lost to us they are not wholly irrevocable while hope lasts.

Men have been known to die, who were not fatally sick, because they lost hope. Men have been known to recover who were sick enough to die because they were so hopeful. Some physicians are remarkably successful in their cures because they are the embodiment of hope. The Apostle Paul tells us that we are "saved by hope." It is gloriously true both of body and of soul.

What Doth the Lord Require?

The ancient Israelite was desperately in earnest when he inquired, "Wherewith shall I come before Jehovah, and bow myself before the high God?" He was dissatisfied with what he was geting out of life and he was convinced that the cause of his dissatisfaction was his estrangement from God. Hence he was willing to pay the price of restoration to divine favor. Did God require the choicest of the flock for his altar? The worshipper would bring it without delay. Was it the amount of the gift that was pleasing to God? Nothing would be withheld. If sin could be blotted out in no other way, the first-born son would be given in sacrifice.

It was not indifference, therefore, that could be charged against the man whom the prophet sought to teach religion; it was a wrong idea of God. The God of the prophet was a moral being. He was served by men who knew the difference between right and wrong and who delighted in doing what was right. The favor of God was not for sale. The habit of appeasing monarchs by rich presents had brought confusion into the realm of morals and religion. Men thought forgiveness was a matter of special favor. The prophets bade men seek the favor of God by treating their neighbors with kindness and fairness. They made it clear that no man could hope to please God while he was acquiring wealth by fraud and injustice and using his power for selfish ends.

The Lord requires of men what they can understand. It is unnecessary for them to look beyond common experience in order to find their duty. They are expected to use their own intelligence. God requires his worshippers to be independent. When religion is a matter of ritual, and the favor of God depends upon punctiliousness in ceremonial practices, the priest is needed and the common worshipper becomes the servant of the priest. When religion is identified with the acceptance of a creed, a pope or an ecclesiastical assembly or some independent theologian becomes the keeper of the conscience. But a religion that is uncompromisingly moral makes the appeal to every man to judge for himself what is right. Of course, the material upon which judgments are based must be at hand and the mind must be trained that it may use this material honestly and skillfully. If we wish to be kept in the way of the Lord, we need for our teachers men of exceptional insight and men of wide information. But it must not be overlooked that we are religious when we see for ourselves what is right and do it because of compulsion from within.

Justice and kindness are not separate virtues, they are aspects of one virtue. The unkind man can never be just. His unkindness is injustice. We deprive another of his rights when we approach him without sympathy. He has a right to expect us to remember that he is a man and that he needs help. If he has sinned grievously, one is entitled to have his life studied by friends. Friends alone can understand him, for they alone feel the strength of his temptations and the shame of his sin and they desire him to forsake sin for his own good. Others may find his sin inconvenient to them; they are indifferent to his welfare. Kindness that is not exacting in its moral demands is injustice. We are false friends when we cover up sin and make light of it. The parent who spoils his child because he thinks he must be kind is most unjust to it. We have a right to be taught what is just, how to respect other persons, how to do our part of the world's work. Kindness that encourages laziness is most unkind and unjust. The religious man is modest even when he is most certain that he has had a vision of God. God is too great for the mind of man to comprehend. The humble man accepts whatever commends itself as true. He will not make his opinions so personal that he cannot tolerate a free and impartial discussion of them. He invites examination of them that he may free himself from error and know more of the truth. The humble man is aspiring. He has faith in the integrity of the human man and in nature. He is therefore a patient investigator. The thing he does not know today he may know tomorrow. There is a sure reward for the honest seeker after truth. Character does not come by chance. Through "peril, toil, and pain," we come to moral dignity and power. If we are humble in spirit, we accept the situation as we find it and work for such improvements in it and in ourselves as we learn to be desirable. [Midweek Service, July 9. Micah 6:8; Isa. 1:17.]

Fifty Years Ago

Fifty years since Gettysburg! Yes, and fifty years since Vicksburg! Never forget that on the same day when the stars and bars went down before the stone wall at Gettysburg, the white flag went up on the clay ramparts at Vicksburg. Yonder among the hills of Pennsylvania manhood met manhood in mighty impact and the third day's fight finished one of the decisive battles of the world. And on the same day the strongest fortress on the Mississippi fell after a long and bloody siege, and the Confederacy was cut in twain along the length of the Father of Waters.

Fifty years ago they celebrated the anniversary of American independence with a wild and solemn glory. The news of the victory in the east met the news of the victory in the west, and the hope of the republic rose high upon the crest of the two waves that rolled into one.

Fifty years ago we were pouring out the nation's blood like water. It ran in little rivulets down the slopes of the two ridges at Gettysburg. It tinged with red the swollen tide of the Mississippi as it flowed past Vicksburg. On July 4th the guns were silent. The stars and stripes floated undisturbed over the sullen walls of Vicksburg, and waved in silence over the unburied dead among the Pennsylvania hills.

Fifty years, and it seems as many centuries. Only the presence among us of men who fought there makes it seem a thing that happened so recently. It is a long, long time since then, and we are one nation.

We are a better nation, let us hope. At any rate, we are enough better so that we will not again enslave our fellow men, or seek to divide the Union. We are enough wiser, if not better, so that we settle questions now in less bloody and cruel fashion.

But are we as earnest as we were? Do we believe in anything enough so that we could fight for it? Do we care enough for the causes for which men have died so that we could imagine ourselves defending the wall at Gettysburg, or running the batteries at Vicksburg?

Bloody and wicked have been our wars. May God forgive men for having fought their brothers fifty years ago or ever. But is it because we are more righteous or only that we are more quiescent and more prudent that we have ceased to settle things in that way?

Lincoln said at Gettysburg that it belonged to those who were there to dedicate themselves to the uncompleted task which those who died there gave their lives to perform. That task is uncompleted still. Government of the people, by the people and for the people still is on trial for its life. The sons of men who fought at Bunker Hill fought again in 1812; and their sons fought again at Vicksburg and at Gettysburg. Where are their sons fighting? For what causes are they bearing arms? For what have they put themselves in peril? Are they capable of like heroism?

Green grow the oaks at Gettysburg. Still flow the waters of the Mississippi past Vicksburg. In both places the colors wave in undisputed possession of the sky. What word do the waters that flow from Pennsylvania hills through the Monongahela and the Ohio into the Mississippi bear along the shores of the great river, of the spirit that is in the men of the East? What answer do the sycamores and live oaks along the great river waft back through the treetops to the oaks at Gettysburg concerning the hearts of the men who fought under Grant and Sherman and Logan?

Not because of what was done a half century ago have we right to pride as we remember the two great battles that ushered in July in 1863. Not because men once were brave have we a right to rejoice.

"It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

Hints, Helps and Hits

Conviction improves the utterance.
The earnest life shames the frivolous one.
Strong affirmations often indicate weak arguments.
The love of God prompts the revelation of his wrath.
To live for Christ may be harder than to die for him.

Giving money is an effective way of giving testimony.

Eminence in sanctification is not gained through competition.

Two have more force than one except when a man is double-minded.

If the preacher advocates doctrines you do not like, hear him through patiently; you may get new light.

Complete surrender to Christ involves self-sacrificing service of others; but the latter does not include the former.

It is a very good style of prayer-meeting when, by agreement, many pray each alone for the same thing at the same time; the people do not meet, but their prayers do—at the throne.

He who speaks of the death of Christ as a martyrdom fails to give it its chief significance.

The Church Sneak

"Who was that man and what did he want?" asked the parson's wife as the parson joined her in the church vestibule at the close of the Sunday morning service. "I don't know who he is but I will soon know what he wants, for he asked permission to call tomorrow morning at my study." "What do you suppose he wants?" was the next question. "From the way in which he lauded my sermon I think he wants to borrow five dollars." The parson missed his guess—because as the call revealed Monday he wanted to borrow ten.

One does not need to be in the pulpit so very long before he becomes familiar with the type. The man usually gets an office in the Woman's Temple or Association Building or best of all, if possible, a Bible House. And from this safe retreat he makes his sallies to prey upon his fellow men. The more fraudulent his schemes the more unctious his bearing, the more persistent his attentions. He not only comes to church but asks the usher for a front seat. He bows right and left to men who stare at him in return, and he is not averse to addressing the Sunday-school if he can suggest to the superintendent that that is quite in his line. He is the most conspicuous figure at a sociable and unless the door is shut in his face would make himself quite freely at home in the parsonage. What does he do? That depends upon the demand. Now he is a quack doctor with quack remedies for unmentionable diseases. Now he is the promoter of a gold mine in Alaska and now he holds "valuable concessions" in Guatemala or Brazil. The Christian forbearance of God's people is sometimes sorely tried before the community by one united effort gives the professional "church sneak" the grand bounce, and the more publicly it is done the better.

Don't Cover the Door Bell

Don't cover the door-bell with the crepe. Even though the dead lie within, the door must be used by the living, and the necessities of life are imperative. It is little death asks—a tear, a flower, and a spadeful of earth—these and a memory. But life's needs are many and imperative. All day long they hammer at the door. They may be unwelcome but they are importunate. They will not be denied. They insist upon recognition right away. You think when you nail the crepe that it alone has rights which the world is bound to respect; what if you do cover the electric button? What is a button now? What is anything in all the world now? No matter about the door-bell. Fasten the crepe where it cannot fail to be seen!

That is what you think, and you are wrong. Sacred as are the rights of the dead, those of the living are more so. Here comes the messenger boy with a telegram: behind him is the florist with tributes of love from friends. Yonder come loved ones who would speak words of comfort. You think you do not want to see them? Nay, you would be heart-broken if they did not come. Make it easy for them to enter. Do not compel them to rap or wait. Do not advertise that you have shut yourself away from comfort. Hang out the crepe if you must, but hang it on the other side. Do not cover the doorbell with crepe, and flowers are better than crepe.

Do not cover the doorbell of your heart with the signal of sorrow. Weep, for God gave us tears for times like this. But do not weep in bitterness or isolation. Bury your sorrow; lay a flower upon it; then dry your tears and go, comfort another.

If you must fasten crepe at the front door, do not cover the doorbell.

Are Our Pastorates Too Long?

"In looking over the last Year Book and taking one hundred churches in my own state I find that forty-one of the ministers moved last year. If this is a good thing for the churches, why should only forty-one per cent move? Why not one hundred per cent? Are we in danger of staying too long in our churches? Will you take up the important question of making our pastorates shorter?"

Most of the one year pastorates are too long. Most of the twenty-year pastorates are not long enough. The answer as to the proper length of a pastorate is similar to that which Abraham Lincoln gave as the proper length of a man's legs: "They ought to be long enough to reach the ground." I believe a longer average of pastoral service would greatly dignify the ministry as a profession and result in better work in all churches.

Southern Methodists Want Name Changed

The Protestant Episcopal Church is not the only denomination that is tinkering with its name. The Southern Methodists want their name changed—without getting married to some other denomination! In the Pittsburg Christian Advocate we read that there is another movement looking toward a change of the name of one of the leading churches of this country in which Methodists are directly concerned. The change proposed does not touch the essential name of the denomination, but it is of great moment to that branch of Methodism and of considerable importance to Methodism in general. In 1846 delegates from several annual conferences which had previously been a part of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America organized a church which it was necessary to distinguish from other Christian bodies and particularly that body of which they had been formerly a part. The name chosen which served the purpose for a number of years was "The Methodist Episcopal Church, South." The General Conference of 1886 by the required constitutional vote recommended the substitution of "Episcopal Methodist Church" for the name chosen at its organization. The annual conferences did not concur, however, and the matter was postponed until 1887, when the General Conference again recommended a change by the requisite majority. But this second proposal, though made and carried through the General Conference by some of the leading men, pillars of the church, was rejected by the members of the annual conferences. It is the identical proposition of 1882 that is again to be voted upon this year. In 1910 a resolution was introduced into the General Conference at Asheville, North Carolina, proposing a change of name to "The Methodist Church." A spirited debate followed in which were heard the earnest appeals from the Pacific Coast and the Southwest for relief from the embarrassment and actual hindrance occasioned by the narrow, geographical term (South) which also connotes other things not helpful in some sections where the church is performing its work in these days. In the midst of the discussion, when it seemed unlikely that the proposed new motion would command the constitutional majority, Dr. H. M. Du Bose offered a substitute which was accepted by the movers of the original motion, and the resolution as thus perfected was adopted by the majority necessary to recommend a constitutional change. If the annual conferences concur, the name of the "Sister Church," as she delights to call herself, will be the Methodist Episcopal Church in America.

Billy Sunday Criticized by a Pastor

Rev. Henry Arthur Kernen is the pastor of the First Congregational Church, Moorhead, Minn. What this pastor has to say about one Billy Sunday is boldly spread upon the pages of a recent issue of the Congregationalist (Boston). It is a merciless exposure of the bull-dozing methods of the erstwhile baseball player, who is now "earning" something like $15,000 a month in the evangelistic field. Brother Kernen's bill of particulars follows in full:

DISAPPROVAL OF MR. SUNDAY.

Moorhead, Minn., is just across the Re River from Fargo. Two churches here participated in Sunday's meetings, the Methodist and the Presbyterian. Both were weak churches and they are in no better condition now than they were before the revival. Our church (Congregational) did not participate in the meetings as a body although I am sure the majority of our people heard Mr. Sunday a number of times. He had been in Moorhead fifteen years ago and the leaders said they did not approve of going into the meetings this time. This church has not been averse to participating in evangelistic services. Dr. Chapman was brought to Moorhead a number of years ago when Minneapolis was the center of a revival. This church bore nine-tenths of the expense of bringing him here.

Those who were instrumental in bringing Mr. Sunday to Fargo never urged this church to co-operate. But when the theatrical-like manager of Mr. Sunday arrived on the scene a month before the meetings began he saw that this church was one of the leading ones and immediately he began to use his best efforts to get us to participate. Out of seventy-five adult men who are faithful attendants at this church, many of whom are prominent in the city's life, only one approved of Mr. Sunday. I was asked to confer with some of the Fargo men concerning the meetings. I expected two men to come to see me. Instead a dozen came over, including the manager and a few ministers. Everything was done to browbeat me into line. When I said I would not participate until I could hear Mr. Sunday myself and that I was sure the church would not vote to close its doors six weeks, the manager became exceedingly angry and said that if we did not come in with the rest Mr. Sunday would not come. He showed a telegram from Mr.

Sunday saying that he was not pleased with what he heard from Fargo and Moorhead and that unless every one of the so-called "evangelical" churches co-operated he would not come. This was merely a bluff and a part of his advertising game, as was abundantly proved later. We did not participate and the First Church in Fargo withdrew and still Mr. Sunday came.

The signing of the cards was in large part a farce. The Lutheran minister here told me that he had many duplicates and even triplicates. When they had the Sunday-school parade many children who were in the primary departments of the schools were urged to sign cards. With the waving of flags and the playing of bands one could accomplish most anything with a group of children. What boy would not like to join a procession? "Do you love Jesus?" these children were asked. Of course they loved Jesus—they have been brought up to love him and never knew anything else.

One of the finest young men I ever knew, a student of Fargo College, had won the state oratorical contest. His subject was David Livingstone. The leaders asked the boy to give his oration in the tabernacle. Much was made of his opportunity to speak before so many people. He consented. Mr. Sunday then preached and made his usual appeal. Immediately all the prominent workers, including Mr. Sunday, pounced on this student and did their best to get him to go around and sit on the mourner's bench and sign a card. They knew that he was absolutely clean, a diligent student and a member of our Moorhead Congregational Church. He was one of twenty-five men who stood up Easter morning, the day Mr. Sunday began his work, and confessed Jesus Christ. Their purpose could have been none other than to discredit his first confession.

No one says a word about Mr. Sunday now in Fargo or Moorhead. The only churches that received large additions were the Methodist and the Presbyterian (Fargo churches.) The First Methodist was a great church before Mr. Sunday came, seats were filled every Sunday. They have somewhat enlarged the church in the past year and much has been done to conserve results. Congregations are not any larger than they were before at the Presbyterian church.

To summarize in the language of a school teacher and a man who has always supported the church and co-operated in evangelistic meetings: "I saw no one by word or act showing any excess of religious feeling. Good music, a splendid organization, a howling mountebank to call in the crowd, an usher to every six seats, a personal worker to every three makes it easier to go forward than to go out into the open air. I do not think that any discerning intelligence can justify giving this man the sanction of the approval of any religious organization."

Henry Arthur Kernen,
Minister First Congregational Church, Moorhead, Minn.

The Maid of Orleans in France Today

The Roman Catholic hierarchy has "beatified" Joan of Arc. She will in course of time become duly canonized as a "saint of the church" by the very same church that burned her at the stake. Joan was a troublesome maid in France many centuries ago. On May 4, she still proved to be a trouble maker. It happened on this wise, according to the Paris correspondent of the Living Church (Protestant Episcopal, Milwaukee) of June 7:

At Orleans, Jeanne d'Arc's native city, the municipality and the Church could not come to terms for a united fête-day. Discussions in regard to it went on for weeks beforehand. The Church could not accept the presence and contact of the Freemasons, who in France and elsewhere on the continent of Europe are in opposition with Catholicism, often even with Christianity. But the Freemasons, not at all anxious to take part in these festal doings decided to abstain from any demand to join the processions. So that difficulty was quickly ended. But the Mayor of Orleans, evidently of a marked anti-ecclesiastical turn of mind, could not bring himself to figure in a public demonstration in which government officials, the municipality, officers of the army, and lay functionaries generally should form one with the dignitaries and other priests of the Church and devout Roman Catholics at large. Protesting that such union would be disapproved by the government, he proposed a novel expedient. The civil procession was to start from the Town Hall, the clerical procession from the Cathedral; but instead of joining together as proposed on the central square of Sainte-Croix, each procession was to keep studiously at a respectful distance from the other, like two bands of children who, having quarreled, "won't speak," and make their way home or to some other given place, taking different sides of the roadway! "I am to be your guest on condition that I accept to be placed at a separate table for fear I should make the master of the house or his other guests uncomfortable." remarked the Bishop of Orleans. "We are to walk behind like penitents, to form a mere pendant in order that the rest may keep well and distinctly together. The Church is to be the poor relation at the other end of the festal board, the tiresome person of whom it is said, 'he is a very annoying visitor but we will send him as far off as possible!'" And to the Mayor's proposal Mgr. Touchet replied: "Such an arrangement is inacceptable," adding caustically, "It ought never to have been proposed."

Thus it came about that Orleans had two Jeanne d'Arc fête-days, the lay festival in the middle of the week and the ecclesiastical festival on the following Sunday, which happened to be Whitsunday. Braving the restrictions in respect of open-air processions on any but a duly authorized date, priests and people walked in grand procession through some of the principal streets, and the Bishops blessed the assembled crowds in the open square. But they acted swiftly, discreetly, correctly, and no interference or disturbance took place.

World Conference of Faith and Order

The Christian Intelligencer (Reformed, New York City), prints the following news item: Members of commissions on a World Conference of Faith and Order, appointed by supreme bodies in Episcopal, Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, Methodist, Disciples and other bodies, fourteen in all, lately held a meeting in New York. The same meeting was originally called for Washington, for one reason that Vice-president Marshall and Secretary of State Bryan, members of the Presbyterian Commission, might attend. At the New York meeting an important step was taken. Thus far Episcopal leaders have managed the whole thing. Now it is formally transferred to the shoulders of all commissions, twenty-two of which have been appointed to date. It was reported at the meeting that Cardinal Gibbons for the Roman Catholic Church, and Archbishop Platon for the Russian Orthodox Church, have asked to be kept informed, and in the abstract approve of movements toward unity. Committees have now been named to lay before religious bodies that have not yet named commissions such plans as have been formulated for a World Conference. A committee has been appointed to consider and recommend an educational campaign in this and other countries that shall so change Christian public opinion as to give ground for hope that a World Conference if held might accomplish something. Were it to be called now it is agreed that it would be likely to do no more than to end in disaster. Especially will the committees just named confer with their related bodies in England and in Europe and try to induce them to name commissions. The late J. Pierpont Morgan gave, as will be remembered, $100,000 to defer expenses of the World Conference, and of the educational and committee work leading up to it.

Reformed Church in America Statistics

The Reformed Church in America is a comparatively small denomination, but it is exceptionally strong on the quality of its ministers and laymen. Its organ is The Christian Intelligencer, which is perhaps one of the finest religious weeklies published in the English language. The paper of June 11 has published denominational statistics, showing a remarkable growth from 1863 to 1912, a period of 49 years, as follows:

	1863	1912
Classes	32	35
Particular Synods	4	4
Churches	422	691
Ministers	446	739
Candidates	5	6
Number of families	34,521	66,065
Received on confession	2,190	5,700
Received on certificate	1,353	4,132
Total of communicants	53,007	118,564
Infants baptized	3,155	5,665
Adults baptized	399	985
Number of catechumens	19,826	25,309
Sunday-school enrollment	38,539	120,815
Contributions for benevolence	$135,814	$498,303
Contributions for congregational purposes	$402,900	$1,657,006

At a recent General Synod, the report of the permanent Committee on Sunday-schools and Young People's Societies was presented by the Rev. Jasper S. Hogan. The statistics relating to Sunday-schools and their total enrollment were given just as in the report on the state of religion. The returns received by the committee cover 668 of the 798 schools. In the home department 8,731 are enrolled, a gain of 767. Number of scholars received into the full membership of the church 3,374, which is 487 more than last year. There are 96 teacher training classes. The catechism is used in 223 schools. There are 926 catechetical classes reported which is 165 more than last year. Four hundred and thirty-two schools are reported as graded in some or all departments. In 276 schools some form of systematic mission study is followed.

The scope of our young people's interests and activities may be seen from the following list of organizations: Christian Endeavor Societies, 280; Intermediate C. E. Societies, 40; Junior C. E. Societies, 111; King's Daughters, 51; Mission Bands, 113; Young People's Societies, 87; Boys' Clubs, 44; Girls' Clubs, 27; Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, 17; miscellaneous, 19; total, 789.

The total amount contributed by our young people to the benevolent Boards of the Church is $55,643.96, an increase of $2,294.59 over 1911, when a new standard was set.

From Near and Far

The eyes of religious workers are turning toward Winona Lake, anticipating the Bible conference that is to be held there August 22-31. The Hon. William Jennings Bryan, secretary of state, will preach the opening sermon, and the program is replete with ministers and lecturers who are recognized leaders in their profession. Gipsy Smith, the eminent evangelist, will be at the conference throughout the entire session, as will also Campbell Morgan, the far-famed Bible expositor. Among others may be mentioned Moderator John Timothy Stone, Bishop Hughes, John Balcom Shaw, J. Wilbur Chapman, Bishop Dubs, Dr. Hinson, William A. Sunday, Mrs. Booth Clabborn, Dr. Moorehead, and many other distinguished men who are to be present and take part. The Rev. A. H. Haigazian, Ph. D, president of the Apostolic College in Konia, Asia Minor, has included Winona in a brief itinerary through the states, and will deliver a series of addresses.

With the acceptance in principle of the president's peace plan by eighteen nations, Secretary Bryan developed some of the details of the plan which so far have been only generally outlined. He made a statement touching the composition of the proposed commissions to investigate controversies. "The plan contemplates a permanent international commission," the statement says, "and the president suggests that the commission be composed of five nations, as follows: One member from each of the contracting countries, to be chosen by the government; one member to be chosen by each of the contracting countries from some other country, and the fifth member of the commission to be agreed upon by the two governments, the commission to be appointed as soon as convenient after the making of the treaty; vacancies to be filled according to the original appointment."

Colonel Eli F. Ritter of Indianapolis, for many years one of the most prominent attorneys of Indiana, has retired from the active practice of his profession upon reaching his seventy-fifth year. So worthy had been his career that he was recently given a public dinner by his fellow townsmen. Colonel Ritter has been one of the most successful temperance reformers in the country, his influence being wrought almost exclusively through his legal knowledge. He is the author of several laws regulating the traffic, chief of which is the famous Nicholson Law of Indiana, which he largely framed and gave its repeal-proof frame. He was the first man to obtain damages for his client for the deterioration of property by reason of the presence of the saloon. During the latter days of his active life he gave himself quite extensively to cases involving complaint against the traffic.

Less "hippety-hop" and more dignity are needed in the rendition of Sunday-school hymns, according to the statements made by Professor H. Augustine Smith of the Chicago Theological Seminary in an address on "The Development of Religion Through Music" at one of the sessions of the Sunday-school Institute, recently held at the University of Chicago. The educator condemned hymns sung at Sunday-school services which show too much familiarity toward sacred subjects. He declared that careless singing too often defeated the purposes of religious meetings.

The hills of Gettysburg, where the armies of Meade and Lee pitched their tents fifty years ago, are flecked with canvas. The Civil War veterans from the north and the south—40,000 of them—are there, some few in threadworn uniforms and all without their muskets, to hold a jubilee reunion on the fiftieth anniversary of the battle. The veterans come as the guests of the national government, and of their respective states and territories, which jointly are spending more than a million dollars for their entertainment and comfort.

The first American Conference on Social Insurance met in Chicago, June 5. The conference was arranged by the American Association for Labor Legislation and was addressed by leading manufacturers, labor leaders, insurance men, and state officials. Workmen's compensation, sickness insurance, insurance against unemployment and old age, mothers' pensions, and maternity insurance were discussed in a way which will surely have far-reaching effect upon the development of social legislation in this country.

The National Drainage Congress has, through a committee of which Edmund T. Perkins, president of the congress, is chairman, presented to President Wilson the question of the federal government undertaking the work of scientific prevention of floods. The president of the drainage congress urged that under the constitution it is as much the duty of the federal government to control floods for the protection of life and property as it is to protect the people from the ravages of a foreign invasion.

Hamilton White, the originator of the plan to found a college for men and women who have reached the age of sixty, died recently in Chicago, aged seventy-nine years. He once said, in connection with the establishment of the institution: "There is no reason why a man should not graduate in literature, science, or art at seventy as well as at seventeen. Keep up a man's taste for learning and he should live to be a hundred at least."

Leading suffragists of Philadelphia are planning a campaign of education for the whole state of Pennsylvania. Their work was inspired by the success of the suffrage pageant in New York. General "Rosalie" Jones' march on Washington is to be duplicated by small "armiets" coming from many directions for the projected woman suffrage demonstration here on July 30, according to information given out at suffragist headquarters. Some are planning to come on foot, some on horseback, others in automobiles, and still others in "caravans" similar to those which crossed the plains years ago. They are to bring petitions to the Senate to act immediately on the proposed constitutional amendment giving nation-wide "votes for women."

Mrs. Catharine Waugh McCulloch, suffragist leader and Cook County's first woman justice of the peace, has been selected by the Chicago Law School for its newly created woman's professorship of law. Mrs. McCulloch will confer with directors of the school, and upon their decision regarding the subjects to be considered by the new professor will depend her acceptance or refusal of the proffered chair.

Lincoln's Gettysburg Address

By the Rev. Robert W. McLaughlin, D. D.

Fifty years ago this coming November 19, Abraham Lincoln, standing on a temporary platform erected on a field over which, a few weeks before, contending armies had marched, drew from his pocket a scrap of paper, and, adjusting his spectacles, read for two minutes some words that are known as the Gettysburg Address.

The occasion was a rare and exacting one, and demanded the resources of a supremely great nature. Two armies, like huge, black clouds, and numbering 163,000 men, had moved northward from the banks of the Rapidan, only to clash on the hills and plains about the little village of Gettysburg. When the thunder, lightning and torrent of three days' storm ceased, 53,000 men were reported killed, wounded or missing.

As the bodies of brave men from seventeen states were resting in the newly made graves, it was fitting that the President of the United States should formally dedicate the cemetery. In doing this, it was demanded that in a brief utterance the meaning of the struggle here and elsewhere should find expression. How well this demand was met is a commonplace of history. The learned and profound orator of the day, Edward Everett, who had held the assembled company spellbound preceding the formal dedication, wrote the president the next day: "I should be glad if I could flatter myself that I came as near to the central idea of the occasion in two hours as you did in two minutes." The president himself, true to that test of greatness—namely, its unconsciousness, little thought of the epoch-making character of his utterance, for in it he said: "The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here." But in this he was mistaken, for the world did note what he said, and will repeat his words as long as the mind of man remembers.

The Address From Different Aspects.

The speech may be studied under different aspects, even as the autumn day, when it was spoken, made its varying appear to those who were present. The lights and shadows falling athwart the fields caused by the sun shining or the huge clouds in the sky; the trees on the hillside, their roots reaching down, their trunks reaching up and their branches reaching out; the delicate, rich, yet strong coloring of the foliage that clothed the trees, yet did not obscure their formation or strength, and the sense of illimitable vastness, bound only by the curving horizon where they met earth. All this but symbolized the meaning of the classic utterance to those who listened, and later recalled it.

The sense of something vast and illimitable is in this utterance, as one yields to retrospect and repeats the words, "brought forth on this continent," or yields to imagination and pictures the future while repeating the words "shall not perish from the earth." The great leader is expressing something vaster than the Battle of Gettysburg, and more far reaching in meaning than even the Civil War.

Then the mingling of joy and sorrow was in the utterance, even as the lights and shadows are athwart the fields on this November day. There is the deep sense of joy as, realizing that he is standing on a battlefield on which the invasion of a stupendous rebellion was met and hurled back, he voices the feeling of gratitude. But along with this burst of sunlight are dark shadows, for there are the green mounds that tell of brave lives sacrificed, with lonely firesides and sorrowing hearts.

Also the language used to convey this sense of vastness, and this deep feeling of joy, modified by an equally deep feeling of sorrow. The language is as faultless as the colors of the foliage were harmonious, and as euphonious to the ear as the tints on the leaves were pleasing to the eye. Viewed as prose literature, it may be said of these lines that:

> All the charm of all the muses,
> Often flowering in a lonely wood.

But in this address there is also clear, deep, strong thought, as clear as the tips of the trees against the skyline, as deep as their roots reaching down into the soil, and as strong as their trunks and branches swaying in the November wind. Had this address possessed the sense of vastness, the tender and rich feeling, and the faultless language, but lacked the clear, deep and strong thought it would never have gripped the mind of man. Had this address possessed this thought, but lacked any one of the other elements, the world indeed would not long have remembered it. But herein is the marvel of the address, and the secret of its power, that it is a perfect blend of these elements, as perfect in its blend as was the November day on which it was spoken, of the elements composing it. Let us notice briefly the thought on government as expressed in this address.

First—The great leader moves beyond the letter of the law to the spirit that inspires government. In retrospect he finds himself in 1776 as the Declaration of Independence is being enacted, not in 1787 as the Constitution of the United States is being written. There is nothing to indicate that he believed the Constitution contradicted the Declaration. Neither is there anything to indicate that he believed the Constitution was the letter of which the Declaration was the spirit. He accepted the document of 1787 as the will of the people expressed in its fundamental law. He was loyal to his oath to "preserve, defend, and protect" this law. Yet for him the great epoch of our history was not 1787, but 1776. Two years before in this same state, while on his way to accept the responsibility of office as president, he said: "I have never had a feeling, politically, that did not spring from the Declaration of Independence." And now, as he again enters the state to dedicate a cemetery on a field of battle, where men lived and died for a great cause, it is but natural that he should sweep back in thought to the other era of action, when men at Bunker Hill, Valley Forge, and Yorktown suffered and died. And so he begins with the words: "Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation." It was the nation then brought forth that the men at Gettysburg and elsewhere were living and dying to maintain.

A Dispute Ignored.

Second—Finding himself in thought back in the region where the emphasis was placed upon freedom through the law rather than upon law as a restriction upon freedom, it is not surprising that in this deathless utterance he ignores the dispute regarding the interpretation of the fundamental law. He ignored this dispute, not because it was distasteful to him or because he considered it of little importance. For he was, as another has finely said, "a man of propositions." In the region of constitutional interpretation he was at home. He ranks with James Wilson and Daniel Webster in masterly grip upon the philosophy of government. He had stated from the platform and in written pronouncement the argument on the mooted question of the states in relation to the Union. He knew all about the reasoning involved in the question of the indivisability of power where lodged in the States forming the Union or in the Union formed by the States. But standing on the field of Gettysburg and in imagination creating the awful loss of life and property there and on a hundred other battlefields, he knew that the cause of all this was not a dispute over a philosophical distinction in the realm of constitutional government, but the cause was a moral difference in conviction regarding the meaning of human life that in skin was black. The doctrine of secession was an effect which in turn became a secondary cause and led to the war. The primary cause was the moral question, whether man in a free government had the right to hold his fellowman in bondage. The occasion was so fundamental in its demand upon the speaker, that there was no place in his utterance for the mention of anything else than primary causes, in the presence of such awful and stupendous results. And so beginning with "four score and seven years ago" he continues a "nation conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

The Purpose of the Conflict.

Third—Having recalled the past with its spirit of freedom, and declared the primary cause of the conflict, he then declares the purpose of the conflict, namely, the maintenance or the overthrow of the government conceived in liberty. There is in the language of this address no word of censure for those who sought to destroy the government, only words of reverent praise for those who were willing to suffer and die for the preservation of government.

There has come into vogue in recent years a disposition to refer to the Civil War as a struggle between the States. It was not, according to these modern thinkers, a struggle against the Union, but a struggle between states in the Union. The states in the South were as patriotic as the states in the North. Both were devoted to the national government, only those in one portion conceived of the nation in a way different from those in the other portion. The intention of those who speak of the Civil War in this way is doubtless worthy. And in so far as this intention indicates a desire to minimize any lingering hostility between the sections of the nation every patriotic citizen will welcome it. But the difficulty with the language is that it is inaccurate and violates the truth of history. Under the healing touch of time, the hostile spirit between the sections of the nation has long since disappeared. And should there still linger a trace of that hostility, a false interpretation of history is not required for its final disappearance. Truth, not error, is the salvation of the present and the hope for the future.

Fortunately the Gettysburg Address, which will live long after these mistaken words of men are forgotten, has no mention in it of a war between the states. In this address, it is a war for the preservation of the nation caused by a rebellion in a part of the nation. As Abraham Lincoln stood upon the battlefield to dedicate this cemetery, he believed the bodies that rested beneath its mounds were those of brave men who had given their lives to maintain the Union. With that exquisite sense of fitness, so characteristic of his noble nature, he did not denounce those who were disloyal to the Union and had caused this loss of life. But he knew, and history has recorded the fact, that while both armies were brave and conscientious, yet one army was loyal and the other army disloyal to the nation conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. And so he says, "now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure . . . We have come to dedicate a portion of that field, as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live."

Departure From the Ideals of Freedom.

Fourth—In the life of a nation, economic prosperity, when secured at the expense of human justice, means a departure from the ideals of freedom. The great leader saw this, as he appeals to his generation, "that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom." But, why a new birth of freedom? Was not freedom born when the liberty bell in 1776 rang? And if the nation was conceived in freedom, why should a portion try to overthrow the nation? If it was a nation, why did the whole permit conditions to develop until a part was anxious to overthrow the whole? The answer to these questions is a familiar one. Cotton became king and stalked through the land with a golden scepter. The nation in its early days trifled with a question of human justice. When the black man through the inventions of the white man in England and America, suddenly became commercially valuable, his moral value became correspondingly of little worth. Slavery at the beginning was morally wrong and would soon disappear. Later slavery was morally wrong, but a necessary evil. Still later slavery was morally right and ordained of God and must be perpetuated. Moral standards were established by economic conditions. But a price had to be paid, and that price was a loss of the ideals of freedom. And a further price paid for this loss of the ideals of freedom, was as measured by the bloodshed. The evidence of this price was before the great emancipator as he looked upon the graves in the cemetery. He knew, as the generation is beginning to know, that economic prosperity may cost too much, certainly if the price paid is a loss of the ideals of freedom.

Fifth—Though the ultimate issue was the worth of man, and this issue was being decided on the field of battle, because the nation had failed to maintain its true standard of man's worth, yet in deciding this issue there was a principle fundamental to representative government involved. That principle was the rule of the people. While Lincoln's words about a "government of the people, by the people and for the people" have been given a wide application, yet as he spoke them they had a definite application. As the question of slavery led away to the constitutional question of state rights, it also led away to another question even more vital, that of the right of the people to rule. Whatever doubt there might be about the southern contention regarding state rights, there could be no doubt about the question of the right of the people to rule. Lincoln had been fairly elected president, and the South, so insistent in its constitutional claim, immediately repudiated its duties under the same Constitution, the correct interpretation of which it was so anxious to safeguard. Economic prosperity at the expense of human justice led in turn to an act of political injustice.

Along with the tendency to speak of the Civil War as a controversy between the states is another modern tendency to compare the action of the southern states with that of the thirteen colonies. And the analogy claimed is something like this: The colonies nullified the laws of Parliament even as the southern states nullified the laws of Congress. The colonies claimed the right to withdraw by revolution from the empire, even as the southern states claimed the right to withdraw from the Union. Had the southern states succeeded, its place in history would have been like that of the colonies which later became a nation. The analogy is interesting, but fails at the vital point. The colonies claimed the right to resist Parliament because of lack of representation. The southern states were always represented, and for most of the time disproportionately represented. They violated a principle of representative government of which they were a part in a sense that the colonies never were, when they refused to abide by the will of the people. And it is this that Lincoln has in mind when he brings his brief but deathless utterance to a close with the words, "That we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain . . . that government of the people, by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

The World's Masterpiece

By General James Grant Wilson

It was the writer's happy privilege to hear several of the most famous speeches delivered before and during the Civil War by the great American of whom Lowell said:

> Here was a type of the true elder race,
> And one of Plutarch's men talked with us face to face.

Lincoln was not only one of the wisest of men, but the English-speaking world is now aware that he was among its greatest orators. This fact was not fully appreciated during his life. The flowers of rhetoric are conspicuous by their absence from his speeches, but it may be doubted if Webster or Burke, Bright or Gladstone, could have found equally beautiful and pure language to express the broad philosophy and the exquisite pathos of the Gettysburg address of half a century ago.

The high tide of the Rebellion broke on the rocky heights and hills of Gettysburg and Vicksburg in the first week of July, 1863. Since that time Grant and Thomas, Sherman and Sheridan, Meade and Hancock, with more than three-quarters of the mighty opposing hosts that met on those hard fought and decisive fields, have crossed the silent river and joined the vast and peaceful bivouac of the dead. Four months later followed the solemn ceremonial of dedicating the Pennsylvania battle ground, destined in the coming centuries to be more famous than Saratoga and Yorktown. It was the first time in American history that such an event had occurred, which circumstance of itself was sufficient to lend interest to the occasion. Lincoln, with several members of his Cabinet, was present, together with many of the nation's most illustrious statesmen and soldiers. It was a cloudless and perfect autumn day, and thousands from far and near were assembled on the forever famous battlefield to listen to the oration of New England's most distinguished and classic living orator. Delivered with his accustomed grace, Edward Everett's long address was smooth and cold, lacking a single stirring thought, vivid picture or patriotic appeal.

Then followed, at a few minutes before two o'clock, the president's short and simple speech, so felicitous and so perfect. Not a sound broke the solemn stillness. The immense audience that was within the sound of his strong tenor and far-reaching voice listened almost breathlessly during its delivery, which occupied precisely 135 seconds. While holding his manuscript of two sheets in his left hand, Lincoln made no use of it. As on the occasion of the president's second inaugural address, in March, 1865, there was a loud outburst of applause at its close, but it may be questioned if, either at Gettysburg or the nation's capital, these brief and perfect examples of English oratory were fully appreciated. They were the crowning efforts of his career as a public speaker. Had Abraham Lincoln made no other, these two gems of our language would have sufficed to have won for him everlasting renown as an orator. Except Washington's farewell address, I know of no important writing that is likely to outlive them. Emerson asserted that "Lincoln's brief speech at Gettysburg will not easily be surpassed by words delivered on any recorded occasion." Gladstone said to the present writer that he "knew of no nineteenth century utterances comparable to it." May we not apply to the address the epithet "immortal," used by Kossuth when in this country, in speaking of Webster's celebrated Hulseman letter?

On the day after the dedication Mr. Everett wrote to the president: "Permit me to express my great admiration of the thoughts expressed by you with such eloquent simplicity and appropriateness at the consecration of the cemetery. I should be glad if I could flatter myself that I came so near the central idea of the occasion in two hours as you did in two minutes." Another less distinguished person who was present writes: "I stood close by and heard that speech delivered. It came upon us, after the ponderous and elaborate rhetoric of Edward Everett, like a blaze of real fire after a matchless picture of fire. It sprang, like the strophes of old, out of a chastened heart, almost broken with the weight of conquest, but still dauntless in its American faith; and the man who spoke the words was for the moment transfigured for us, and his furrowed face and gaunt form took on the light that never was on land or sea, so that he became the archetype of the people themselves, uttering, better than he knew, the great prayer of that finer and better humanity that our fathers and we believed was to come with liberty and equality out of storm and stress."

Said Stanton, the great War Secretary, referring to the two addresses: "Mr. Everett has made a speech that will make three columns in the newspapers, and the president has made one of perhaps forty or fifty lines. Everett's is the speech of a scholar, polished to the last possibility. It is elegant and it is learned; but Lincoln's speech will be remembered as long as anybody's speeches are remembered who speaks in the English language." "This was the truth," adds Charles A. Dana, who relates the incident. "If you will compare these two speeches now you will get an idea how superior genius is to education—how superior that intellectual faculty is which regards everything with the fire of earnestness in the soul—with the relentless purpose of a heart devoted to objects beyond literature."

The president made five copies of the world's masterpiece of rhetorical art. Two were written before its delivery and three were written after his return from Gettysburg. The first was finished the day before his departure from Washington, and on his arrival at Gettysburg Mr. Lincoln made a few slight alterations on the second sheet. This is the copy which he held in his hand, but, as already stated, he did not refer to it in its delivery. It was long in the possession of his secretary and biographer, John G. Nicolay, to whom it was presented by the president, but since his death has unfortunately disappeared, and nothing is now known of it. Luckily it was facsimiled before its loss.

Various Copies of the Address.

The second copy is almost a duplicate of the first, and is believed to be the one its author intended to take with him to Gettysburg, but which in some way was overlooked or forgotten and later, on his return to Washington, was presented to Col. John Hay, and is now in the possession of his family. The third copy of the address was made by Mr. Lincoln at the request of George Bancroft for the Maryland Soldiers' and Sailors' Fair, held in Baltimore in the spring of 1864. Having been inadvertently written on both sides of a sheet, it was unavailable for the purpose of lithographic reproduction in facsimile in a volume entitled "Autograph Leaves of Our Country's Authors," sold for the benefit of the fair, and the president was requested by Mr. Bancroft to make another copy, at the same time granting the historian's wish to retain the first transcript of the address. This is preserved by Mr. Bancroft's family. The fifth copy of the Gettysburg address was also made early in 1864, at the request of Mr. Everett, to be bound with the manuscript of his oration and the president's letter to him of the 20th of November, 1863, in a volume to be sold at the New York Metropolitan Fair for the benefit of the United States Sanitary Commission.

It may be mentioned that among the many differences to be found between the first two versions of the address and the three later ones, the most important are the words "under God," which were interpolated by Mr. Lincoln as he spoke, for they do not appear in the Nicolay or Hay manuscripts, but are a part of the president's final revision, which is, of course, the one that will be inscribed in the Lincoln monument to be erected by the nation in Washington.

Lincoln asserted of the soldiers who fought at Gettysburg that the world would little note or long remember what he said, but that it would never forget what they did. This statement is not true; the words of the orator have had a longer and more memorable life than the deeds they immortalized, and will be remembered through all the endless and everlasting ages.

Manuscript Lincoln Took to Gettysburg.

Executive Mansion,
Washington———, 186 .

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth, upon this continent, a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that "all men are created equal."

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived, and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of it, as a final resting place for those who died here, that the nation might live. This we may, in all propriety, do. But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow, this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have hallowed it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here; while it can never forget what they did here.

It is rather for us, the living, who stand here, to here be dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that, from these honored dead we take increased devotion to the cause for which they here gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve these dead shall not have died in vain; that the nation shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.

The Fourth Copy, Made for Bancroft.

Address delivered at the dedication of the cemetery at Gettysburg.

Four score and seven years ago, our fathers brought forth on this continent, a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field, as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

Gettysburg Fifty Years After.

In all the centuries, with their innumerable wars, there have been few great, decisive battles. The world has been full of bloodshed and carnage and the horrid rapine that goes with war, but among the battles innumerable there have been but few that greatly influenced the world's history or decided the fate of nations.

Creasy in his standard work on the "Decisive Battles of the World" names but fifteen of them between Marathon and Waterloo, and of all that were fought before and since those epoch-making dates none has been greater or more decisive than Gettysburg.

The town of Gettysburg is a peaceful little place, brightened and freshened somewhat since the wartime, to be sure, but only slightly larger than then and not very different in outward appearance.

Several things about the battleground impress the uninitiated visitor. First is its vast extent. It embraces twenty-five square miles. You may ride over it all day and not see it all.

In its monuments and its carefully marked sites of interest it is the most remarkable battlefield of the world. Here, scattered over the hills and fields, are no fewer than 600 monuments and tablets. Most of them are of elaborate and artistic design, costing all the way from a few hundred to a hundred thousand dollars.

The spot of culminating emotions, however, is not the dreadful field of carnage, but the peaceful, beautiful, national cemetery where lie,

Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day, the thousands of brave men, named and nameless. On this spot, within the great semicircle of graves, Lincoln pronounced that most wonderful of orations, simple, brief, eloquent, classic, heart moving—that oration that will live as long as the English language is spoken and whose closing words are engraved on the great national monument which marks the spot where it was delivered.—The Independent.

At Gettysburg

Ramble with me over Culp's Hill and see the breastworks that still remain after fifty years, and then go slowly and reverently out along Hancock's position toward the other end of the line, then stop and look at the inscription which marks the high-water point of the struggle where Alonzo Cushing, a gifted young West Pointer, with the Confederates at the mouth of his guns, held his almost disembowled body together with one hand while he fired his last shot with the other, and then fell dead at the very moment Armistead, the Confederate leader, dropped with a mortal wound a few paces in his front.

Now climb up Little Round Top. Warren's statue stands just where he discovered the Confederate advance on that Thursday afternoon, and sent his staff galloping for reinforcements; here General Strong Vincent and a brother of Bishop Boyd Vincent of Cincinnati, at the head of a brigade fell while leading his men; here General Weed and Lieutenant Hazlett, West Point young men of highest ability, and close friends, fell together during the struggle, and here Colonel Patrick O'Rorke, in his midtwenties, two years out of West Point, a youth of magnificent engineering and soldierly genuis, was shot dead while at the head of his regiment. These bulwarks of stone were built by Union men as their barricade that afternoon and night, as a shelter while defending the place from the fierce and vehement assailments of the enemy!

Verily, there is no place on earth where lovers of liberty and patriotic sons of America can find so much to stir the heart and quicken the very depths of the soul as the field of Gettysburg!—Epworth Herald.

The Name of Old Glory

By James Whitcomb Riley

In Home Folks.

Old Glory! say, who
By the ships and the crew,
And the long, blended ranks of the Gray and the Blue—
Who gave you, Old Glory, the name that you bear
With such pride everywhere,
As you cast yourself free to the rapturous air,
And leap out full length, as we're wanting you to?—
Who gave you that name, with the ring of the same,
And the honor and fame so becoming to you?
Your stripes stroked in ripples of white and of red,
With your stars at their glittering best overhead—
By day or by night
Their delightfulest light
Laughing down from their little square heaven of blue!
Who gave you the name of Old Glory—say who—
Who gave you the name of Old Glory?

The old banner lifted and faltering then
In vague lisps and whispers fell silent again.

Old Glory: the story we're wanting to hear
Is what the plain facts of your christening were—
For your name—just to hear it,
Repeat it, and cheer it, is a tang to the spirit
As salt as a tear—
And seeing you fly, and the boys marching by,
There's a shout in the throat and a blur in the eye,
And an aching to live for you always—or die,
If, dying, we still keep you waving on high.
And so by our love
For you, floating above,
And the scars of all wars and the sorrow thereof,
Who gave you the name of Old Glory, and why
Are we thrilled by the name of Old Glory?

Then the old banner leaped like a sail in the blast
And fluttered an audible answer at last.

And it spake with a shake of the voice, and it said:
By the driven snow-white and the living blood-red
Of my bars and their heaven of stars overhead—
By the symbol conjoined of them all, skyward cast,
As I float from the steeple or flap at the mast,
Or droop o'er the sod where the long grasses nod—
My name is as old as the glory of God.
* * * So I came by the name of Old Glory.

The People's Institute and the Revolution

By Jessie L. P. Brown

Wars may come and rumors of war be exploded, but the People's Institute of Piedras Negras, Mexico, goes on just the same. Not for one day have we closed our doors; in fact our activities have been increased, though they have followed a somewhat different channel than ordinarily.

With the outbreak of hostilities in Mexico City, The People's Institute was sought each day after the papers from the south and north came in. We had four dailies from the City and Monterrey, besides various others, all in Spanish, and the San Antonio papers. After the wrecking of the newspaper offices in the City and the cutting off of railroad communications to the south our files were gradually reduced to periodicals from the north, mostly in English.

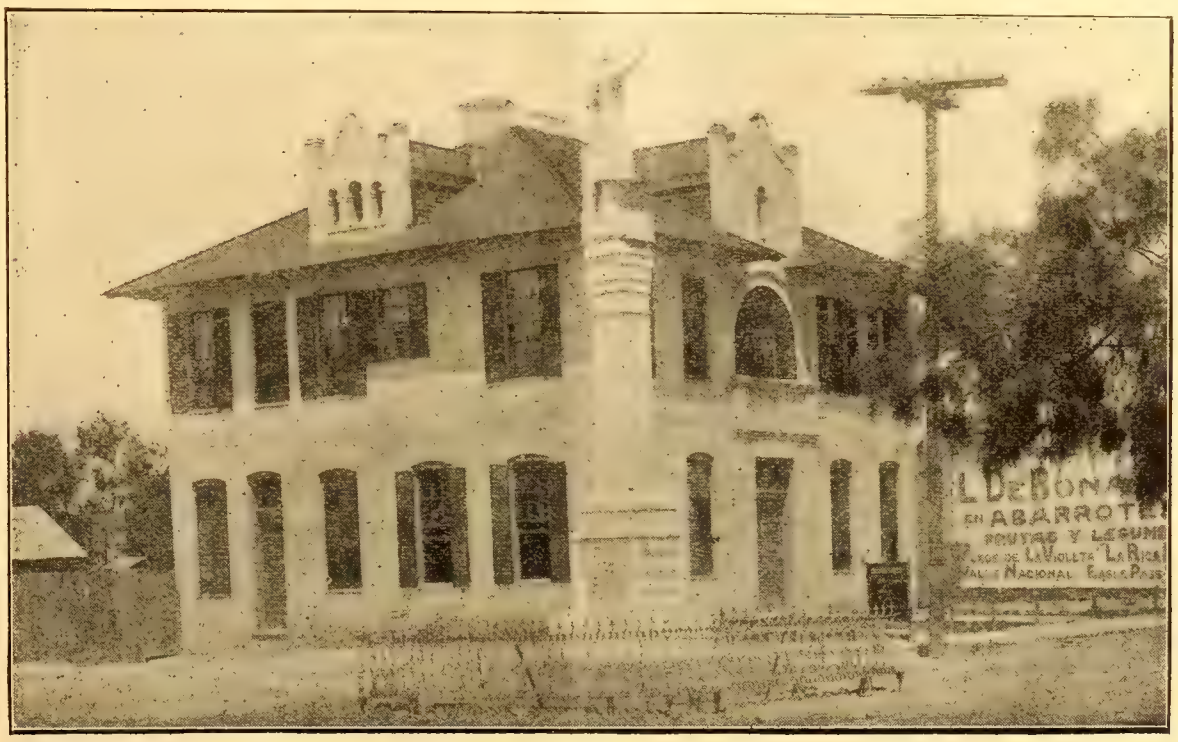
Crowds gathered around the Institute pupils who could read English to hear the war news translated. This volunteer service of the advanced pupils threatened to demoralize all the classes, students preferring to hear the news than to attend classes, so we adopted the plan of having the news translated at the public evening conferences. There was no lack of attendance, I assure you.

One Sunday morning we awoke to find the regular army departing from our midst. We were glad when we saw them pass by. The regular army of Mexico is recruited largely from the convict class, and the soldiers do not inspire confidence, kindly disposed as they were to the Institute because of special conferences we had held for them.

Persistent rumors of a counter-revolution, led by our own Governor, Sr. Carranza, finally were confirmed, and we waited in fear and trembling for the coming of his army to take our city, so important because of its border position. Hundreds of people from southern and central Coahuila, with as many of our own populace, flocked across the international bridge to Eagle Pass, Texas.

Rumors and more rumors. "The rebels are coming, and when they get here they will seize the Institute, plant cannon in it and use it as a base from which to take the federal customs house, across the street! They are going to dynamite the customs-house, and then the Institute will be blown up too!" When the rebels came, as quietly as thieves in the night, they walked past us, placed a patrol to guard the customs-house and us, and got ready for breakfast. For one-half day the reading-room was closed, in fear of undue excitement and crowds, and for several weeks the night classes at the Institute suspended themselves, everybody being in bed early or "on the other side" of the river.

There was activity at the Institute, however. We must provide information and recreation for the railroad shopmen, thrown out of work, many of them our own students and members. The game rooms were made free to everyone, we invited and urged men to come in to play, to read or to hear impromptu Victrola concerts. One morning, Mr. Inman depopulated two saloons next door and across the street and made hardened sinners laugh and cry with Harry Lauder, Caruso, Orville Harrold and Schumann-Heink.



The People's Institute.

Easter we had a morning service, a most impressive one, among the large attendance being Governor Carranza's private secretary and members of his staff to represent him. Later he gave his personal apologies to the Sub-Director at being unable to come, for, said he, "I count it one of my greatest pleasures to visit the People's Institute." Books from our library and maps are consulted frequently by the Carranzistas, and we have loaned

VICE-PRESIDENT MARSHALL'S BIBLE.

The vice-president came in and chatted most pleasantly. An Oxford Bible was lying on the table and under the rubber band encircling it was lettered the vice-president's name. This was spoken of to him, and he answered:

"Oh, yes, I'm very proud of that Bible. My Sunday-school class of young men gave it to me just before we left Indianapolis."

Mrs. Marshall had gone into the other room, and she called out laughingly, "But he'll not tell you how opportunely the Bible came to him, I know."

"Yes, I will," called back the vice-president with an answering laugh. "And I'll leave it to you," turning to a representative, "if the joke is not on Mrs. Marshall rather than on me. When we were packing rather hastily for our Western trip some weeks ago," he resumed, "we packed several boxes for storage, and after they were nailed up and gone I found that Mrs. Marshall had packed away my Bible with the other books."

"And do you know," said Mrs. Marshall, returning to the sitting-room, "that he thinks he can't read this Bible, although it's a lot nicer than his old one."

"That's true," said the vice-president; "it is a fine Bible and I'm very proud of it, but I had used my old Bible for more than twenty years and some way I always seemed able to turn to whatever I wanted in it. It will take some time to become as accustomed to this one."—Christian Herald.

BRYAN AND WHITE RADISHES.

If the Secretary of State had been elbowing his way through the crowds of Donnybrook fair he could not have found things more difficult than when he decided to go to market the other day and pick up something to eat for luncheon. He carried a basket on his arm, and was recognized by the man who sold vegetables.

"I like white radishes; give me a couple of bunches," said the Secretary of State.

"Do you know who that was?" the vegetable man asked the next customer, who happened to be a woman complaining about the last strawberries she bought.

"No! Who was it?" she exclaimed, watching the figure move placidly in and out among the stalls, and forgetting that all the berries in the bottom of that last box were little and soft.

"That's Bryan, the Secretary of State," the vegetable man announced, and then just to show how intimately he knew that great official he added, "Mr. Bryan is crazy about white radishes—he bought some just now!"

"Not really?" Instantly she lost all interest in the quality of berries and ordered another quart of any kind, and subsequently pointed out the great commoner to the man who sold butter and eggs, and told him that the Secretary of State adored white radishes; the butter man's gate was held down by the cheese box, so he crawled under and whispered to the bacon man across the aisle that William Jennings Bryan was looking all over the market for some white radishes, that he could not eat a meal without them. When the news reached the delicatessen woman, she sent her small son to tell her large son, who worked at the meat stall, and thus it was the butcher who was responsible for the final story.

"That's Bryan," he said quietly, trimming a porterhouse. "He's been all over the market for white radishes; he comes himself to pick them out, because sometimes when they're just ordered they send red ones, and he's got to have white or none!"

"Ah," laughed the customer, "he insists upon the silver skin!"

"Yes 'um!" said the butcher.

All of which would not have made the way of the simple life difficult, except for the fact that when the incident came out in the papers it was read by hundreds of people who wanted to send the Secretary of State some white radishes. And they sent them, by messenger, by parcel post, by express, to the utter bewilderment of the Secretary of State and Mrs. Bryan.

"Now, what have I ever said about radishes?" the Secretary asked his wife. "Can't we send some of these to a lawn fete, or something?"—Chicago Record Herald.

ROOSEVELT'S EARLY AMBITION.

"I was a reasonably good student in college, standing just within the first tenth of my class, if I remember rightly; although I am not sure whether this means the tenth of the whole number that entered or of those that graduated. I was given a Phi Beta Kappa 'key,'" writes the former president in his autobiography, being published in the Chicago News. "My chief interests were scientific. When I entered college I was devoted to out-of-doors natural history, and my ambition was to be a scientific man of the Audubon, or Wilson, or Baird, or Coues type—a man like Hart Merriam, or Frank Chapman, or Hornaday, today. My father had from the earliest days instilled into me the knowledge that I was to work and to make my own way in the world, and I had always supposed that this meant that I must enter business. But in my freshman year (he died when I was a sophomore) he told me that if I wished to become a scientific man I could do so. He explained that I must be sure that I really intensely desired to do scientific work, because if I went into it I must make it a serious career; that he had made enough money to enable me to take up such a career and do nonremunerative work of value if I intended to do the very best work there was in me; but that I must not dream of taking it up as a dilettante."

JACK LONDON ON "JOHN BARLEYCORN."

"Temperamentally I am wholesome-hearted and merry. Yet when I walk with John Barleycorn I suffer all the damnation of intellectual pessimism.

"I ride out over my beautiful ranch * * * The air is wine. The grapes on a score of rolling hills are red with autumn flame. * * * I have everything to make me glad that I am alive. * * * I have land, money, power, recognition from the world. * * * Yet with all this good fortune I am sad. And I am sad because John Barleycorn is with me. And John Barleycorn is with me because I was born in what future ages will call the Dark Ages before the age of rational civilization. John Barleycorn is with me because in all the unwitting days of my youth John Barleycorn was accessible, calling to me and inviting me on every corner, and on every street between the corners. The pseudo-civilization in which I was born permitted everywhere licensed shops for the sale of soul poison. The system of life was so organized that I—and millions like me—was lured and drawn and lured to the poison shops."—Saturday Evening Post.

RILEY AT HOME.

An Indianapolis lawyer, with a friend, motored down to Greenfield, Ind., the birthplace of James Whitcomb Riley, the Hoosier poet. They had dinner at the hotel, and thought they would like to see the house where Riley lived. So they asked the hotel man:

"Where is the Riley house?"

"I don't know any hotel by that name," he replied; "though there may be some such boarding house here."

"I mean the James Whitcomb Riley house," said the lawyer, thinking his host had misunderstood.

"I don't know him; you may be able to find his name in the city directory."

"I guess he's moved," said the lawyer as he aimlessly thumbed the directory.

"Probably," the hotel keeper commented. "Some of them Irish don't stay long in a place!"—Saturday Evening Post.

EX-PRESIDENT TAFT ON PAST AND PRESENT.

In a recent interview with a New York Sun reporter who asked the former President to comment on differences between the Yale of the present time and the Yale of his own student days, Mr.—now Professor—Taft responded:

"I am quite clear that students' dissipations—what we call 'bumming'—prejudice their standing among their fellows now much more than they did with us. It really seems to me that the college world of my day was rougher. There was less refinement then, and there was a certain theory among many of the students that a man needed to be seasoned by a little exposure to dissipation in order to be a good fellow and really get the most out of his college course. I am very certain that the moral tone of the college and moral standards among the young are much higher now than they were in my day."

JOHN D. MATCHED FOR ONCE.

Once when John D. Rockefeller was playing golf a negro lad crossed the links. Mr. Rockefeller had just given the ball a vigorous stroke, and the lad received the missile squarely on the head. It was a heavy blow, but it only stunned the boy a little, and after blinking his eyes for a moment he was himself again.

Mr. Rockefeller, who had rushed up fearing that the boy had been badly injured, was relieved to find that he took it so calmly, and pulling a five-dollar bill from his pocket, he gave it to the youngster as a salve for his feelings.

The boy looked at the bill and grinned with delight. Then he looked at Mr. Rockefeller and inquired: "When is you goin' to be playin' again?"—Ladies' Home Journal.

THE DOMINANT NOTE.

Dr. Lyman Abbott was discussing without bitterness at a luncheon in New York his ousting from the presidency of a peace society.

"The ideal of peace is divine and superb," he said, "and this ideal will some day be realized. But, at present, man is a pretty selfish animal."

Smiling and shaking his head, Dr. Abbott added:

"In the great cry for universal peace, the howl of the under dog is the dominant note."—Daily Magazine.

BEECHER STOOD CORRECTED.

A deacon in Plymouth Church, who was a prominent grain broker had a habit of waving his handkerchief in case Mr. Beecher made a wrong quotation, as he was quite a literary man. Mr. Beecher stated that the crop of corn in Maine was 300,000 bushels short. Here the handkerchief began to flutter, and Mr. Beecher shouted, "I mean 3,000,000,000."

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

A Tribute to Clara Barton

["The Educational Ideal Represented by Clara Barton's Character and Work," was the subject of a lecture given recently by Miss J. H. Gulliver of Rockford college, Rockford, Ill., in Chicago at the Clara Barton memorial breakfast. She spoke in part as follows:]

"Clara Barton belongs not only to a single state but to the whole country. She belongs not only to the whole country but to the whole civilized world. She belongs not only to the age in which she lived but she belongs to all time. Why? Because in her was developed a type of womanhood that is, as I profoundly believe, a universal type, to be realized increasingly, after the measure of individual ability, not by one woman but by a multitude of women which no man can number, because the ideal so nobly actualized by Clara Barton takes hold on eternity and on immortality.

"What is this ideal?

"Clara Barton had a power of business organization that enabled her to set in operation activities as wide in their scope as the civilized world itself. She was a woman whose whole training fostered habits of precision and of accuracy.

"These characteristics are generally supposed to belong exclusively to the masculine mind. Clara Barton has conclusively proved the contrary in her own case. That she is not an exception is being shown increasingly. Not only by other great women who have worked creatively in various fields, such as Sophie Germain, one of the creators of mathematical physics; Caroline Herschel, Mrs. Sommerville, Lady Huggins, Madame Curie and others, but by women of the rank and file in institutions of learning in this country and in Europe and by the splendid work that is being done by organized bodies of women everywhere.

"Whatever may be our views as to the desirability of the suffrage for women, it seems clear that it will be an actuality in the not far distant future. That we are entering upon a new era for women is further evidenced not only by the fact that individual women have entered all the professions that are open to men, with the exception of the Army and the Navy, but that millions of them are working in industry, trade and agriculture.

New Era is Here.

"A new era such as was presaged by the supposed exclusively masculine intellectual qualities of Clara Barton is here, and with it a demonstration that those qualities, or something like them, are not only going to be demanded but are being demanded not of a woman here and there but of women in general.

"Clara Barton not only dreamed dreams and saw visions but she had the practical efficiency and the whole-souled devotion to go herself into the horror and the din and the ghastly bloodshed of battlefield after battlefield. 'We have all that is needed,' she would assure the stricken men, and with her own hands, often directly under fire, ministered to them as they longed to be ministered unto. 'No danger daunted her, no sight was too repulsive,' we are told.

"Here again Clara Barton became a prophecy of the type of woman that the future was to demand.

"Much has been said for lo, these many years, about the necessity of admitting only cultural subjects into college curricula, and much prejudice in some quarters is still in vogue against admitting into them the so-called practcal or vocational courses.

"Now I submit that if our colleges, more particularly our women's colleges, are going to continue to insist that the training of the mind is something that must be kept virginally pure from any specific thing for which the mind is supposed to be trained, they will be effaced presently from off the earth as having no vital function to perform.

Study Strategic Points.

"In educational practice, as in a military campaign, certain strategic points should be studied. Even if we cannot readjust our definitions of cultural and vocational so as to conform to long-established educational traditions, let us wake up to the awful needs of the times in which we are living, and the emergency calls for women who can meet those needs.

"And what are some of these strategic points that especially call for what women can do? At the Child Welfare exhibit held in Chicago not long since a light flashed and went out every thirty seconds, and every time it went out it meant the going out of the life of a child somewhere in the civilized world. If, instead of every half minute, it had come and gone every two and one-half minutes and a little over, it would have meant the preventable going out of the life of a child somewhere in the United States. Why?

"Because of ignorance, we are told. What is the most potent influence that will put a stop to it? Again comes the answer—'imparted and applied knowledge.' Knowledge of what? Of a 'more suitable environment for both parents and children, fresh air, sunlight, exercise, suitable clothing, and habitations, and, last but not least, proper food.' Personal hygiene related to the family and to the community—knowledge of the primary life needs, food, shelter and clothing, you observe.

"Now at Rockford college, while we believe in a thorough, all-round training and are giving it so that it is accepted by the first class universities and colleges, we also believe that a fifth part of a girl's work while she is in college can be profitably devoted to work in home economics, which, if I had time, I could show you trains the students along all these emergency lines. Most of the women's colleges in the Middle West are training girls along these lines.

Tradition Broken in West.

"It is easier to break away from the old academic traditions here than it is at the East. Every woman's college in this section ought to have its hands upheld and its resources enlarged, so that the prejudice against a training that shall fit women to take their places at once with Clara Barton on the firing line of humanity might be banished by the adequate, scholarly, splendid achievement of these colleges.

"We are pleading with you to lead the way and set the example of broad philanthropy by establishing a memorial at Rockford college to Clara Barton, that the white flame of devotion with which we are trying to actualize the ideals which she embodies may not now be permitted to fail humanity's need for lack of proper fuel.

"Miss Barton, with her seer-like prescience of mind, foresaw the time when the Red Cross should cease to deal merely with wars, pestilences and famines, and should lead the van in the fight against tuberculosis, insanitary surroundings, infant mortality and what not.

No One Lives for Self Alone.

"No man liveth unto himself and no man dieth unto himself, when it comes to a question of infectious diseases, which in so many cases are preventable filth diseases—grim reapers of death in our midst.

"We believe at Rockford college that the great and abiding function of woman is not to compete with man along his own lines but rather to bring her own peculiar contribution to the world's work that will enable her to co-operate most effectively with her natural partner man, in helping to roll this old world into the light."

People's Institute and Revolution games to the wounded and disabled officers.

During Director Inman's absence, whenever there has happened any unusual disturbance or excitement in town, a messenger or officer has come to advise us that there is no danger and please not to be frightened. One officer looked around at the pictures, asked the meaning of "Ruth and Naomi," and when one of the Mexican preachers told him the story, he bought a Bible eagerly, and hurried away to read the story for himself.

Governor Carranza always has been a friend of the Institute, so, as usual, official calls were paid on him and his family, and returned the next day by Señora Carranza and the charming daughters, the Governor being detained by official duties. During one call at the Governor's palace we suggested that the beautiful flower gardens were being neglected, that the banana plants ought to be relieved of their winter wrappings. The chief of Secret Service replied in excellent English, "War and flowers are not very compatible. We have been too busy with the one to think about the other." The next day there was a gardiner appointed from the forces and when Easter came the garden was thrown open to us to gather flowers for our services. Director Inman gathered armfuls of white iris, a beautiful substitute for Easter lilies.

In truth Governor Carranza and his family are so delightful, his officers and men have been so courteous and obliging that we have felt perfectly secure, lulled to sleep by their sentry calls. The city never has been safer or cleaner than under the martial rule of the Carranzistas. The Institute has gained this much directly from the revolution. Men from all parts of Mexico have become acquainted with the work of the Institute and have learned to seek us for social, educational and religious help, and will no doubt spread the good news all over Mexico that up on the northern border there is an institution that is helping their country-men become better citizens, more efficient workers, and leaders with ideals that will raise Mexico to her proper place among the nations.

Religiously, the work seems to be at the beginning of a harvest. There were two baptisms last week, and at the services yesterday two promising young men spoke of their intentions to lead a Christian life, and another made serious inquiry about the gospel story.

Disciples Table Talk

Franklin Circle, Cleveland, Reports.

W. F. Rothenburger, pastor, and assistant, Miss Jennie Jenkins, of Franklin Circle Church, are rejoicing in the annual report given at the recent annual meeting. One hundred and seventy accessions were reported, 131 of these by confession, 70 as a direct result of a union campaign of West Side churches under Dr. Milford H. Lyon, and the remainder at regular services. The Sunday-school is nearing an average of 500. The treasurer's report showed the annual budget to be $12,077, $4,452 of which was appropriated for missions and benevolences, with a balance in the various treasuries of $593. The church has been open nearly every night during the busy season, its men have taken a prominent part in the Cleveland Disciples' Union, and in the City Federation of Churches, and its pastor is the Chairman of the Social Betterment committee of the latter organization. It is a Living-link in the Foreign Society, one of its families supports another missionary on the foreign field, and C. M. Burkhardt of Coshocton, Ohio, is its Living-link at home. The church wil conduct a six weeks' Vacation school for the children of the streets. There will be three paid teachers of experience with a number of volunteer helpers. The school will run five days in the week, with a morning session only, consisting of Bible study, the telling of Bible stories, singing religious and patriotic hymns, and in the afternoon the boys, under the direction of a trained specialist, will be taken to the play grounds, parks, and Y. M. C. A. for recreation.

New Mexico—West Texas Convention.

P. J. Rice reports that the sixth convention of the New Mexico-West Texas Christian Misionary Society, held at Roswell, New Mexico, June 5-9, was attended by delegates from every part of the territory covered by the society and was enthusiastic from the beginning to the close. The general interests of the churches were represented by Grant K. Lewis, Guy Inman, J. H. Mohorter and R. P. Shepherd. The addresses given by these men were all of a high order. F. F. Grimm, who has been secretary of the society since the founding, will retire from that position the first of September. He has been a faithful and efficient servant through all these years and retires over the universal protest of all concerned. His successor has not yet been secured, but will be in a short time. W. E. Garrison, who has been president of the Board since the beginning of the organization, also retires from connection with the society on account of leaving the state. Reports were made concerning settlements in irrigated valleys somewhat remote from railroads where no religious privileges are enjoyed. It is the purpose of the Board to minister to these fields by sending itinerant workers into them wherever possible. It is the settled policy of the society not to enter fields that are already overchurched, and to encourage co-operation among churches where there are now more organizations than the community is able to support. Upon investigation it was found that there are twelve religious organizations in one community of about one thousand people and that in the past about two thousand dollars from various home missionary boards have been expended each year in seeking to keep alive the denominational churches. Several of these churches are considering a plan of co-operation. The Christian church is one of these and the society will lend its encouragement to this program unless some better plan may be suggested. A majority of the newly elected Board reside in El Paso, but other sections are represented by H. P. Williams, of Albuquerque, New Mexico, Ed. S. Gibbony and the veteran, Frank Talmage, of Roswell, New Mexico. P. J. Rice was elected president of the Board for the coming year and Dr. R. B. Homan will continue as recording secretary. Zwinglius Moore was elected president of the next convention which will be held at Las Vegas, New Mexico. Mr. Rice says that the great problem in the southwest is to secure competent men who will come into this rapidly developing section and remain as missionary pastors through a period of years. Wherever such men have been located, as is the case at Deming and at Albuquerque the work has made splendid progress.

A New Missionary Secretary.

Stephen J. Corey writes: "We feel that the foreign society is exceptionally fortunate in securing Bert Wilson, of Lincoln, Neb., as a special secretary. He has been very successful as western secretary of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, and prior to this service was professor of English literature in Cotner University. As student, pastor, teacher, and leader of men, he has shown exceptional qualities of leadership. He comes to his newly chosen work with enthusiasm and is already doing some very effective field work. He has always had the missionary passion. The plant is to have Mr. Wilson do special field work for the coming year in connection with the united missionary campaign and other movements, and then locate at Kansas City as district secretary of the Foreign Society."

Chinese Sunday-school, Troy, N. Y.

J. H. Craig, minister at Troy, N. Y., reports the success of the Chinese Sunday-school connected with the Troy church. As an indication of the spirit of this school a fine Children's Day offering is reported. Fifteen are enrolled.

Missouri's Convention.

The Missouri State Convention, which was held at Fulton, June 18-20, was addressed by G. D. Edwards, of Columbia; S. M. Perkins, of Kansas City; Pres. R. H. Crossfield, of Transylvania University; Judge L. N. Haymaker, of Wichita, Kans.; Pres. J. L. Garvin, of William Woods; A. W. Taylor, of Columbia, and several others, including the national secretaries. Reports received from the six colleges and universities of Christian denomination in Missouri showed the valuation of property, $1,300,000; endowment, $1,033,500; increase in endowment this year, $238,400; student attendance, 1,396. The convention approved the organization of a state educational commision under the direction of the state board. The commission is to be made up of acting heads of the educational institution of the states and a member from each of the Board of Trustees of the colleges and universities. Graham Frank of Kansas City was named temporary chairman of the commission. The following officers were elected: President, Levi Marshall of Nevada; vice-president, G. C. Chapman of Joplin; secretaries, W. C. Whitehouse of Columbia and Charles Swift of Centralia; railroad secretary, E. E. Elliott of Kansas City; members of the State Board, L. J. Marshall, F. L. Bowen and R. G. Frank of Kansas City The 1914 convention will be held at Moberly.

Disciples Picnic.

About 1,500 Chicago (including suburbs) Disciples, from Sunday-schools and churches, enjoyed a picnic at Jackson Park, June 28. Among the interesting features were athletic contests; a ball game between ministers and superintendents (The superintendent who furnished these notes refuses to divulge the final score); an old-fashioned picnic dinner; and the opening of the bathing beach at Jackson Park. O. A. Rosboro, of Englewood, was chairman of the executive committee in charge of the event.

EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

West Point, Va., H. D. Coffey, evangelist; Chas. E. McVay, singer and helper; 5; continuing.

Dugger, Ind., Melnotte Miller, pastor; Small and Bellew, evangelist; 50; continuing.

South Bend, Ind., First, G. W. Hemry, pastor; Fife Brothers, evangelists; 180; continuing.

Paris, Tex., J. T. Ogle, pastor; Minges Company, evangelists; 400; continuing.

Green Zay, Wis., J. Harry Bullock, pastor; B. L. Wray, evangelist; 23; closed.

CALLS.

Ross Williams, Douglas, Neb.

A. L. Akin, Pond Creek, Okla., to West Wichita.

Hugh A. Smith, Dayton to Milton, Ohio.

G. W. Burch, Charles City, Iowa, to Salina, Kans.

ADDITIONS TO CHURCHES.

Hamilton College

Last week marked the closing of the forty-fourth session of this institution. The baccalaureate sermon was preached by Roger T. Nooe, of Frankfort, Kentucky. The commencement address was delivered by Dr. Peter Ainslie, of the Christian Temple, Baltimore. Diplomas and certificates of merit were delivered by President Shearin to the twenty-two young women, who had finished their respective courses. Five of these were awarded to graduates in the new Junior College Course, a two years' extension of the curriculum. The winner of the scholarship honor in this course, the highest within the bestowal of the college, was Miss Dazey Moore Porter, daughter of Professor and Mrs. J. W. Porter, of Lexington, Kentucky. Mr. Porter will be cordially remembered by many of Hamilton's 785 alumnae as a former instructor.

Other noteworthy events were the certificate recitals in music and expression. The former was under the direction of the head of the music faculty, Miss Grace D. Pickett, of the New England Conservatory of Music, and for nearly four years a personal pupil of Leschetizky in Vienna. The second was directed by Miss Julia W. Connelly, of the department of Expression, a one-time member of Miss Julia Marlowe's Company in Shakespearean roles. The Marlowe Club, under her direction, also presented two plays during the week, one from the French, and the other dealing with old English scenes and characters. The Class Day program was one of the best ever given on the campus, followed by the interesting ritual of the planting of the Ivy on the College Lawn.

The attendance for the season has been somewhat larger than usual, 296 different students having enrolled during the year. Of this number 132 resided in the dormitories. An encouragingly large number of those entering were previously graduates of standard high schools.

The College Y. M. C. A. has flourished as never before, as have the Mission Study classes. The student offering for the support of their "living-link" teacher among the girls of Wuhu, China, was almost double the amount subscribed last year, and asked for this year. In addition, $47 was raised for hospital work in Lexington.

New members on the teaching force for next year are Miss Grace Cameron, B. A., of the University of Michigan, formerly a member of the faculties of William Woods and of Eureka Colleges. She comes to the chair of German here; also, Professor Ralph Records, A. M., formerly of the staff at Virginia Christian College, comes to the work in Science at Hamilton. Two of the instructors during the session just closed are now abroad in Europe for summer study and travel—Miss Caroline W. Berry, of the department of Mathematics, and Miss Catherine V. Wilson, an instructor in Modern Language. President Shearin was on leave of absence in the East during the fall and winter months, returning to resume his duties of administration at the beginning of the second half-year.

About 100 students in attendance upon the Annual Summer School of Methods are now occupying the dormitories of Hamilton College, the usefulness of which is thus prolonged into the vacation season.

From the Central East

The season finds our churches in excellent conditions. All are supplied with pastors, who are giving good service. The First Church, Hagerstown, is planning a model Bible-school addition to their auditorium. They have already raised $10,000 to start the building. They have in Geo. B. Townsend a model pastor. It will be a great combination when their improvements are completed.

Benning, D. C., will also build an addition to the Strauss Memorial Church. All departments of the work are growing under the ministry of A. W. Gottschall. Since the coming of H. F. Lutz to Washington, the church is taking on new life. The minister led in tearing down the old meeting house, and plans for the new structure will soon be completed.

Calhoun St., Baltimore, celebrates in August its twenty-fifth anniversary. Francis Scott is closing the best year of his ministry there. He finds frequent use for his new baptistry.

E. B. Bagby reports sixty additions the past year and more than $3,000 raised. Nearly $2,000 has been raised in cash and pledges for their debt fund.

Peter Ainslie has postponed his trip to Europe until next spring. He will remain in Baltimore and preach the apostolic gospel, unmixed with any credism, popery, or heresy. Bro. Ainslie is trying to work up a revival which shall last all through the hot term.

Ninth St., Washington, is planning for a mortgage burning July 13. Pastor Geo. Miller is planning an extensive Canadian tour in August.

Earle Wilfley of the Vermont Ave. Church, will give a series of lectures on "The Fundamentals of Faith" at Mt. Sterling, Ky., and then settle in the Pioneer Cottage, Bethany Beach, Del. The program at the Bethany Beach Assembly will be an attractive one this season. Having spent three seasons there I can recommend this resort to any who want coolness, comfort and good fellowship.

We are now busy planning for our best state convention at the Harlem Ave. Church, Baltimore, September 16. 17 and 18.

Edward B. Bagby.

From Pennies to Thousands

During the past few weeks the individual gifts received by the National Benevolent Association have varied from eleven cents (from a tiny little girl) to four thousand dollars (from a long-time friend). The givers to this cause of benevolence range in years from the little tot, who has not yet learned to write, to the aged and feeble disciple who can scarcely hold the pen. The rich and the poor unite their thousands and their mites in this blessed ministry of the helping hand. Great, strong business men of large affairs, and queenly women with tenderest mother-hearts join in the support and in the guidance of this benevolent enterprise.

One hundred dollars will care for a child for a whole year, one dollar will support him three days. Send something today. Ask us about our Annuity plan by which you serve others and yourself as well.

Mrs. Jeannette H. Wells

Death has been busy with the leaders of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in the past few months. In the winter, Mrs. Sara K. Yancey, for more than a decade of years the efficient and beloved corresponding secretary of the Kentucky Christian Woman's Board of Missions, was called suddenly from the life of service here to life everlasting above; in the early spring, our great national secretary, Mrs. M. E. Harlan, was taken from us; and more recently Mrs. Jeanette H. Wells, after long illness and suffering, entered into that life, where there is no more sickness and pain.

For a number of years, Mrs. Wells had been a member of the National Executive Committee of the Women's Board as well as the president of the Indiana Christian Woman's Board of Missions. The duties of the offices of state president vary greatly; in some states, they consist mainly in attendance on state board meetings, and presiding at the annual conventions; but Mrs. Wells did much field and clerical work as well; I am sure all her co-workers would bear me out in saying that she was the main spring, the very heart of the Indiana work. She had those two qualities which are essentials in all true leadership; she was not only abundant and untiring in her own labors, but able, also, to inspire others with her love and loyalty to the great cause of missions. She was of a singularly genial and social nature, and loved her friends warmly and was deeply loved by them; she was full of generous impulses, and could never do enough for her friends; her lovely home was a true house of rest for many, and her great joy was to share with others the bounties with which God had blessed her. How many times has she opened the doors of her home, and of her warm, loving heart to others, and how many there are who will bear her gracious hospitality in life-long remembrance!

Her counsel on the executive committee was always valuable; her friends and fellow workers will miss her sadly in their monthly meetings; her vivid and delightful personality, her long familiarity with the work, her clear grasp of its scope, as well as of its details will make a gap that can hardly be filled; and she was growing in value and efficiency all the time.

Probably, her most conspicuous service was her work for the Missionary Training School, now our College of Missions. When Indiana pledged twenty-five thousand dollars to the new enterprise, she threw herself heart and soul to the work. In order to know it thoroughly and present it persuasively, she visited the principal missionary Training Schools of other churches.

Many a life is poorer, many a heart is sadder because of the passing of this richly gifted, generous, warm-hearted woman—as is the life and the heart of the one who pens these lines!

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF OUR TALK

CHICAGO

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointedby churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

The Significance of Our Talk

We greatly undervalue talk. "Talk is cheap" is a current proverb. "Deeds, not words," the world is demanding. Talk is not cheap; and the world needs words as truly as deeds. The world had deeds before man was created, and some of them were very lovely deeds. Birds were singing their songs without words and winging their beautiful and wordless flight and nesting and mating and loving, and there was much of deed in the world that was good. But the world became human when there were words to be spoken and some one who could speak them and hear them.

The Pentateuch antedated public schools. We have made public schools and Sunday-schools a substitute for parental instruction. Moses did not say, "Thou shalt send thy son to Sunday-school where some pious young woman may relieve thee of thy duty of teaching him," nor did he say, "Thou shalt present him a nicely bound Bible and tell him to read it while thou dost read the Sunday paper." He depended on no school or printed book. He depended on fathers talking to their children.

Moses said: And these words which I command thee this day shall be in thy heart: and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down and when thou risest up.

We could well afford to lock up all the Bibles in the world for a whole year if during that year fathers would daily talk to their children of religious things.

Books are good, but did not Plato teach us that he who invented letters destroyed memory?

If we had no books we should have to talk about the things we really care for lest we forget them.

What do you talk about in your home? A great variety of things, no doubt. But what, judged by the prevailing topics of conversation are the chief interests of your homes? Would your son be more or less likely to enter the noblest of all callings and be a minister of the Gospel by reason of the habitual conversation of the home? Do you commonly talk of trivial or of great themes? Is your habitual tone of conversation so reverent, so sympathetic, toward all good that it reinforces all your moral lessons?

Of course you teach your children good things, so far as you teach them at all, but in what tone, and with what emphasis, do you daily speak of the church, of duty, and of life's great interests? Of which have you talked most in the last week, religion, amusements or gossip?

Jesus asked his disciples what they had been talking about as they walked by the way. They were ashamed to tell him. They had not supposed that it mattered much what they talked of in that incidental way. But it mattered more than almost anything else.

So far we speak of incidental talk, and its large relation to education and the formation of character. We need not speak of the evil of gossip. We are not considering anything so small and mischievous as that. But let us not fail to speak of the value of good language, yes, of eloquence. Eloquence has fallen into disrepute. We rarely hear it in court or legislature. Courts want arguments backed by legal decisions. Legislatures want statistical presentations. Eloquence has nearly died beneath the dome of the capitol and at the bar. Men speak slightingly of it as of something cheap. We like the after-dinner speech with the well worn story, but we are a little amused at oratory.

Make no mistake. The art of graceful, forceful and persuasive speech is an eternal art among men, and I think will have its place in other worlds. "In the beginning was the Word." The Word is the eternal fact.

"Chaste conversation," writes Dr. Jowett, "is more than a noble selection of words and more than purified speech, it is speech filled with grace and with all the refinements of love. Now the Holy Spirit is the minister of spiritual beauty, the appointed Power to bring finished graces to all the powers of the soul." Thus is our conversation, which we think of as trivial, brought into the realm of the things that are highest, the eternal things.

Learn good words. Learn to pronounce them well. Avoid careless and slovenly diction. Select your words carefully. Clothe your thoughts in fitting words. I like to think of the farmer boy delivering orations as he treads in the furrow. I like to think of him as composing great speeches while he does his farm work. Even if a man has no thought of ever being an orator he should choose his words well, pronounce them well, and utter them with precision and force and grace.

"The words that I speak unto you," said Jesus, "they are spirit, and they are life." They are immortal. Let us be sure that our words are such as are worthy of immortality.

Commit Thy Ways unto the Lord

We are apt to take ourselves too seriously. It is true, each of us has important work to do and we ought to hold ourselves responsible for our part of the world's work. But we are not general managers of the universe. The machinery was going when we arrived on the earth and it will continue to go after our departure. We shall save ourselves much trouble if we look about and discover the corner into which we fit and devote our time to the task of cleaning out the rubbish in it and making it habitable for man.

By committing our ways unto the Lord we lay down authority which does not belong to us and we cease to be anxious about many things that have worried men in all ages. The church has often been unwilling to trust in the Lord: it has used its authority to keep men in the right paths. That it is ceasing to exercise a certain kind of authority is evidence that it is coming to appreciate the power of faith. Instead of attempting to force men into the kingdom and to keep them there by external authority, it is more and more anxious to understand the truth and speak it clearly. It is ambitious to describe things as they are and to point out what they ought to be. Its faith is that when the truth is spoken in love, the word will not be void.

There has always been a good deal of worry over prosperous wickedness. The man of God is convinced that righteousness and love are the foundation of social and individual success. He is therefore puzzled and grieved that the wicked seem to prosper. He frets himself and begins to question the ways of God. The psalmist gives him a word of comfort by reminding him that he is not obliged to settle every question that comes up. The good man is not wholly good and the bad man is not wholly bad. The wisest man would soon be at his wit's end if he were compelled to pass upon the question of rewards for the men whom he knows most intimately. He would be in despair before he had disposed of one man's merits and demerits.

But shall we not judge whether our own lot is good or bad? If we give up trying to regulate the universe, it may seem to us that we have left much that will cause anxiety. Let us be sure that we know what the problem is. The psalmist certainly does not mean that we shall so think of God's care over us as to remove from our minds all sense of duty with respect to dark experiences. If we did not have experiences that tax the brain to explain, we should not need reason; instinct would be a sufficient guide and our place would be with the horse and the dog. The function of reason is to guide us in places that are strange. We grow in intelligence by means of the problems we have to solve. To cast the lot upon Jehovah is not just a simple and easy way of retiring from mental labor; it is to establish a basis for prolonged and exacting toil. Such toil is satisfying because it is undergone in the faith that it is worth while, that it will not be in vain.

Illustrations of trust in the Lord abound in history. The apostles, standing before the highest tribunal of their nation at Jerusalem, declared in defiance of that tribunal, that they ought to obey God rather than men. They knew what it was to commit their ways unto the Lord. The particular events of their careers might be unpleasant, but they were confident that the outcome would justify them in accepting hardship and danger for the sake of the gospel. Paul committed himself unto the Lord in his mission to the Gentiles. He preached a gospel that was strange to many of his Jewish brethren who thought they were disciples of Christ. Paul believed that the gospel was for all men, that racial badges were to be discarded, and that only such things were required as belonged to a universal religion. His boldness was not foolhardiness, for it was based upon acquaintance with God that gave the knowledge of what was an essential part of the gospel and what was not.

In telling his disciples not to be anxious about food and clothing, Jesus was putting the emphasis on the great things of life. He was not asking that men cease to provide for the future. Some of us are so busy getting a living that we have no time to live. Men give up home life for business. They are strangers to their children. Bill Nye tells us of a young man who wrote that he wanted to lecture, that he had bought a dress suit and the only thing needed was a lecture. The answer he got from Bill Nye was that a good lecturer begins with his lecture and that he considers the suit merely an adjunct. We talk about being friends to each other when the fundamental things of friendship are neglected. Jesus bids us trust God by putting first things first, no matter what calamities seem to threaten us for doing so. [Midweek service, July 16. Ps. 37:5; 55:22; Matt. 6:25.] S. J.

The Touch of Midas

All things that Midas touched turned into gold. It was a fatal gift. Some men still have it. Touch what they will, it turns to money. They coin their ideals. Their education and ability become valuable merely as these are capable of becoming coin. They estimate the very salvation of the souls of men in terms of what it costs to support churches and to carry the Gospel to the heathen. Alas for Midas! He is a member of the church in good and regular standing, and still the curse of that touch is on him. He is incapable of thinking of anything in terms of anything but cash.

There is a certain rare gift, possessed by few men, of reversing the touch of Midas. They are able to touch gold and transform it into other and wonderful forms. In their hands it becomes the means of erecting churches, of supporting the preaching of the Gospel, of transforming character. These men of vision see all these things in that much despised vessel, the contribution box. Not everyone has that prophetic gift. It is much more rare than that of Midas. And as the gift of Midas was poor, and vulgar and a curse, the gift of those who reverse the process is glorious.

A Little Sermon on Summer Vacations

The text, Dearly Beloved, is found in the book of Acts, "Now they that were scattered abroad, traveled, preaching the word." Not all of them were ministers; indeed very few of them were; and it was not for the sake of preaching they were scattered abroad. But as they went they preached, each of them in his own way. They attended religious services in the various places in which they were spending the summer. They found ways of letting it be known that they were Christians. They did not make it harder for the people among whom they were staying to keep the Sabbath. They gave encouragement to those with whom they sojourned, and left them with a better knowledge of what the religion of Jesus really meant. There is reason to believe that that outing from the city of Jerusalem, accomplished under circumstances of more difficulty than attend the ordinary summer vacation, resulted in a wide extension of the Gospel. Beloved, many of you are going forth, scattered abroad. As you go, preach. Let the fact that you are Christians be unobtrusively evident to all to whom you shall come. Into whatever house you enter, may peace enter with you and abide, and when you depart may there remain behind you the memory of a gracious friend of Jesus who has taught some new accent of his Gospel.

Plant a Flower

The practical lesson that we cannot eat our cake and have it too is one we learn very slowly. That is a blessing. In youth we own the bakery on the strength of our penny. The bun, the tart, the cookie with the raisin and the cookie with the hole in the middle—we own them all potentially in the golden moment before we have parted with our cent and make our choice with its inevitable limitation. In middle life we remind ourselves, and do it over and over, that we cannot have our cake and eat it too. It is a necessary lesson, but a solemn one, and it ought not to be learned too violently. We ought to make more of the golden hours in which we have but a penny, yet possess all things.

It is inevitable that some of the hopes of youth should die. But let none of them die without planting a flower on their grave. For something very precious has gone out of our lives whenever we discover that we are facing a condition and not a theory.

Vain hopes ought to give place to the hopes that abide. But even the illusions of youth are precious. Even the pot of gold at the rainbow's end is worth chasing, and sad is the day when one thinks he discovers that there is no pot of gold there.

Who knows that no pot of gold is there? Do not too soon desist from the pursuit of a worthy ideal. Do not too soon give up the hope of being and attaining all that you ever thought possible.

Nay, learn that there are ways of enjoying the cake that you leave in the bakery as well as the one you munch.

And if now and then you must bury some hope that once you cherished, plant a flower above it. The grave of a hope ought to be made to bloom.

Do you understand what this little editorial means?

It is a lesson worth learning.

Have you learned it?

A Good Word for the Missionary

A little while ago Chicago entertained a commission from England whose purpose in visiting United States was to arrange for an international celebration of the centennial of the signing of the treaty of Ghent. Sir Arthur Lawley was the efficient leader and spokesman of that great commission, At a brilliant dinner given in his honor he said this good word about the American missionary:

"I would testify here, in the heart of the great republic, to the splendid help which we are receiving throughout that land from American missionaries. Throughout that presidency schools and hospitals of noble structure and beautiful equipment are standing monuments of American generosity. In these the work is carried on by men and women whose skill and science could not be excelled, whose labors are instinct and aglow with human sympathy and human love, which is God's best gift to man. They are, believe me, powerful auxiliaries of ours in our campaign against poverty and disease, against ignorance and sin; and you must forgive me if I go out of my way to express the admiration and gratitude which I feel for this splendid manifestation of the Anglo-Saxon impulse on the part of the sons and daughters of America in that far distant land."

Sir Arthur Lawley was for many years governor of Madras. For almost twenty years he was the head of an administration that cared for forty million people. Day after day he came in contact with missionaries, and we are grateful for his generous word of testimony as to their worth and the value of their work. Sir Arthur visited the World in Chicago exposition, and entertained all the members of his commission at the Pageant on Friday evening, May 30.

One Man's Job

The little village lies among the hills so far from the railroad that one hears the whistles only on still winter nights when the snow sings under your feet. Once there was a famous school in the village; its graduates went to Congress and the village was proud and prosperous. There were three churches there a generation ago. Now one is burned, one closed, one has been "supplied" from the larger neighboring town. Nothing was being done for the boys, who were active and bright. The whole village life needed inspiration. Somehow a movement began to stir in the village; the community consciousness awoke; somebody said that they might have a resident minister if they would work together. So the money was raised. A young man with vision and faith and good sense came to the village among the hills. He had been hearing that the ministry is not a man's job. He found it was a big job for a whole man in the village whose minister he had become. Every morning he spent some time praying that he might be made big enough for it. The village is feeling the heartening influence of it already. There is a new sturdy life among the hills. There came a volume of sound from the trees among which somebody was learning how to make a fire with only one match; he had done it and the Boy Scouts were using their lungs; it was sweeter music than the whistles. College men, there are a thousand just such villages awaiting to give you a man's job in the Christian ministry. You do not need to turn your eyes to science, or literature, or philosophy to find a task worthy of your mettle. Nor will you be compelled to enter the field of big business, to find a manly job. No more masculine task awaits strong hands and courageous hearts than the task of service to men in the field of their soul life.

What's Leading You?

A great big healthy man goes past our office window probably every day, although the beautiful vision sometimes escapes us. With firm grasp he holds in his healthy hands the end of a leash. At the other end moves fiercely a dog, a dog, as large as a rabbit and ten times as ugly, but evidently a blooded and valuable and highly intelligent beast. The man walks with conscious pride and keeps off all canine enemies who might in an unguarded moment chew up his charge. The man carries a little cane, probably to show unfriendly dogs what a stout guardian he is for the bundle of frisky fierceness that is leading him down the street. It is a suggestive spectacle, this sight of the little dog leading the big man. It provokes thought in the spectator, as it seems to inspire great pride and joy in the man. This stranger is not the only person who is being led through life by a something or other to which he is attached at the end of a string. Proud of it, too, some of us are. None the less it is essentially humiliating for a healthy man.

Two Annual "Masses" Forever: Price, $25,000

The Pope of Rome is a high party to a deal by which two annual masses, one for the living, the other for the deceased, will be granted to all who contribute through the Sacred Heart Review (Roman Catholic, Boston) to the Sacred Heart High Altar in the Basilica of the Holy Cross at Rome. The sum proposed is $25,000. Already $3,115 has been forwarded on account. The Pope has actually given his sanction. Contributors to The Sacred Heart Review fund are contributing with the understanding that two annual masses will be said forever, whether they are dead or living. Read the following letter from the Pope's private secretary, published in a recent issue of The Sacred Heart Review:

The Vatican, Feb. 15, 1913.

Right Reverend Monsignor John O'Brien,
Domestic Prelate of His Holiness,
East Cambridge, Mass.

Right Rev. Monsignor:

The Holy Father acknowledges the receipt of the sum of three thousand one hundred and fiften dollars ($3,115.00) handed to him by His Eminence, the Lord Cardinal Falconio. At the same time he hears with great satisfaction of your determination to reach the proposed sum of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000.00) by means of the offerings of good American Catholics for the construction of the High Altar in the new Constantinian Basilica at Ponte Milvio.

The Holy Father, therefore, in heartfelt gratitude, imparts the Apostolic Benediction to you, Monsignor, and to all those who in their generosity shall assist you in this most noble work. His Holiness, moreover, most willingly gives his sanction to the pious foundation in perpetuum of two annual Masses, one for living, the other for deceased, contributors, to be celebrated at this Altar.

I profit by this occasion to express to you my distinguished consideration. Your devoted servant,

(Signed) Giovanni Bressan,
Private Secretary to His Holiness.

The Sacred Heart Review elucidates the proposition as follows: "Families may send the names of their children, even the names of their dead. In this altar will be deposited the names of every contributor of no matter how small an amount; and on it will be celebrated two Masses yearly, one for the living donors and the persons whose names they will send, and the descendants of these donors forever; and a requiem Mass once a year for these same persons after their death."

"Election" in Southern Presbyterian Church

For several years the Southern Presbyterian church has been much agitated over making some popular statement of its doctrinal faith. The agitation largely centered around the doctrine of election, the largest bone of contention. Finally at Atlanta the commissioners to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, U. S., out of the largeness of their hearts by a safe majority voted all babies and others incapable of choice into heaven, as follows:

VII ELECTION.

Before the foundation of the world, God the Father chose unto himself in Christ a people whom he gave to his Son, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love. Those who come to years of discretion receive this salvation only through faith in Christ, being regenerated by the Holy Spirit. Those who die in infancy, and others who are incapable of exercising choice, are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who works when and where and how he pleases. We thus declare that God's electing grace has peopled heaven with a multitude that no man can number, and has never sent one soul to hell.

We rejoice with our Dixie brethren, and yet we wonder how the "brief statement" changes the confessional standards of their church. It was made clear that this statement, according to The Presbyterian Advance (Nashville) of June 5, "is not to be considered a substitute for or an amendment to the documents contained in the constitution of the church." If that is true, then the "brief statement" is an imposition on the credulity of outsiders, and it was formed avowedly for the purpose of public consumption. Can it be possible that the laity are to understand one thing, and the ministers quite another thing? There seems to be no escape from this conclusion. The Southern Presbyterian ministers still believe that "elect infants dying in infancy are regenerated, etc.," while the "brief statement" for popular consumption holds that all infants (shall we say "elect" and "non-elect?") are regenerated. We are forced to question the intellectual honesty of this performance. It certainly suggests a double standard of belief! It certainly suggests that a Presbyterian layman can believe all infants are regenerated, but a Presbyterian minister cannot believe that. The layman may feel that he is sufficiently bound by "the brief statement," while the minister feels that he is necessarily bound by the Westminster Confession of Faith and the Shorter Catechism. We hold that a double standard of creedal belief is just as vicious in religion, as the double standard of purity is in morals. The "brief statement" of the Southern Presbyterian Church is not worth the paper it is written on, so long as this ugly fact of a double intellectual standard remains.

Another Roman Catholic Divorce

The Continent (Presbyterian, Chicago) of June 5, says:

It is unpleasant to be obliged so often to direct attention to the hypocrisy of Roman Catholic prelates in their endless boasting that their church is the world's stanchest—sometimes they say only—defender of the sanctity of marriage. But intelligent citizens, concerned at the rapid growth of the divorce evil, cannot afford to be deceived into accepting the Roman hierarchy at its own valuation as an ally in the war on divorce. The first interest of the hierarchy is not quashing divorce but confirming the sway of the church over family life. Where the sway of the church is acknowledged the mere fact of separation between honestly wedded husband and wife proves nothing obnoxious to the priestly mind.

A case in Quebec, already celebrated and promising to become still more famous, illustrates this. Napoleon Tremblay, whose wife and himself had been strict Catholics all their lives, being married in regular church form by the proper parish priest, got tired of Mrs. Tremblay after six years of wedlock and wished to divorce her. A fact unknown to either of them when they were married, but discovered afterwards as they compared their ancestral trees, furnished his way of escape; they were fourth cousins. Yes, the church authorities admitted that was an impediment to the marriage, but a dispensation from the bishop would have fixed it all right if they had asked for it. And that they could have yet, provided they would pay the required fee. But Tremblay wasn't wanting the marriage regularized, and so he refused to pass over the cash desired. Well, the priests concerned were willing to accommodate; it would have been nicer if the man would pay, but since he wouldn't, they weren't small enough to show any hard feelings—and so they told him he was free from his wife—in fact, never had been married at all.

But Mrs. Tremblay didn't want it that way. She had some reputation at stake, to say the least. So she has been fighting the case from one court to another in Quebec, and now proposes to carry it over seas to the final court of appeal in the British empire—the king's privy council in London. It is likely there to become as notable a matter as the McCann "ne temere" case in Ulster, and the Roman casuists won't have any better chance than they had in the McCann case to make the official attitude of their church look either fair, decent or honest.

The Methodist Church in Canada

The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate (June 5) says: "The proposed union of the three leading Protestant Churches of Canada, though by no means yet consummated, has already resulted in an effort to secure incorporation under the Dominion Parliament for the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion, or Church. The bill asking for incorporation has passed its second reading in the Senate, but the preponderance of opinion in that body as voiced in the discussion of the matter seemed to be against granting the privilege of organizing a church bearing a name which had once belonged to a religious body which laid aside the name for the sake of uniting with other Methodist bodies. The second reading of the bill was passed as a form of parliamentary procedure, with the understanding that the principle involved was not indorsed, but in order that further consideration might be given the subject. The movement to secure incorporation for the proposed new Methodist Church is being urged by a member of the last General Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada, who took strong ground in that body against the pending plan of union with the Presbyterians and Congregationalists.

3,000 Presbyterian Millionaires

The Presbyterian Banner (Pittsburgh) of June 5 glories in the probability that there are 3,000 Presbyterians in the United States, who are worth a million dollars or over. A financial agent of a Presbyterian college informed the editor of the Banner that he has a list of 1,000 of such men, and that one of the agents of another church board has a list of 1,600. The Banner's anonymous informer says that 3,000 Presbyterian millionaires "would not be a too liberal estimate." Is it possible that there can be in this country more than $3,000,000,000 in the hands of about 3,000 men, and every one of these men a "prominent member" of the Presbyterian church? If Jesus were a member of the Presbyterian Church today, what would he say about it? Is there any wonder that Charles Stelzle should feel moved to write an article in The Continent (Presbyterian, Chicago) of June 5, on the subject "Can the Rich and Poor Meet Together in Church?"

The Flynn Bill in Pennsylvania

The Roman Catholic hierarchy can now legally control in its own right every dollar of Roman Catholic church property in Pennsylvania, though it is "the faithful"—the dear, loyal 'faithful"—who put up the dollars and "pay the freight." The Flynn Bill, giving such legal control, has at last been passed and signed by the governor of the state. It was defeated on a final hearing in the lower branch of the Pennsylvania legislature, but was later reconsidered and passed by a substantial majority. A similar bill was twice defeated in the house during the session of 1911, but Rome never sleeps. Rome was determined to put an end to squabbles over money matters in Pennsylvania. The Flynn Bill puts into the hands of the Romish bishops literally millions of dollars of property, and these bishops are personally and autocratically controlled by one man in the city of Rome, the pope. If church property were taxed in Pennsylvania, the pope of Rome would become probably the largest tax payer in Pennsylvania. Just how "the faithful" will swallow the Flynn Bill, is hard to see.

Sunday-Schools in France

France is not generally considered a Sunday-school country. There is a total Protestant population of 600,000 in that country. More than ten per cent of this population, 67,000, are scholars in undenominational Sunday-schools, managed by the Sunday-school Union of France, a society of five Protestant constituent denominations which have been united in doing missionary work of this character. There are 1,200 Sunday-schools in all, manned by 7,000 teachers. The principal obstacles reported are intemperance and infidelity. It is good to think of France having a part in the world's Sunday-school army of 30,000,000 souls. There is much religious hope for France in those 67,000 Sunday-school scholars.

A Prayer for Remembrance

God of the Heart and Hand,
Teach me to understand!
I have forgotten in the long, long years
All of my little childish hopes and fears;
It is so very, very long ago
Since I was in the world the children know;
I have forgotten what I used to play
And dream and do in that far yesterday,—
All the wide wonder of my childish eyes
Since I have grown so old and worldly-wise.
Yet now there comes with faces raised to mine
These little ones. Dear Father, they are Thine.
Teach me to lead them to thine own true light,
Help me to guide their little feet aright!

God of the Heart and Hand,
Teach me to understand!
I know so little of the thought that lies
Back of the shining of those childish eyes;
I guess so little of the wonder there
Under the curling of the sunny hair,
It is so very, very long ago
Since I, too, knew the things that children know.
Yet hast Thou given them to me to lead.
Out of Thy wisdom grant me all I need,—
Patience of purpose, faith, and tenderness,
Trusting Thy perfect love to lead and bless.
Help me remember,—ah! for this I pray,
Make me again the child of yesterday.
God of the Heart and Hand,
Teach me to understand!

Our Readers' Opinions

WHY ELIJAH DID NOT ORGANIZE.

"Why did not Elijah go back to Israel and organize the 7,000?"—Editorial in issue of June 12.

The matter was considered, but one of his friends said, "Such a course would be divisive," and another wrote, "The time has not come for organization."

So the psychological moment passed and poor Elijah found himself and his reform movement grounded under a juniper bush.

Later on Elisha did some things. F. M. Cummings, Pastor.

MORE UNION.

Editors of the Christian Century: How does this sound? In his recent farewell sermon the Presbyterian minister here said, "Let me give you in parting some of my theology. I am hoping and praying that the time will come speedily when there shall be no Presbyterian, no Methodist, no Baptist churches. But there shall be only churches of Jesus Christ," and his large audience with many nods approved the remark. R. W. Clymer.

From Near and Far

The last session of the Pennsylvania Legislature, which has just adjourned, was remarkable for several reasons. Most important of these reasons was the large number of wholesome laws passed. More than 3,000 bills were introduced into the two houses. Among the more important measures passed were a public utilities bill, a state-wide primary bill, a measure establishing the commission form of government with the initiative and referendum in more than a score of cities having less than 100,000 population; a bill reducing the hours of employment for women to ten hours a day and 54 a week; a bill regulating cold-storage; a bill taxing anthracite coal five cents a ton; resolutions ratifying the Federal amendment for the direct election of United States Senators, and submitting to the voters of the state a proposition to amend the constitution so that $50,000,000 may be borrowed for improvement of highways. The legislature also adopted a resolution proposing woman's suffrage. There was created a department of labor and industry, taking the place of the factory inspection department.

The Summer School of Sunday School Methods to be held at East Northfield, Mass., July 19-26, started ten years ago by the Massachusetts Sunday School Association, has steadily grown in numbers and power until it ranks among the very best of the schools of its class and is considered by experts throughout the land a model of its kind. It is now managed by an interstate committee. Its growing popularity is indicated by the fact that while the enrollment for 1910 was 199 and in 1911 255, it reached last year 356, and there are confident hopes that this year no less than 500 students will be in attendance.

The Service Building, the first of the structures in the Panama-Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco is the first to be finished. The building is the headquarters of the construction and architectural departments. All the main exhibit palaces there will be fourteen—will be under construction within a few months and will be completed by July, 1914. As soon as the buildings are finished workmen will begin setting out upon the grounds and in the courts millions of trees, flowers, palms, and rare shrubs. Hundreds of thousands of cuttings are being raised in the exposition greenhouses. Expert landscape gardeners are in charge of the plans.

The administration currency bill, recently presented to our national congress, is a long step toward a scientific national system. It plans to divide the country into twelve federal reserve districts, with a reserve bank in each. The capital of each reserve bank is subscribed by the national banks in that district, each bank being required to subscribe to the extent of twenty per cent of its capital stock. The bill also provides for the issue of treasury notes to an amount not exceeding $500,000,000 in addition to the bank note currency now in circulation.

By the action of the convention of the Protestant Episcopal church at the diocese of Maryland, which recently met in Baltimore, that body placed itself among other religious denominations as to the saloon. The convention passed a resolution expressing its conviction that the ultimate and complete elimination of the saloon as it now exists, is a necessary step toward the cure of the drinking evil and a referendum to the evil is advised in the resolution.

The Mojave Desert near San Bernardino, Cal., has gone dry. For the first time in its history the desert is minus the saloons, which like oases, dotted the sandy stretch for a distance of 200 miles. These "wet" spots were entirely squeezed out, Needles being the only desert town still supporting saloons. The licenses for that place were renewed before the county supervisors suddenly decided to "dry up" the Mojave country.

The Boys' Achievement Band will send forty-two of its members on a tour around the world. Most of the boys come from San Francisco, where they were organized by the National Youth Achievement Committee of the Panama-Pacific Exposition. When the boys get back from their trip they will become officers of the National Boys' City at the exposition.

Miss Jane Addams, who has just arrived from Europe, where she attended the International Woman Suffrage convention in Buda Pest, declared she did not wish to be a candidate for Mayor of Chicago in the coming election. But she qualified her refusal to answer the call that has been started by her friends since women were given the vote in Illinois.

Absolutely dry Sundays are provided for and many novel restrictions are imposed in the drastic excise law for the national capital, which has just gone into effect. Hotel guests henceforth may not have cocktails, highballs or a bottle of beer or wine even with meals on the Sabbath Day, nor may liquors be served in clubs to the members thereof.

At Williams College, 117 men were graduated this year, and a forward movement inaugurated with the view of raising $2,000,000, to be used largely for increasing the salary of professors. Already about one quarter of the sum has been pledged. President Garfield expressed his confidence that the desired sum would be obtained.

A chorus of 350 trained voices, composed entirely of Chinese, singing anthems in English, was a feature of one of the sessions of the second World's Christian Citizenship Conference at Multnomah stadium, Portland, Ore. The Cloud of Witnesses

By Edward Scribner Ames

"Wherefore, seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith." Hebrews 12:1.

There is something deeply human in this reference to the presence of other people as a reason for strenuous moral endeavor. It is almost disconcerting to be so frankly urged to be good because one is being observed. Yet there is no denying the fact that our neighbors' opinions are mighty goads to good actions and powerful deterrents from evil. We do not always admit it. We are indeed seldom conscious of the extent to which it is true. There is often an avowal of disinterested, independent devotion to truth and honor, while all the time one is really controlled and guided by the attitudes and expressions of the persons standing by. Every normal human being lives in this medium of social stimulation and control, as a fish lives in water or a bird in air.

It has always been so. The helplessness of human infancy determines every indiviual to an intimate dependence upon others for several of the most impressionable years. There can be no infant Robinson Crusoe all alone on a desert island. And by the time a Robinson Crusoe is able to maintain himself in solitude he is already formed and fashioned under the eyes of many witnesses. The approval and censure of a family circle, of play fellows and of various kith and kin establish the core of his code of conduct. As a child, seeing a shining vase upon the table, impulsively puts out a hand to touch it, and then with the hand poised in air, turns to search the mother's face for permission to proceed, so human beings are always casting side glances to ascertain the opinions of the spectators. It is noticeable that people are frequently more careful about their front yards which the public may see than they are with the back yards. We quite naturally agree that it is more important to have the street side of the house of better material or to keep it especially well painted and repaired. We thus pay tribute to the sentiments of other people. Without this environing human presence we are like sailors who have no compass and cannot see the stars. The most ordinary moral judgments lose their meaning when the individual is cut off from his fellows.

The moralists identify the growth of ethical sentiment, in an individual, with the growth of his knowledge of the judgment of his associates. As one writer says, "There is often a lack of sharp condemnation of ourselves as long as our sins remain private; we are aware of the sinfulness in a general way; conscience gets in a timid voice, especially just at the time of commission of the deed, and more timidly each time that it is committed; but there may be no lively emotional reaction, no great agitation of remorse, no desperate attempts to justify oneself by argument, no call to repentence. But let it once come out; then his nature asserts itself. The sense of publicity immediately reacts upon his own private standards of judgment." He then sees himself as others see him and the profound emotions of self-condemnation sweep over him. Similarly, a man's sense of the value of virtue, of strict honor and integrity, is heightened and strengthened by the recognition and approval of others.

It is this great universal fact of our moral experience which the text employs. It implies also that one may select and enlarge the cloud of witnesses in imagination and keep them before the mind when they are no longer accessible in physical presence. These witnesses which the inner eye beholds serve as supports and guides when a man's actual companions are inadequate, or when they might tyrannize over his will and hinder his most ideal achievements.

The possession of such a company of ideal companions is a distinctly human characteristic. Out of sight, out of mind, is the fate of the lower orders of life, and it was only gradually that the memory of man lengthened to include the names and deeds of any individuals beyond a generation or two. It was the development of language and the accumulation of traditions and records which enabled man to draw away from the narrow world of other animals, and guide himself by the achievements of many individuals remote in time and place. The recital of the deeds of the great names of Israel's past, as given in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, is a typical expression of the way in which the race brought its lengthening memory to bear upon the conduct of the individual. Here are arrayed with dramatic vividness and individuality the ancestral heroes of the faith. Some of them, like Abel, Enoch and Noah, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob move upon the shadowy borders of mythology and folklore. Others stand in the light of history—David, Samuel, the prophets and the great company of the nameless champions of faith. All of them exemplify the power of faith—"through faith they subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens."

They endured as seeing the invisible. It was the cultivation of this ability to transcend the present moment and live in intimate companionship with the past which contributed to the intensity of religious life among the Jews. They thus created and transmitted a rich heritage of national idealism which has marvelously resisted changes of environment and all manner of outward misfortunes. By impressing the stories of their early heroes upon the minds of the children, they fortified one generation after another against alien standards and kept them loyal to the race ideals.

It was lack of continuity in their outward history which forced the Hebrews to maintain with rigor and devotion the inner spirit and mental pictures of their past. This tendency preserved the soul of the nation after its institutions were broken and humbled. It has enabled the faithful Jews for thousands of years to present their racial identity, and to endure contempt and disaster as no other people has done. No other people has shown so much tenacity of ancient ideals through such calamities and opposition. And this has been due to the fact that with deep moral earnestness and unflagging zeal, the imagination of every child has been prescribed by the idealized characters of the long line of national heroes. These characters have had the quality of life and the intimacy of deepest sentiment. They have been better known and more devotedly obeyed than the visible companions of the hour. They have been the invisible keepers of the consciences and the honor of the generations which have cherished them.

It was this habit of mind which became one of the greatest contributions of Judaism to Christianity. So long as the Christians were scorned and persecuted by their contemporaries, they were forced to secure approval and spiritual companionship in imagination with the Old Testament heroes or with the celestial company of the apostles and martyrs. The doctrine of the heavenly existence which Christianity emphasized, gave a new field for the imagination and incalculably strengthened the hearts and wills of the faithful. Why should they be disheartened by the disdain of Roman governors and the ridicule of common soldiers when they were conscious of the sympathetic presence and encouragement of their exalted king and his mighty cohorts? It was thus a simple matter for the early Christians to employ the long accustomed usage of the Hebrew mind and to enlarge and idealize the grand company of its heroes by adding the living and just invisible spirits of their dead. Here was secured a more powerful and vivid aid to the imagination, inasmuch as the great souls whose approval one craves are not merely in the past but are living witnesses just barely removed from sight, yet quick and sensitive to our mortal strife.

Christianity has here availed itself of a very natural and universal tendency of the mind, to feel toward the absent ones something of the same respect and affection which they elicited when actually present. Among primitive people the dead are felt to be active and influential and hover about their homes and associates with awe inspiring presence. Christianity has enhanced that view and qualified it with a moral principle, for it is now the righteous dead whose presence the Christian contemplates and whose approval he regards. The church has magnified this mystic host of the heavenly world and has encouraged the most vivid imagery with reference to the saints ranged above us intent in contemplation of our moral conflict. Their sympathy and inspiration are often felt to be the most powerful incentives to our noblest endeavors.

"How should we bear our life?
Without the friendship of the happy dead?"

runs the sentiment of a recent mystical poem by Miss Evelyn Underhill.

"They see
The steadfast purpose of eternity.
Their care is all for us: they whisper low
Of the great heritage
To which we go.
As one may tell a child of tender age
Of manhood and its joys,
They from our toys
Call us to contemplation of the light.
We, all unknowing, wage
Our endless fight
By ghostly banners led,
By arms invisible helped in the strife.
Without the friendship of the happy dead
How should we bear our life?"

This is the theme of many of the noblest hymns of the church, reminding us of those—

"Who, from the battlements above,
Follow our course with eager love,
And cheer our contest on."

The first great step in the idealization and spiritualization of human life, then, we may say, is this release of man from his immediate environment and the reference of his conduct to the great lives of the past and to the heavenly company of those who have died in the faith. But all this may occur within the unmodified tradition of the past. The individual who accepts this heritage and lives in obedience to it possesses indeed a larger and richer inner life than one whose conscience had no such historical and celestial perspective. But for all that it may be a life which is bound to precedent, subject to the authority of tradition and quite wholly given to imitation and acquiescence. If we lived in a changeless intellectual world that type of religion might be sufficient but in a growing social order where different historical traditions are often in conflict, something more is needed. To many minds of our modern world the original Hebrew tradition and its modified form in historic Christianity scarcely supplies the full satisfaction demanded. That tradition is at least called upon to meet other traditions in a new way. The assertion of its truth, its antiquity, the number of its adherents cannot answer the deeper questions which many sincere minds are asking. Where and how then may a sincere soul of this day determine what cloud of witnesses to invoke? Here is a modern man who makes his appeal to the Greek worthies. Auguste Rodin, in his brochure "To the Venus of Melos," says of his experience with Greek art: "In the Louvre, of old, like saints to a work in his cloister the Olympian gods said to me all that a young man might usefully hear; later they protected and inspired me; after an absence of twenty years, I found them again with an indescribable joy, and I understood them. These divine fragments, these marbles, older than two thousand years, speak to me louder, move me more than human beings."

Another man of western culture makes his home in Japan and comes to believe profoundly in the moral and artistic ideals of that land and becomes a kind of missionary of Japanese art and culture. A third man of our Anglo-Saxon world is fascinated with life in India and becomes a devotee of theosophy which he commends to us with zeal and earnestness. It is also possible to meet men among us who have come to know intimately the social control, the proverbial wisdom and the ceremonial customs of the tribes of Central Africa, or Australia, and who are dubious about the claims of our culture and our religion, in comparison. Not only are we experiencing this contact of various cultures with their differing standards and ideals, but within our own society there are numerous claimants for allegiance. There is a certain type of scientist who, like Darwin, may have given himself to his observations of facts and the formulations of hypotheses and generalizations, until he has no interest in poetry and the symbolic idealizations of life which characterize art and religion.

With all these there is also present the practical man of affairs who may or may not elaborate the theory which his conduct suggests. He works as if life had its charm and justification in utilitarian efficiency and skill. He sees the power of wealth and a certain respect which it elicits even from those devoted to other ideals, and he concludes that at least all men in middle life see the wisdom of his course and tacitly admit that worldly success and material goods are among the most important possessions possible to men. This is not the first age of the world in which such a conflict of traditions has occurred, and in which a civilization has had its traditions deeply challenged. It happened so among the Greeks at the time of the Sophists; and among the Romans in the age of the decline of the empire when a great number of oriental cults struggled with Judaism and Christianity for supremacy. But there is this difference in our time. The wide diffusion of knowledge makes the problem vital to more people. It is as though for the masses of men there appeared within the field of mental vision not only the cloud of witnesses which their own traditional culture affords, but also those vast companies of the saints of other faiths, vigorous in devotion to their beliefs and equally ready to encourage and crown any who will fight under their banners.

It is analogous to the perplexity of a person who removes from a relatively simple community life into the maelstrom of a great city. In the smaller towns he has acquaintances on every side, whom he meets freely. His labors and his recreations are part of their own life. He feels quickly their praise or blame. He is held to the moral standards of his class and group by the simple and direct operation of public opinion. But in the city there is a great multiplicity of social sets—clubs, lodges, associations and guilds. The street on which he lives is no longer a neighborhood, the business associates he encounters have little common life outside of business. A great wealth of organizations offer their ideals and companionships, but the old habits and traditions of the smaller community afford little rational guidance in the new, bewildering life. He has lost the intimate connection with the old cloud of witnesses before whom he felt the values of life decisively and urgently while among the confused and discordant multitudes of the metropolis no one at first seems to care whither he goes. No one assumes responsibility for his direction.

In some similar way the modern mind has found itself in spiritual bewilderment in the presence of many voices. It is unavailing merely to reassert the old authority with greater vehemence and insistence. So far as the text offers a solution for his emergency, it is found in the exhortation to run the race with the eyes fixed, not upon the past, but upon the future; not upon the ancient heroes so much as upon the ideal man beyond. It is as though the course upon which the runner ran stretched away into a distance where the spectators could only follow by their eager vision and where they themselves had never actually run. One figure only had passed along that course, and that was the figure of Jesus Christ, who ventured beyond the ancient goals and opened a new and living way toward God.

In the New Testament Jesus appears as one who directed men beyond the old tradition. He was often in conflict with the ancient order. It was not sufficient for him to know what was said by them of old time. He was free to say things radically different. And he did not offer himself as another law-giver or dictator. He proclaimed himself rather as a friend and teacher, whose words rested not so much upon his own authority as upon experience. The truth itself would make men free. Others, coming after him, would do greater things than himself.

Jewish descent was not necessary in order to be a true son of Abraham. The God whom Jesus worshiped counted as true sons of Abraham only those who had faith like Abraham's—a faith for adventure and endurance, in the interest of a righteous cause. To Jesus any place was just as sacred as Jerusalem, if it were a place where men truly worshiped God.

St. Paul understood how new and untraditional the religion of Jesus was in this respect. He saw that a Jew is not a Jew, which is one outwardly, but he is a Jew, which is one inwardly, regardless of blood or any ceremonial. The apostle Paul repeated no conviction oftener or with greater emphasis than this, that in Christianity there is no Jew nor Greek, barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free; that the old order had passed away, and behold all things are new!

It was, then, upon such a leader as this that the Jewish Christians were to fix their eyes as they ran their race, surrounded by the cloud of witnesses. When Jesus Christ is thus understood, he becomes an inspiring leader for an age in which the old traditions clash. He becomes the embodiment of the best elements of all the streams of culture in the race. The gentle Buddha, the wise Confucius, the earnest Mohammed are not repelled by Christ, but like Moses and the prophets, receive through him the vindication and fulfillment of the true spirit of their teaching. It is the fuller appreciation of this fact which is opening a new chapter in Christian missions. The Christian missionary no longer feels compelled to denounce en bloc all of these ancient revelations of God among the various peoples of the earth. On the contrary, he seeks among their sacred books for every Christ-like word, and is ready to employ at its full value every truly catholic text or parable of the New Testament scriptures.

It is also this deep, free spirit of Christ which may guide one in the confusion which many experience in our scientific age. The so-called conflict between science and religion has its ground in narrow and superficial views of science and of religion. One is almost able to say that such a conflict no longer exists between minds of the first rank either among scientists or ministers. Christianity, at its best, in our day, welcomes in the very name and spirit of Christ all the knowledge, all the investigation, all the genuine experimentation of science. And Christianity does this, not with the feeling that science works in an alien realm, but in the conviction that its problems lie at the very heart of its own task, the task, namely, of so understanding nature and life, God and the world and man, that it may be possible to build more rapidly and more securely a kingdom of righteousness and love and peace upon the earth. Religion needs the aid of science to abolish superstition and to refuse the tools of progress; and science needs religion to keep alive the ideal meaning of all our tasks, and to make luminous and resplendent, the social, spiritual goal of all our labor.

When, therefore, the Christian, in the race he runs, looks forward to Jesus Christ, he should see in him not an arbitrary mind, nor a barrier to progress, but a free spirit, opening the course and himself urging all men ever onward in the way. This represents the ultimate emancipation of mankind. It was of profound importance to free men from the tyranny of the moment and from the bonds of immediate sense of experience by extending the perspective of human life into the past and preserving there the great characters and deeds of history. But that achievement still made possible a fatal bondage—the bondage of tradition, of precedent, of a fixed standard.

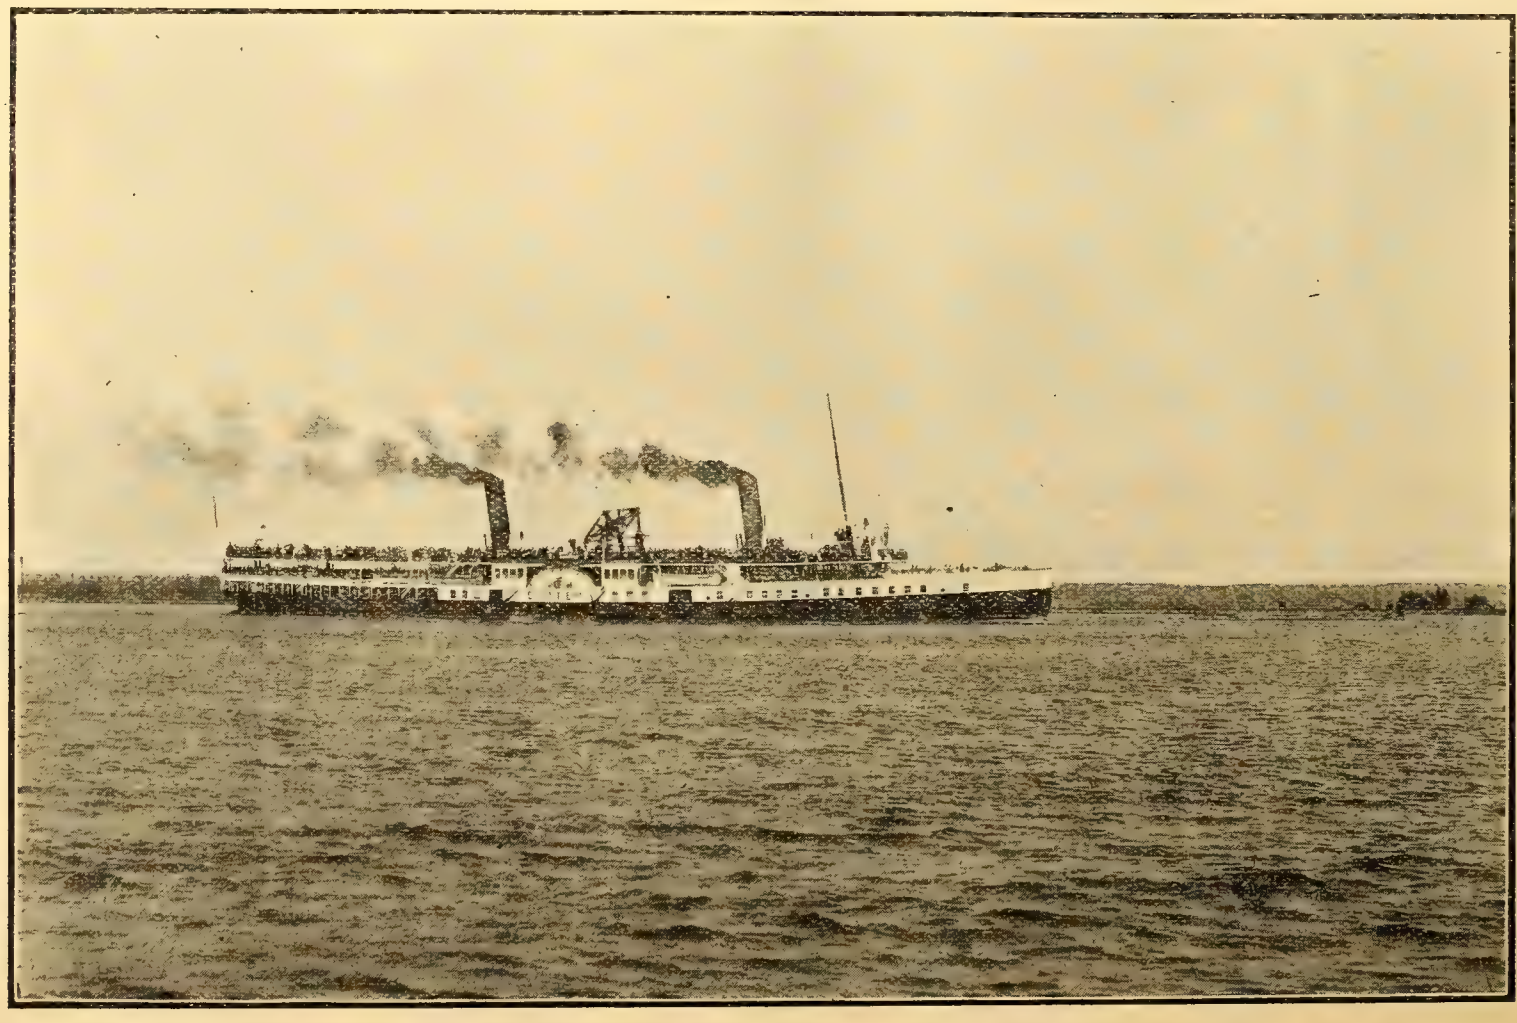
The other emancipation, in which the human spirit especially rejoices today is release from this slavery of tradition. Men feel themselves freer than ever before to accept from any culture of the past its rich treasure, without thereby becoming the devotees of all the elements of that culture, or forfeiting the right to accept the gifts of other peoples. One may now, at last, be both a Greek and a Jew, a scientist and a saint, a scholar and a Christian, in the deepest and best import of these terms.

And finally, it is some satisfaction to remind ourselves that the writer of the letter to the Hebrews realized that the cloud of witnesses he described were not themselves perfect. Those who came after them were necessary to complete what the ancient heroes attempted—"God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." It is doubtful whether the greatest men of the past ever desired their own words to be praised as the final statements of truth, or their deeds as the end of perfection. It is more frequently the desire of the parent that the child should accomplish finer and greater things. Every right thinking man who is compelled to give up a task into which he has put his life, is happy to see others carry it on, and he is doubly happy if by encouragement and approval he is able to assist them to excel his own achievements. Nothing gives finer satisfaction to a teacher than to be surpassed in his own specialty by his pupils.

It is the saving salt of human nature that this power of appreciation is greater than the power of creation. Men who are themselves weak and imperfect in moral achievement, may yet encourage others to better deeds. The earnest approval of good men by those less virtuous is a common thing, and such approval helps to make the good man better. As has been said, "If only those were allowed to uphold standards who had demonstrated their ability to live up to them, how our reigning ideals would suffer." "Common enough is that mild predilection for the right which is equal to supporting some one else under temptation."

The cloud of witnesses is not then superfluous or cumbrous. They give zest to the contestants. Their own hopes and broken efforts yet await fulfilment. They are able to appreciate what they could not accomplish. Instead of restraining, they urge on the battle. Whose heart is not quickened in him when he takes up his daily task to think that there are those who care? Or, who is not strengthened against temptation, even in his solitude, when he recalls in memory a pure face looking into his? And who does not feel the stirring ardor in a company of human souls assembled in a quiet place of worship, striving together in their wills to find the way of life and to walk in it? Over them brood the spirits of the mighty dead, rank on rank massing themselves upward into the mystic amphitheater of memory and faith. Who does not respond to their presence by some new dedication of his being to the race they ran and to which they urge us on?

Wherefore, seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and the finisher of our faith.



Niagara Navigation Co. Steamer, plying between Lewiston, N. Y. and Toronto, Ontario. Six trips daily. Six miles of river scenery and thirty-six of Lake Ontario. These steamers are on the route to the International Convention at Toronto, via Niagara Falls (Sept. 30-Oct. 6.) This convention will be truly international. Never before have its sessions been held off the soil of the United States. This year upon British soil and under the friendly folds of "Old Glory" and the "Union Jack" American Disciples will meet to view their record and plan for the future.

The Blessing of Work

A Lay Sermon by an Advertising Man

By Wilbur D. Nesbit

[At the advertising men's convention held in Baltimore recently the pulpits of the various churches were filled on Sunday by advertising men, who preached lay sermons. Wilbur D. Nesbit of Chicago occupied a pulpit and in part spoke as follows:]

"Most preachers take a text. I am not an ordained preacher, but am not playing a part this morning. I won't feel that my discourse is properly started if it doesn't have a text. I sometimes think that a text serves the preacher as a convenient peg on which to hang his coat while he goes about his work. My text will be, the first curse and the greatest blessing ever pronounced on humanity. It is in the third chapter of Genesis and the nineteenth verse and reads:

"'In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread.'

"Immediately after that sentence was pronounced Adam got him a job and the world began advancing. It has never stopped advancing.

"So long as men work the world will roll farther and farther ahead. When men quit work the world will cease being worth the living in.

"There may be a few people in the world—in fact there are a good many—who eat their bread in the sweat of other faces.

"But they only die some day. They are born and die. Dust they are and dust they become, having had no quickening spirit to help them leave the prints of their hands upon the world they have not helped.

"And for them time shall have mercy, for mankind shall forget them.

"Only men who put their names on time's pay roll are counted in the statistics of eternity.

"The expression of the universal inspiration is work. Just plain, common, dirt-digging, nail-pounding, floor-scrubbing, ink-slinging, house-building, city-making, country-helping, world-bettering work.

"Civilization, in some of its fundamentals, is the ability to do the hard work in an easier way.

"Sometimes it is the lazy man who makes the short cut, sometimes it is the man in a hurry who goes across lots to catch his train, but most of the bias paths across the field of time have been worn by the trudging feet of the workers, the hewers of wood and the drawers of water—whether it be in the ranks of industry, art, science or any other kind of labor. For anything that pays—whether the payment be to man or to mankind, whether the reward come to the doer or to posterity, is work.

"It is not fair to hold, as some hold, that the man who fails is a weakling.

"No man fails who works honestly and well, who goes at his task with heart and soul. There may be defeat for him, there may be loss for him at the time, but nine times out of ten if you watch that man you will find that later on his seeming failure has earned more for him than a definite success would have meant at that time.

Quitters and Failures.

"We may grant that the quitter is a failure—but there are mighty few quitters in this world who hadn't made up their minds to quit before they found the job.

"It doesn't seem to me that the average man who fails in his work because he doesn't make money at it is a real failure. It may seem so to the class of men who want to play 'My Country 'Tis of Thee' on the keys of the cash register, but you doubtless have noticed that where ten men are hurt by one man's failure a thousand men are hurt by one man's success—if failure or success is to be measured in dollars instead of deeds.

"It has always seemed to me that the biggest job in the world, and about the hardest, was the one Moses had. He didn't have spare breath enough to ask for an eight-hour day.

"If I recall it correctly, Moses put in forty years or thereabouts working harder than any other man among the Hebrews, and in connection with his work supplied them and the rest of us with a code of religious law and a code of civil law that will stand any court.

"All through the Bible we find story after story of men who worked—men who started in poor and didn't care whether they piled up much of a bank account so long as they delivered the goods in a workman-like manner.

"I don't recall a man who shifted the boundary lines of nations, who kept his fellows from violating the anti-speed laws in backsliding, who built cities in the waste places, who led men to victories in battle and in labor, who wasn't a common, ordinary, unassuming member of society at the start.

"The occasion which fills the pulpits of Baltimore with laymen today has to do with a form of work which is at least one of the greatest constructive forces in American life—advertising.

"Naturally, one would be expected to give his remarks some color fitting to the event which has brought from all parts of the country to Baltimore the men who have at heart the best interests of their craft.

"There are only two places in the Bible where advertising is mentioned. One of them uses the word 'advertise' in a sense which does not seem to apply to advertising as we know it. The other is where Boaz appealed to the kinsman of Naomi, saying:

"'And I thought to advertise thee, saying: "Buy it before the inhabitants and before the elders of my people."'

"There is an intensely human side to advertising. It is far more human than the writing of stories or general articles. It brings the writer of advertisements into touch with the lives of people. If he regards his work as he should, he will realize that he comes pretty near being a household counselor, that thousands of men and women, most of whom he will never see, are accepting his expression of the word of the advertiser in a way that will affect their expenditures and to some extent their home lives. He is, in a measure, responsible for the good faith with which the dealer offers the advertised wares to his customers; his work means profit or loss to the dealer, satisfaction or dissatisfaction to the consumer; success or failure to the advertiser. He must have the advertisers' confidence, and he must be fully confident in the advertiser and his product in order to do honest work.

Bible Best Advertisement.

"The Bible is the oldest, the greatest and the most successful advertisement. It appeals, it interests, it convinces and it serves—and there you have all there should be or can be in any advertisement which attains its full purpose. It is a model to any advertiser. For literary style and for convincing statement and for human appeal it has never been equaled.

"In the sands of Egypt men today are uncovering the works of men who lived and died and have been forgotten these many centuries. Babylon, the ancient, is being brought to the light of the sun, and the story of her mighty days is finding life anew. Down in South and Central America men are discovering great temples and palaces builded by a people that cannot be identified.

"But of the work of these men will come something that will better this and future generations.

"A handful of dust may tell the story of failure or hold the marvelous promise of the future.

"The whole universe is work. It may please my curiosity to know that the finest silk thread, if it could be dropped from the nearest fixed star to the earth, would weigh hundreds of tons—but it is more inspiring to me to realize that the farthest star in the immensity of space and the meanest weed in the field are working together to some mighty purpose which is beyond the mind of man to grasp.

"It may interest me to be told that light travels 186,000 miles a second, but it is more inspiring to me to realize that there is a source of that light and that that source was placed where it is for a purpose, and that the light itself is flung across the field of space for a purpose. It is doing something, not merely traveling."

He Must Dig

He wanted a job, and like every one else,
He wanted a good one, you know;
Where his clothes would not soil and his hands would keep clean,
And the salary mustn't be low.
He asked for a pen, but they gave him a spade,
And he half turned away with a shrug,
But he altered his mind, and seizing the spade—he dug!

He worked with a will that is bound to succeed.
And the months and years went along.
The way it was rough and the labor was hard,
But his heart he kept filled with a song.
Some jeered him and sneered at the task, but he plugged,
Their words never seemed to disturb him a bit—as he dug.

The day came at last when they called for the spade,
And gave him a pen in its place.
The joy of achievement was sweet to his taste,
And victory shone in his face.
We can't always get what we hope for at first—
Success cuts many queer jigs.
But one thing is sure—a man will succeed—if he digs.—Selected.

A Page of Human Interest

MR. BEECHER NOT ALWAYS A PROPHET.

In June, 1880, William E. Sheldon of Boston, wrote to Mr. Beecher asking him for an abstract of his address to be given before the American Institute of Instruction at Saratoga, in July. The following was the reply:

"Brooklyn, N. Y.

My Dear Sir:

If you will send me some paper made of the fiber of reeds that will grow along the Nile in 1930 A. D. and a pen taken from the wing of the first bird of the next coming spring and an envelope made of a spider's web to be spun next summer upon my convolvulus vines, I will at once send you the unborn thoughts which I hope to utter next July at Saratoga.

Yours in the tribulation of hope,

Henry Ward Beecher."

DIDN'T SEE THE POINT.

"You can never get the best of a woman in an argument," says Dr. Alexis Carrel, of the Rockefeller Institute, "as the following story of a young doctor proves.

"They were having an argument, and both had become rather exasperated.

"'Oh, of course,' he exclaimed angrily, 'I am always in the wrong.'

"'Not always,' she replied sarcastically. 'Last week you admitted that you were in the wrong.'

"'Well,' he demanded wrathfully, 'what's that got to do with it?'

"'Oh, nothing,' the wife answered, with a superior smile, 'except that you were perfectly right when you admitted it.'"—Lippincott's Magazine.

A NEW ONE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

President Wilson tells a story about a friend of his, a philanthropic physician who lives in a Pennsylvania town where nearly all the inhabitants are coal miners and their familes.

"Distressed at sanitary conditions," relates Mr. Wilson, "he presented each tenant of the cottages with a new thermometer, which he accompanied by a little talk on the great necessity of maintaining the proper temperature.

"One morning, shortly after, when making his round of calls, he noticed one of his thermometers proudly dangling at the end of a string in the room. He asked the woman of the house if she remembered his instructions regarding it.

"'Oh, yes, sir, indeed I do,' she responded. 'I take great care about the temperature. I keep it hanging there, and I watch it carefully to see it does not go too high.'

"'Fine!' exclaimed the pleased physician. 'And what do you do when the temperature rises above the maximum of seventy degrees that I referred to?'

"'Why, sir,' replied the woman, 'when it gets too high I take it down and hang it outside until it cools off.'"—Lippincott's Magazine.

THE PROPER SPIRIT.

Secretary of Commerce Redfield was talking about Sarah Bernhard's complaints as to American rivers—that, unlike the rivers of France, their banks are monopolized by the railroads, thus robbing the people of lovely riverside walks and drives.

"True, too true, perhaps," said Secretary Redfield. "But our dear old country is so knocked, isn't she? Foreigners knock her, we natives knock her harder still. Why don't we breed a little of that patriotic spirit of pride which the old Duddington gardener displayed?

"The old Duddington gardener was showing an American tourist the beauties of the loch and Arthur's Seat. It was evening, and as the gardener expatiated on the lovely scene the moon came up over a hill.

"Thereupon the gardener broke off to say:

"'There's a moon fur ye! Oh, we're a grand nation.'"—Chicago Record-Herald.

THE LITTLE DEVOTEE.

Dr. Hugo Munsterberg, the famous Harvard psychologist, was talking about Christian Science and in the midst of a profound and brilliant analysis of the cult he paused to tell an anecdote.

"The children of vegetarians," he said, "loathe meat, which they call graveyard fruit; and the children of Christian Scientists are more convinced devotees than the parents themselves.

"There's a little Boston urchin named Mary, an urchin of 5 years, who is a Christian Scientist to the marrow.

"Mary fell one day and barked her shin, and, rubbing the hurt with her hand, she began to cry. Her aunt, an unbeliever, happened along at this moment. The aunt was mindful of Mary's faith and of those contradictory tears, and with a mocking smile she said:

"'Why, Mary, are you hurt?'

"'No, I ain't hurt,' sobbed the little girl, restraining her sobs as best she could.

"But, if you're not hurt, why are you crying?'

"'I'm crying,' said Mary, 'because I'm mad.'

"'And what are you mad about?'

"'I'm mad—boo, hoo!—' wept the little girl, 'because I can't feel I ain't hurt.'"—Chicago Record-Herald.

MAYOR GAYNOR TELLS STORY.

Mayor Gaynor, defending New York from a charge of undue wickedness, said at a recent dinner: "There is no more wickedness here than there is in London or Paris or Berlin. They who find wickedness are usually seeking it—and we find what we seek, whether it be a roulette game or song service. Those critics remind me of the hotel cashier who, after paying a lot of food and liquor and tobacco bills, returned to the hotel drunk. 'All those people treated me,' he explained, 'when I handed them their checks.' 'Well, well,' said the proprietor, shocked. 'Is it possible that none of my creditors are temperance people?' 'Some of them are,' the cashier admitted, 'but their checks I sent to them by mail.'"—Argonaut.

OLDEST AND BEST.

Miss M. Carey Thomas, the noted president of Bryn Mawr College, was talking about co-education.

Miss Carey Thomas praised the co-educational institutions of Cornell, of Oxford, of Harvard, of Columbia, and then, with a smile, she added:

"But, after all the best and the oldest co-educational institution is marriage."—Daily Magazine.

THE REASON WHY.

Charles M. Schwab, after testifying in the government's suit against the Steel Corporation, talked to a New York reporter about a financier who had failed.

The reporter was inclined to be hard on the financier, but Mr. Schwab, with his genial and boyish smile, said:

"Well, he climbed pretty high, you know. The reason why most of us never fail is that we always stay at the bottom."—Daily Magazine.

THE CANNY TRAVELER.

Richard Harding Davis had an amusing experience while on a recent visit to England. While motoring through the country, his party stopped to see an old church. The native guide was showing the party through, explaining all the points of interest after his own style.

"In the far corner of this 'ere church," he said, "lies William the Conker; be'ind the organ, where yer can't see, are tombs of Guy Fawkes, Robin 'Ood, and Cardinal Wolsey. Now, sir," he asked, addressing Mr. Davis, "does that there guide-book as I sees you 'ave in your 'and tell yer who's lyin' 'ere?"

"No," replied Mr. Davis candidly; "the book says nothing of it, but I can guess."—Lippincott's Magazine.

AS BOSTON SEES IT.

When Mrs. Helen Hunt Jackson was in the east some years ago, trying to arouse interest in her favorite subject, The Condition of the Indian, the distinguished author of "Ramona" met a Boston man in New York.

"How are you succeeding in your campaign in New York, Mrs. Hunt?" said he.

"Oh, not very well—New Yorkers take up the matter very slowly."

"That's very strange," replied the Bostonian in surprise. "I don't see how they could fail to be interested—after yesterday morning's editorial in the Boston Advertiser."—Exchange.

MISS MARGARET WILSON'S IDEALS.

Miss Jessie Wilson, who is in popular demand for Y. W. C. A. sermons and the like, is not the only one of the President's daughters whose outlook on the world is definitely serious and service-loving, says an exchange. To quiet rumor of a love affair, Miss Margaret thus announced her philosophy of life: "In love! How absurd! I am heart whole and fancy free. My romance is the world and the wonderful things one can do in it. Two things which help to make my life romantic are my interest in social center work, in working for the permanent primary which will make our country a real democracy, and my ambition to perfect my voice. I would rather succeed along these lines than in anything else I can think of at the present."

BILL NYE'S COMPLIMENT.

Bill Nye was once introduced to Wagner, the composer. In "Then and Now" Dean Hole relates: "Nye the American humorist, brilliant as the best, whose comedy never fails to charm, and whose tragic death I shall never cease to mourn, told me that when he met Wagner he said to him, 'Your music is beyond my comprehension, but I always feel sure when I hear it that it is really much better than it sounds.'"

Disciples Table Talk

Jasper T. Moses on Mexico.

In a recent lecture, delivered at the Christian Church, Grand Junction, Colo., on "A Message from Mexico," Jasper T. Moses, principal of the Christian Institute at Monterey, Mexico, from 1904 to 1908, and now pastor at Grand Junction, declared against American intervention; assailed the consular policy of the United States in Mexico on the grounds that it has made Mexicans despise us; declared that the Roman Catholic church, as it is known in that country is the curse which has prevented civilization and insisted that the educated, Protestant middle class which is now on the increase is the only salvation for the great land to the south. A local paper gives a front page report of the address.

Iowa District Aiding Smaller Churches.

Believing it to be the duty of strong church organizations to assist in every possible way smaller and weaker congregations, the Northwestern Iowa District Board of Christian churches is striving to complete a plan whereby financial and moral support may be given the weak by the strong. In the twenty-nine counties constituting the district are a number of congregations unable to support a pastor. It is part of the board's plan to have congregations supporting pastors to occasionally send them to the smaller churches where they will conduct services and assist in every possible way, in helping organize Sunday-schols, young people's societies, and assist in raising funds. "It is clearly the duty of stronger congregations to assist those that are not so well off either in numbers or finances," said Charles Guiney, district Bible-school superintendent at the recent district convention. "The churches that can and do support pastors should be willing to send him to preach to those who have no minister, and should also be ready to give financial aid, if necessary."

J. E. Linn Rural Church Expert.

J. E. Linn, who accepted the pastorate at the S. L. W. Ranch Church, located at Gill, Colo., in an effort to build up his health, has been making a special study of rural religious work. In recognition of his knowledge of this field, he has for some time been retained as chairman of the Rural Church Commission of the Disciples of Christ for Colorado, and has received numerous invitations to discuss rural work. Recently he has been selected as one of the twenty members of the advisory council to the Social Service Commission. Mr. Linn will give an address on "The Rural Church" before the Toronto convention.

Arkansas Bible College Progress.

The Disciples of Christ in Arkansas have in mind the founding of a Bible College at Fayetteville. The college will be located near the campus of the State University so that students desiring to do so can take studies in both institutions. Under the sanction of the State Convention a Board of Trustees has been incorporated to found and maintain said college. At a meeting of the Arkansas delegates to the National Convention of the Disciples of Christ, at Louisville last October, the following recommendations were made: "1. That the Executive Committee secure an option on a desirable lot facing the campus of the University on which to erect a building to cost not less than ten thousand dollars. 2. That an effort be made to raise five thousand dollars a year for five years—two thousand of which will be applied to building and three thousand to Bible College maintenance. 3. That N. M. Ragland be put in the field to solicit funds based on the above tentative program. 4. That the appeal be made to individuals rather than to churches as such, and that the effort look to the beginning of actual work in September, 1913." An option has been taken on a lot that seems perfectly adapted as a site for the college, for a consideration of $7,500. N. M. Ragland of Fayetteville, is making a canvass to secure the funds and to maintain the Bible college. We bespeak for him the generous reception and response that the cause he represents so richly merits.

Inland Empire Convention.

The Inland Empire Convention, at Clarkston, Washington, June 17-19, was a splendid convention. Addresses were given by I. N. McCash, A. McLean, J. H. Mohorter, Marion Stevenson, Miss Annette Newcomer, and F. E. Billington. The climax of the convention was reached on the last two nights writes J. E. Davis, when I. McCash and A. McLean at their best, delivered two masterful addresses. Mr. McLean's address was said to be one of the strongest addresses ever delivered in an Inland Empire Convention. The convention decided to put a superintendent of missions in the field and to try to get an evangelist in each of the five districts in the empire. The State Board has called S. Earl Childers, pastor of the Dean Avenue Church to the superintendent's place and has mapped out a hard year's work. The following officers were elected in the Inland Empire: J. E. Davis, Spokane, president; O. G. Shanklin, Rosalia, secretary; G. W. Mounts, Lewiston, treasurer; J. F. Rice, Colfax, Bible-school superintendent; and W. A. Cresman, Pomeroy, superintendent of Christian Endeavor. The presidents of the five districts are: J. A. Longston, Wenatchee District; O. A. Adams, Spokane District; N. W. Jackson, Whitman District; D. Lloyd Morgan, Lewiston District, and Harvey W. Mills, Walla Walla District.

Mount Hermon Federate School of Missions.

The Mount Hermon Federate School of Missions will be held at Mt. Hermon, in the Santa Cruz mountains, California, July 20-27. Mrs. D. B. Wells, widely known in eastern summer schools, will give daily Bible addresses on the general topic "Christ at Work." Mrs. Well will also conduct the two daily mission study classes in the new text-books, "The New America," by Dr. and Mrs. L. C. Barnes, and "The King's Business," by Mrs. Paul Raymond of Boulder, Colorado. The daily young people's hour will be conducted by Mrs. G. L. Hagman, State Christian Endeavor Missionary Secretary. Among the speakers will be Miss M. Irelan, Christian missionary from Mexico; Miss Isabel Crawford, formerly missionary to the Kiowa Indians of Oklahoma; Mr. or Mrs. W. H. Brewster of China; T. A. Boyer, pastor of the First Christian Church of Oakland, California, whose topic is, "What time is it, and where are we?" A registration fee of one dollar will be charged for the entire week, this fee entitling the one who registers to a copy of each of the two text-books, a badge, a writing tablet, pencil, etc. "Rallies" of the different denominations will be held on different days throughout the week. Seven denominations are now federated in the Mt. Hermon School of Missions, which has become a sort of missionary Chautauqua, whose influence is widening.

This year the Ministerial Retreat of the Sixth District of Missouri is to be held in Canton, July 15-18, from Tuesday noon to Friday. Professor Byron Ingold and his wife will have charge of the dormitory, and will see to the comfort of the guests. A rate of 75 cents a day will be made to all, which will include board, lodging, and access to the gymnasium and swimming pool. The railroad fare of the preachers will be pooled, or equalized, so that all the preachers in the district may attend at equal expense. Each day informal conferences on matters of importance to preachers will be held, and each night a strong, inspirational address will be given. Large opportunity will be afforded for renewing old friendships and forming new ones. The afternoons will be largely given to recreation. H. B. Robison, of Canton, is Secretary-Treasurer of the Retreat.

The Central Church, Marion, Indiana, has lately introduced the merger service for its morning worship, and finds that the combined service is getting more children to stay for the morning worship, besides slightly increasing the morning adult attendance. The church took its offering for foreign misions, combining the Sunday-school and church offerings, the second Sunday in June, and secured a total of $41.31, the Sunday-school portion of this amount exceeding the apportionment, $7.50. The church is to spend $225 in improvements during the summer, and over half this amount was pledged by the officers this same Sunday. A mission circle has been organized, and thirteen added to the church membership since the first of the year. E. H. Clifford ministers to this field.

A neat catalog of "Missionary Publications and Importations" used by the American Christian Missionary Society in the Home work has just come to hand. In this booklet are listed: Text Books: Adult, Senior, Intermediate, Junior; Mission Study Classes; Missionary Libraries; General Methods; Bible-school Materials; Prayer Cycle; Periodicals; Leaflets; Monthly Programs; Supplies for Offerings; Missionary Entertainments. Copies should be in the hands of missionary secretaries and committee chairmen.

The Christian Century is in receipt of an interesting bulletin prepared by Walter Scott Athearn on "Music and Art in the Bible-school." In this booklet Professor Athearn, who holds the professorship of Religious Education at Drake, has listed the best material to be found treating the subjects of music and art, as pertaining to the Sunday-school. All who are interested in this important matter should write to Professor Athearn for a copy of the booklet. This will be furnished free.

On June 15, Central Church, Spokane, celebrated its twenty-sixth anniversary by raising its total indebtedness. I. McCash, after a masterful sermon in the morning, secured over $9,500 in pledges, increasing this amount to $10,000 at night. This church was organized twenty-six years ago, being one of the first to be established in the "Inland Empire." Now there are eighty churches in this section. J. E. Davis now ministers to the Central.

Finis Idleman, pastor of the Central Church, Des Moines, was given the D. D. degree by Drake University during the recent commencement week. The following Sunday Mr. Idleman was introduced to his congregation by Geo. A. Jewett as "Dr. Idleman," and a round of applause indicated the pride of the members in their pastor's recent honor.

Ellsworth Faris, preaching at Waukegan, Ill., writes of the death on May 25, of Mary McClure Stafford, a member of the congregation there for fifty years. She was an interested reader of the Christian Century and a keen observer of events in the religious world, Mr. Faris states. Mrs. Stafford is survived by her husband, G. H. Stafford and by twenty-two children and grandchildren.

Chas S. Early is beginning his second meeting at Leona, Kans. During the past two seasons, Mr. Early has conducted seven return meetings, and has received requests for as many more. He recently closed the eighth meeting in which he assisted the Hill City, Kansas, Church.

Dr. L. B. Kline, Vigan, P. I., reports 548 treatments for the month of April, 262 surgical treatments, twenty-two visits to the sick in Vigan, twenty towns visited, twenty gospel meetings held, twenty-one patients admitted to the hospital, eighteen surgical operations performed.

James Small, recently returned from England, visited the Christian Century office early in the week. Mr Small is on his way to Macatawa, where he will rest for a few days before beginning an evangelistic campaign in Hedrick, Iowa.

Dr. G. E. Miller of Mungeli, India, has reached America on his furlough. He served out his time on the field faithfully, writes F. M. Rains. He is in good spirits. His home is near Buford, Ohio.

John R. Golden resigned from the pastorate of the West Side Church, Springfield, Ill., June 29. Mr. Golden will remain with the West Side Church, however, until his successor is elected.

Second Church, Rock Island, Ill., is now ministered to by W. B. Stine, formerly a member of the official board of Memorial Church.

James Ware of Shanghai, China, is now in this country. He has been compelled to undergo an operation at Rochester, Minn.

The Iowa State Convention will be held at Keokuk Sept. 8-11, instead of in July, as stated in a late issue of this paper.

The church at Connersville, Ind., L. E. Brown, pastor, becomes a Living-link in the Foreign Society.

H. W. Hunter reports 30 added to the church at Higginsville, Mo., within the last 30 days.

EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

South Bend, Ind., First, Fife Brothers, evangelists; 200; continuing.

Monmouth, Ill., D. E. Hughes, pastor; Fife Brothers, evangelists; beginning July 8.

Red Oak, Iowa, Geo. H. Nichol, pastor; G. L. Snively, evangelist; 30; closed.

Paris, Tex., J. T. Ogle, pastor; Minges Company, evangelists; 400; closed.

CALLS.

J. Sherman Hill, Paola, Kans., to Cameron, Mo. Declined.

E. H. Wray, Steubenville, Ohio.

W. M. Le May, Hennessey, Okla.

H. J. Reynolds, Herron, Ill.

International Convention

(Toronto, Sept. 30-Oct. 6.)

Our next big convention will be for the first time in its history truly international. Never before have its sessions been held off the soil of the United States. This year upon British soil and under the friendly folds of "Old Glory" and the "Union Jack" American Disciples will meet to view their record and plan for the future. The occasion will thus be unique.

Our preparations are going steadily on. Massey Hall, a magnificent and beautiful structure, centrally located, will be the place of meeting. Near by, the Metropolitan Methodist Church, one of the most important church buildings in Canada, will be available likely for overflow and other meetings. Summer excursion rates will prevail; hotel accommodation will be good; abundant accommodation may be had reasonably in choice homes. (This is a feature of Toronto as a convention city.) Full announcement of rates later. If you think of coming write Rev. C. O. Reynard, 16 Harbord St., Chairman of Committee on Entertainment. Address the General Secretary, Prof. H. F. Dawes, 600 Manning Ave., for information of any other kind.

At a recent joint meeting of the local committee and international secretaries, it was decided to cut the registration fee to 50 cents. This important reduction ought to insure a big attendance. Decide early.

Reuben Butchart (Publicity).
207 Grace St., Toronto, Canada.

Christian College

Christian College, at Columbia, Mo., closed its sixty-second year, May 28 with a week of interesting programs. Charles H. Winders, of Indianapolis, a trustee of the college and a former pastor of the Columbia Church, preached the baccalaureate sermon. Dean William D. MacClintock, of Chicago University gave the commencement address, a splendid presentation of the subject, "The Socialization of the Individual."

Thirty-five students received diplomas: seventeen in the literary course; three in piano; six in voice; seven in expression; two in art. Nine students received certificates from the academic department.

President St. Clair-Moss presented an interesting and encouraging report at the annual meeting of the board of trustees, on May 26. This report showed the college to be in a flourishing condition. 236 students were enrolled during the year from 16 states. Of these, 151 were in the boarding department.

The official standardization of the college as a Junior College by the University of Missouri was another interesting feature of the year's report. Fully $5,000 was reported as permanent investment in improvements on buildings and grounds during the past year. Plans were formulated for the needed increase in endowment and the goal set for $200,000.

The "red letter" day of commencement week was May 27, when occurred the dedication of the J. K. Rogers Memorial Gateway. It was a fine occasion. A large concourse of alumnae, friends and townspeople gathered on the college campus for the impressive ceremonies. Mrs. Camilla Switzler Branham, president of the College Alumnae Association, presided and presented the Memorial Gateway to the trustees, which was accepted by Mr. D. A. Robnett, president of the board. Honorable E. W. Stephens, a personal friend of J. K. Rogers, made an eloquent and masterly dedication address. At the close of the ceremonies little Allen Mason Crittenden, only grand-daughter of the distinguished educator, unveiled the bronze tablets on the central columns of the gateway. The alumnae luncheon followed the dedication program, one hundred and twenty-three alumnae and friends being present. Mrs. J. K. Rogers and her two daughters, Mrs. A. B. Holland and Mrs. T. T. Crittenden, all three being alumnae of the college, were present at the Rogers Memorial dedication program and the alumnæ luncheon.

Federal Council Commission

The Federal Council Commission on the Church and Social Service has issued its annual call for the observance of Labor Sunday, which occurs this year on August 31. In view of the fact that many of the pastors will not return from their vacations, the Commission recommends that such pastors give recognition to the day on either the first or second Sunday in September.

As the special subject to be considered in sermons and addresses the Commission recommends "Present Day Tendencies in the Labor Movement," in view of the fact that the organized labor movement is at the present moment divided within itself.

The usual pamphlet of suggestions for both the regular morning service and the evening union service of the churches, and a program for use in the morning service, which may be ordered in quantities, may be obtained on application to the Secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, 1611 Clarendon Building, 215 Fourth Ave., New York City.

An Opportunity

Bethany Assembly offers a fine opportunity for many Sunday-school workers to take the Sunday-school course this year. The management has asked me to make this announcement. Every pastor, superintendent or Sunday-school worker taking at least five people with him for this work, will be granted free entertainment. This will give many superintendents and pastors an opportunity to go at small expense. Every school in the brotherhood could send at least five people to this school of methods. The date is August 5-15. Write Garry L. Cook, 421 Law Bldg., Indianapolis, for information.

Summer Conference Laymen's Missionary Movement.

Lake Geneva, Wis.

The third summer conference of the Laymen's Missionary Movement to be held at the Y. M. C. A. Camp on beautiful Lake Geneva, Wis., July 26-31, 1913, affords the leaders of the church in the United States and Central Canada another great spiritual opportunity. The two previous conferences have been an unmeasured blessing in the lives of many men.

The conference this year will be of special interest because it will prepare for the United Missionary Campaign which is being planned by the Home and Foreign Missionary Boards of the United States and Canada, and is to culminate in a nation-wide simultaneous canvass in March, 1914.

The registration of delegates should not be delayed. A program and registration fee of $2 will be charged each delegate to assist in defraying the expenses. Delegates may be registered through F. J. Michel, Field Secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, 19 S. LaSalle Street, Chicago.

Rates.

Rates for board and lodging for full conference period, Saturday lunch to Thursday breakfast inclusive: In tents, $7.50 per person; in cottages, $8.75 per person; in the villa, $12.50 per person. By the day for those remaining part time only: In tents, $2 per person; in cottages, $2.25 per person; in the villa, $3 per person. Those who wish to reduce expenses may be assigned two in a room at the following rates: For full conference period: In tents, $6.25; in cottages, $7.50; in the villa, $10.

Total Expense.

The total expense of the conference to a single delegate may be secured by adding $11.25 for a double room or $12.50 for a single room to the traveling expenses to Chicago and return. This will give the total cost of attending the conference including every legitimate charge.

Program.

The daily program will be as follows:

8:45 a. m.—Bible Study.
9:30 a. m.—Round Table Conference or Missionary discussion groups.
10:30 a. m.—Conference sessions.
11:30 a. m. to 12:15 a. m.—Conferences by communions.
6:45 p. m.—Vespers.
7:45 p. m.—Conference sessions.

The afternoons will be set apart for recreation.

Report of the Budget Committee

I have been asked by the Budget Committee to send to our papers a summary of the report as it now stands. It was decided by vote of the committee that the report itself should not be published until it is submitted to the Toronto convention. For the information of those who are interested I submit the following:

"The Budget Committee had its final meeting prior to the Toronto Convention in Chicago, June 24. All members were present except G. B. VanArsdall, of Denver, and Judge A. F. Henry, of Cleveland. The latter was kept away by sickness in his family.

The draft of the report which had been written by the chairman and revised by the sub-committee was taken up section by section, and after careful revision, was formally adopted by the full committee. The report recommends the creation by the general convention of a permanent Budget-Apportionment Committee which shall secure from the various missionary societies and boards each year a statement of the amounts received by them from the churches during the preceding year, and an estimate of what will be needed for the coming year. The Budget-Apportionment Committee is to carefully consider and if need be, revise these estimates, and then add them all together thus making a general missionary budget. (The state societies are to be invited to submit their estimates, in order that a general state mission budget may be secured.) This general budget is then to be submitted to the convention for its adoption, and when adopted by the convention, it is to become the general missionary budget for the year.

Immediately following the general convention, the Budget-Apportionment Committee, together with the Advisory Committee which is composed of one representative of each society or board, is to meet and make a careful apportionment of the General Missionary Budget to the various states. The state boards are then to make a suggestive apportionment of the amount apportioned to the several states to the local churches.

The report further recommends the employment by the Budget-Apportionment Committee of a capable man who shall give all or part of his time to a campaign of publicity in advocacy of the adoption and use of the budget plan. The committee is also to publish literature for information concerning its work. The expenses of the committee are to be borne proportionately by the societies sharing in the budget.

The estimates from the several national societies have already been secured, and will be included as a part of the report of the committee. The several states are to be invited to submit their estimates in order that they may be included. This is being done in order that there may be no delay in putting the plan into operation, if the report is adopted by the Toronto convention. The report will be printed and distributed at Toronto prior to the session in which it will be considered.

The percentage in any state will be arrived at by finding the ratio between the amounts for the various societies in that state, and will vary as these amounts vary.

The Chairman will gladly answer, as he is able, any inquiries concerning the report.

GRAHAM FRANK, Chairman.

Liberty, Missouri.

The Winona Bible Conference

The Winona Bible Conference at Winona Lake, Ind., will be held this year from August 22 to 31. The excellence of the program that has been prepared leads the management to herald the approaching conference season as "The Surpassing Year." This conference has grown in numbers and importance until it stands at the head of all such gatherings, not only in this country, but throughout the world. It is a great school where the best and most wholesome lectures the world of culture can produce are offered through two weeks to ministers, Christian workers and all others interested.

Many notable names appear upon the program. Among the speakers from abroad are Rev. G. Campbell Morgan and Gipsy Smith of England. These brethren will be present throughout the conference. Dan Crawford, the returned missionary, Mrs. Booth-Clibborn and Rev. Robert J. (Catch-my-Pal) Patterson, of Belfast, Ireland will speak at different sessions of the conference.

The list of American speakers includes Hon. Wm. Jennings Bryan, Rev. Camden M. Cobern, Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, Bishop Edwin H. Hughes, Rev. Wm. A. Sunday, Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, Rev. John Balcolm Shaw, Rev. George R. Stuart, Dr. W. G. Morehead of Xenia, Ohio, Dr. Malcolm James MacLeod, Dr. Mark A. Matthews and Rev. A. T. Robertson. As on last year Major James H. Cole will have charge of the morning hour at 6:30; Marion Lawrance will speak at the Sunday-school hour and Prof. E. O. Excell will organize and lead the great choir.

The Disciples have again been honored by the Assembly's inviting George H. Combs of Kansas City to deliver three addresses at this year's conference. This invitation is a recognition of both the ability of Brother Combs and the increasing fellowship of the Disciples in attendance each year upon the conference. Denominational rallies are a scheduled feature of the program and such rallies will be held by the Disciples.

Tipton, Ind. G. I. HOOVER,
Conference Chairman for the Disciples of Christ.

The Toronto Convention

Unusual interest already obtains in the Toronto Convention. The indications are for the largest attendance any convention held outside the very center of our strength ever had. Go where you will—North, South, East, West—one hears the people saying "I am going to Toronto if possible."

Among the reasons for this wide-spread interest we would enumerate the following:

1. The Time is Propitious. The regular date is changed to September 30—October 6. This is within, though at the very end of the summer vacation season. The cheap summer rates to Niagara Falls and all lake and sea terminals are yet in force on both railroad and steamboat lines. This will be an ideal time for inland parties to converge at Detroit, Cleveland and Buffalo for the across-the-lake trip to Toronto.

2. The Place is Propitious. Toronto is an ideal convention city. Many large religious convocations are held there each year. Massey Hall is one of the most ideal auditoriums on the American continent. Its acoustics are perfect. It has numerous committee rooms and other accessories, and a massive pipe organ.

3. The Facility of Access is Propitious. Toronto is within easy reach. It is less than seventy miles from Buffalo and 150 miles from Cleveland, and by railroad it is exactly 229 miles from Detroit. Toronto as men travel is only eighteen hours from Cincinnati, which is the same distance as is Kansas City, Atlanta, Washington and Richmond. It is not so far away as Des Moines, Omaha, St. Paul, Minneapolis or New Orleans, at which places our Conventions have assembled.

4. The Esprit de Corps is Propitious. The Canadian people are one with the people of the United States. If not yet in trade, reciprocity obtains in thought and ideals. To those who are in Christ Jesus there is no thirty-ninth parallel. On both sides of the border Huntington's hymn may be sung with sincerity:

Two empires by the sea,
Two nations great and free
One anthem raise.
One race of ancient fame,
One tongue, one faith we claim,
One God whose glorious name
We love and praise.

Now may the God above
Guard the dear lands we love,
Both east and west.
Let love more fervent glow
As peaceful ages go,
And strength yet stronger grow
Blessing the blest.

5. The Occasion is Propitious. At Toronto will be made apparent the real relationship of our organized missionary work to the churches. The American Christian Missionary Society, the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and all the other Boards are but servants of the churches. As several committees appointed and directed by the churches, these Societies will report to the churches and ask their further pleasure. The various policies of the several Boards are to be directly determined by the churches whose own work it really is. This is the whole meaning of the much talked of General Convention of the Churches of Christ. For this reason the churches everywhere are urged to send delegates.

Shall We Go Back?

Here are two statements and a question. Comparative showing of Minister Relief receipts for the first eight months of the missionary year.

	To July 1, 1912	To July 1, 1913	Gain.
Church Offerings	$5,599.44	$8,813.72	$3,214.28
Contributing Churches	356	628	272
Individual Offerings	1,278.91	1,327.56	48.65
Contributing Individuals	194	258	64
Bequests	612.29	6,262.00	5,649.71
Annuities	100.00	100.00
Miscellaneous		1,486.71	1,488.71
Total			$10,399.35

With this splendid gain we have been enabled to get more nearly up to the actual necessities in the payment of pensions. But as our family is constantly growing, we still have to exercise the utmost care. The July payments are as follows and go to forty-six ministers and thirty-eight widows.

Quarterly Payments.

9	$25.00	$225.00
7	20.00	140.00
9	15.00	135.00
25		$500.00

Monthly.

14	$25.00	$350.00
4	20.00	80.00
21	15.00	315.00
19	10.00	190.00
58		$935.00
Grand total		$1,435.00

Brethren, these remittances leave our treasury empty. We have paid out $2,406.13 more than we did in the whole of last year. The July payment was necessarily reduced. We will need $1,035 to meet the regular monthly payment in August. Will you let us have it, or shall we go back to the starvation basis? We are simply the agents of our brethren. We wait for instructions, with remittances from churches and individuals. He gives twice who gives promptly.

Good Month for Foreign Missions

June has proved a splendid month for the Foreign Society. Words of cheer and encouragement came from every quarter. There was unusual interest in Children's Day. Never before was there such enthusiasm. It seems more emphasis was put upon the day and its importance than at any former time in its long and successful history. The unveiling of the portrait of G. L. Wharton was an event of very great interest throughout the brotherhood.

The returns also reflect the growing interest of our people in world-wide missions. During the month 2,584 Sunday-schools sent offerings, an increase over the corresponding month of last year of 179. The schools gave $53,639, a gain of $3,811. Many schools gave for the first time and many passed their apportionments. Altogether, there seems to be a rising tide of missionary interest in the Sunday-school army.

There was also a good gain in the personal offerings, $4,539, and a gain in annuities of $9,900. There was a loss in the receipts from the churches, as churches, of $146.90. The gain in regular receipts was $5,465. The total receipts for the month were $78,734.09, a total gain on the month of $15,300.

The total receipts for the first nine months of the year amounted to $225,545, a gain of $29,877. Only three more months before the books close, September 30. We can reach the $500,000 if we will! Let every friend do his best. The harvest of the world is over ripe. Remember, $500,000 would insure a great convention at Toronto; and remember also, that the work demands every dollar of it and more. Let there be no delay in sending the offerings. Forward to F. M. Rains, Sec., Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Attention, Indiana Preachers!

You are hereby invited to be guests of Bethany Assembly from Monday morning, July 28, to Saturday afternoon, August 2. All of your expenses including room and board will be borne by the liberal men of the Assembly. We want you to come. Please take this as a personal invitation. I shall not take time to write to each of you individually. If you have not a program, I shall be glad to send you one. Hoping to se you, Monday, July 28, I am,

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointed by churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

Is Teacher Training Played Out?

By no means. There may not be so many graduates "turned out" as there were four or five years ago. But that is logical. Teacher training has ceased to be a fad, and no longer do teacher-training "spelling matches" enliven our convention programs. It has now become a serious business, as attending a high class university is a serious business.

The natural result of this happy development of teacher training from an amusement to a serious work is a demand for better literature. The teacher training course that satisfied five years ago, will not go today.

For many weeks the Disciples Publication Society has been searching for the very best texts to be included in the BETHANY TEACHER TRAINING COURSE. We think we have found them.

If your school takes teacher training seriously, we want to help you, and can help you.

Here in Chicago we have the advantage of frequent conferences with the International S. S. Association as to latest developments in teacher training.

Send for information today.

The Christian's Hope

Hope for the Individual and for the Race

There is a beautiful picture in the epistle to the Hebrews which begins by exhorting us to live the "principles of the gospel of Christ." By principles it means the elementary things. It exhorts us to cease laying the foundation of repentance, for that foundation is already laid if our Christian life is sincere and is none the less substantial because it is buried out of sight. And then it goes on to suggest that even faith in some of its aspects belongs to the elementary things of the Christian life, not that we have outgrown faith, but that we outgrow that aspect of faith which is directly joined to repentance. From this beginning the chapter goes on to relate of a great thing which God has given to the world and pledged himself to it with a double oath. There is no language in the Bible concerning any gift of God that is quite so significant as this: "Wherein God, being minded to shew more abundantly unto the heirs of the promise the immutability of his counsel, interposed with an oath; that by two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, we may have a strong encouragement, who have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us; which we have as an anchor of the soul." This splendid, indefeasible gift of God, built high above its foundation of repentance, and more beautiful in some of its aspects even than faith, is Christian hope. It is an anchor to the soul and the value of the anchor is that it is not only strong in itself but it is attached to something that can never fail.

What are these hopes? They may be divided into two classes—those which belong to the individual and those which belong to the race, and in both of these they are most inspiring. Consider first those hopes that belong to the individual. There is the hope of the forgiveness of sin; there is the hope of personal righteousness; there is the hope of knowledge of the character of God and of growth into his likeness. I have already said that no other religion gives these hopes. I say further that in proportion as men in Christian lands lose hold of their Christian faith these hopes perish with the faith.

I do not mean that every man becomes immoral when he ceases to hold to the doctrines of Christianity. I do mean, and say unhesitatingly, that that fact is true concerning a very large proportion of individual men so that even such men as Prof. Huxley have come very seriously to question whether it is possible to maintain successful instruction in ethics without some sanction from a religion essentially Christian.

So we commend to you this great and beautiful hope of the gospel, grounded on the firmest foundation in the universe, the love of a good God, and pledged to us in that surety of our salvation, the Holy Bible, and still further assured to us in God's great gift of Jesus Christ our Lord. Hold fast to hope, the hope which God has sworn to us by the double promise, immutable and everlasting. Hold fast to hope, for it is the anchor of the soul and we are saved by hope.

So much for Christian hope as it affects the individual. It is a hope of righteousness here and of everlasting life now and hereafter. It is the noblest, most worthy hope, most fit to be true of any that has ever entered human life. But the Christian hope for the race is not less inspiring. It assures us that as our life in the beginning came forth from God so the destiny of the world is inseparably inwrought with the purposes of God; that in proportion as the world is conformed to these purposes the kingdom of God is to come with increase of righteousness, with diminution of sickness, pain and sin, till men can live in a holy brotherhood and even death will have lost its sting. Such a hope for the world very naturally joins itself to a great hope for the world to come and the Christian faith confirms this hope and tells us that God's gift of Jesus Christ is a confirmation of it; that in Him we are begotten again into a living hope by his resurrection from the dead; that in him we may have immortal life and that the kingdom of God may fully come both in earth and in heaven.

"Still in my breast, despite its load of sorrow,
Despite the pressure of o'erwhelming care,
I sense the thrilling joy of a to-morrow
Whose dawn shall lighten up the darkness there.
I sense a moment nigh when, woe abating,
I'll tread the path that leads on to release,
And find a cure for troubles dire awaiting Safe in the everlasting arms of Peace.

"For Life and Love so close are interweaving
That none can live and yet be portionless;
And days must come with hours all retrieving
The dreary years of unfound happiness;
And he whose share of Love is not yet ready,
Whose measure of its joy is yet unknown,
Need only keep his Faith both sure and steady
To come sometime, somewhere, into his own!"

In the World, but Not of It

The saint is well furnished with worldly wisdom. He needs this wisdom in his business of being a saint. He must know men; what they hope and what they fear, how they help each other and how they defraud each other, what they know and what they do not know. In dress, in occupation, and in social customs, the saint may be very much like the sinner. But only the superficial observer will fail to see the differences. There are significant differences in habits and in motives.

The saint of the present is in the world of politics. A Christian man, who had been active in politics for many years said, "When I was a young man the word politician had to me about the same meaning as thief. I thought no Christian should be in politics. Now I am sure that no man can be a Christian unless he is politically active." Jesus bids his disciples serve. They can serve at the polls; they can vote for what they believe is right; they must refuse to sell their votes directly or indirectly; public office is for them a sacred trust, not an opportunity to steal; they do not ask their fellow citizens to elect them to office on account of the honorable record of their ancestors nor because they are unfit for any kind of work and must live in some way; they make themselves worthy of confidence and they fit themselves for public service.

The business world offers an opportunity for men to display the virtues of the Christian faith. It has been too often looked upon as the exclusive possession of the selfish and the unscrupulous. Men who profess to be disciples of Jesus have said that it is not possible to apply the principles of Jesus in the business life. For these men the doctrine of the survival of the fittest means that fitness is constituted by cunning and cruelty and heartlessness. They have no faith in integrity and the spirit of fairness as commercial assets. Men who hold this view of business and Christianity have opposed to them the disciples of Jesus who take their discipleship seriously. For them life is more than money. They will not sell their souls for dollars. They hold that honesty is the best policy but they are honest for other reasons.

The Christian has a service to render in the labor world. Labor is asserting its rights. It is doing its own thinking. It is refusing to be ordered about here and there by capitalists. It says that the laborer is not only worthy of his hire but that he has a right to say something about the conditions under which he labors and the hours of labor. By combining, the laborers have become strong to defend themselves and to acquire privileges from which they would be excluded if they did not know and assert their rights. And here is the danger. It is easier to fight for justice to ourselves than it is to be just to the other man. The laborer is just as apt to be wrong as any of the rest of men. He therefore needs the spirit of Jesus to direct him in the way of justice and kindness.

In the daily contacts of men with men there is much that is properly designated as worldly. The desire to appear superior to our neighbor, pride in our possessions that hurts the honest, competent worker who has less than we have, the use of the knowledge imparted by the schools, not to aid us in being brotherly companions to all whom we meet, but to mark us off from the illiterate as persons who have no fellowship with the ignorant, the notion that any useful work skilfully done is degrading; the feeling that all political wisdom is contained within our party and that all sound religious teaching has been monopolized by our sect—these are illustrations of the worldliness with which we are surrounded and which dwells within us. We need to learn that the great thing is to be a man and to share with other men life's bitter and sweet. When we fence ourselves off and assume the airs of superiority, we cease to be disciples of Jesus.

It may be necessary at times to be in the church and not of it. All sorts of ability are needed in the church. Many kinds of work are necessary that the church may be prospered. Leadership, learning, social graces, financial power, all contribute toward the growth of organized religion. It may happen that these are present where faith and love are absent or too weak to put them into the service of the kingdom of God. Then it becomes necessary, for the salvation of the church, that there come into it members who do not possess its dominant spirit. These members will not despise the gifts of the other members; they will honor them. But they will subject them to the control of the spirit of Jesus. They live in and for the church, not in self-righteous aloofness. [Midweek Service, July 23. John 17:15; 2 Thess. 3: 1-5.] S. J.

Eastward the Star

Bishop Berkeley wrote prophetic lines in that fine quatrain,

"Westward the star of empire takes its way.
The first four acts already passed,
A fifth shall close the drama with the day,
Time's noblest offspring is its last."

There is a sixth act in the drama, however, which Bishop Berkeley never anticipated, and now the star of empire turns eastward. Out in the Rocky Mountains and on the Pacific Coast they have been experimenting with woman's suffrage. Now Illinois, first of the states east of the Mississippi, comes into the procession of states that grant the ballot to women.

We are not anticipating that equal suffrage will be a cure-all for the ills of the body politic. If the experience of the states that have granted the ballot to women is to be accounted of any value, we still shall have all our problems with us, but the ballot in the hands of women has not seemed to complicate the problem, and there have been instances where it has proved a strong weapon in the interest of righteousness.

One thing we note with interest is that the saloon vote of Illinois is solidly against woman's suffrage. If we can find out what the saloons do not want that is what we do want. At any rate, so far as Illinois is concerned, the new order of things is here, and it belongs to us all to accept it heartily and to desire that good may come of it.

Comparisons are odious, but the campaign of the women in Illinois, as compared with that in England, has been so dignified and so sensible that we gladly congratulate the American women on the contrast between the two.

You Are Wrong, Mr. Grayson

David Grayson, who, by the way is not David Grayson at all but quite another person, said in the "Adventures in Contentment" some years ago: "Theology possesses a vain-gloriousness which places its faith in human theories; but science, at its best, is humble before nature itself." And thereby you are wrong, Mr. Grayson, as well as unfair. There is a kind of cock-sureness to science at its worst that is as bad as the utmost vain-gloriousness of theology at its worst. At its best,—and surely both terms of the comparison ought to receive the same treatment,—theology is as humble and teachable and reverent as was the old botanist kneeling reverently before his flower. The botanist puts his question to the roses and the theologian puts his to the soul of man. Each at his best, and it must be both at their best if the comparison is to be valid, observes and analyzes and makes his inductions humbly as a seeker after truth. The astronomer watches the behavior of the stars under the play of the forces that hold them in a shining order; the theologian watches the soul of man as it responds to the pull of forces that are as real as gravity. Each is truly scientific when he is at his best. You ought to know more theologians, Mr. Grayson.

The Underpaid Farmer

At the national conference on Marketing and Farm Credit, Mr. Spillman, of the Department of Agriculture, produced an estimate that the average farm income is about six hundred and fifty dollars a year; and that, after allowing a reasonable interest on his investment, the average farmer gets about one dollar a day for his own labor.

True, the farmer is his own boss; and, according to this calculation, he is one of the very worst bosses in the country. He not only makes himself work long hours in all kinds of weather but pays himself scandalously low wages. If ever there was justification for a general strike it exists in this industry. We hope to see the time when farmers will enroll themselves in a union and walk out en masse, refusing to do another lick of work except upon the following conditions: That pre-Adamite methods of cultivation, by which a given plot of ground produces less than half as much as it should, be abandoned forthwith; that the preventable waste in marketing farm products—which Mr. Yoakum estimates at one billion five hundred million dollars a year—be corrected by co-operative marketing.

If every farmer can bring his own boss to these terms there is no reason why he should not pay himself double the present wages and cut down his working day to a reasonable length. On the whole he cannot expect higher prices from the consumer than those now obtaining; nor can he, on the whole, expect much cheaper transportation by rail. For higher profits he must look to decreased cost of production of the unit, to decreased cost of reaching the railroad station, and to reduction of the present waste in marketing his produce.

Hymn by J. P. Morgan's Grandfather

So far as we know, J. Pierpont Morgan was not guilty of writing poetry! His grandfather, however, Rev. John Pierpont, was a first-class hymn-writer, as the following hymn from his pen indicates:

"O Thou to whom in ancient time
The lyre of Hebrew bards was strung,
Whom kings adored in songs sublime,
And prophets praised with glowing tongue.

"Not now on Zion's height alone
Thy favored worshiper may dwell;
Nor where, at sultry noon, Thy Son
Sat weary, by the patriarch's well.

"From every place below the skies,
A grateful song, a fervent prayer,
The incense of the heart may rise
To Heaven and find acceptance there.

"O Thou to whom in ancient time
The lyre of prophet-bards was strung—
To Thee, at last, in every clime
Shall temples rise and praise be sung."

"Supremest"

The American temper is restless under constraint and our American speech frets at the limitation of the superlative degree. We will have none of such bitter bondage. Several times recently we have heard preachers use the word "supremest." And how much supremer over something supreme is something supremest? The interesting symptom in this grammatical slip is that it points to a radical restlessness of temper rather than to a mere failure in technical mastery of English. We want the big, big word to describe the big, big thing. Preachers take desperate chances with "infinite" and apply it to countless finite quantities. We want big words; when we cannot find them in the dictionary, we make them. We say "supremest."

Henry Ward Beecher Said:

The discussions that are going on, aside from this dynastic revolution on the subject of religion, if looked at from a large philosophical standpoint, will show that men are no longer regarding religion as a dynastic power, nor as a scholastic, technical and intellectual system. They will show that the world's thought or the world's mind is running toward religion as a vital force rather than as an organized intellection. As a means of education and of reformation, it is adapting itself to the absolute wants of mankind, and is daily growing in importance. Religion is a great power, out of which cunning hands had stolen from heaven the celestial fire, that the altar of a pretended religion might be the means of welding chains and forging swords and spears to oppress men with. This is all past; and now men are beginning to ask, "What can the Spirit of love manifested by the sacrifice of Christ do for us?" What can it do for the poor? What can it do for all the crying wants of mankind? There is a growing tendency to unity of feeling, therefore, for justice. So soon as religion becomes love and benevolence, you cannot keep men apart.

Woman's Peculiar Function

However broad and far-reaching the undertakings that are waiting for the women of the future, it is their peculiar function to transfuse those undertakings with the spirit of universal motherhood of increasing depth and scope and power.

To quote from a recently published article: "How great is the condemnation if the native motherhood with which we are endowed is not voluntarily and intelligently developed by us to reach out in love and tenderness and sympathy far beyond the children of our bodies to the children of our spirits—all bruised and weak and helpless things, who without us may never see the light of day, without us may know nothing of the glory and the wonder of this world. If all the women rose to their magnificent birthright of motherhood those sad anomalies we call orphans, both physical and spiritual, would be no more."

The Massachusetts House of Representatives has recognized the thirty-five years of service as chaplain of the house of Rev. D. W. Waldron by doubling his salary from $300 per annum to $600. The senate followed suit by doubling the salary of its chaplain, Rev. E. A. Horton.

"Pilgrim Sunday"

Another named Sunday is on the list now. It is called "Pilgrim Sunday." The idea is simply to get the whole town, literally everybody in town, to make a pilgrimage and go to church on a Sunday agreed upon in advance. This happened lately at Wyoming, a village of 1,450 near Cincinnati, on May 25. The Christian Intelligencer (Reformed Church, New York City), of June 18, gives this account of it:

Getting a Village to Church.

"Pilgrim Sunday" and its almost marvelous success in Wyoming, a village of 1,450 persons near Cincinnati, has been made known through the Associated Press reports. There are evidences that the idea will spread over the country, and the plan of operation as explained by Rev. A. L. Wilson of Wyoming Church will be useful to other communities. Early in the winter, following a meeting of men in the Presbyterian church to hear a speaker from China, the Wyoming Welfare Association was formed of men of the village, irrespective of religious faith. This association had committees on entertainment, village improvement, social and moral uplift. The latter committee recently reported that the churches as upbuilders of the community were not recognized as they should be and recommended that May 25 be named when everyone in town should go to some church.

Circular letters with pledge cards were sent to each home and committees appointed to collect and check up cards. The mayor, a Presbyterian elder, issued a proclamation calling upon everyone to attend church. Committees of men not largely interested in church work were put in charge of small districts to visit all those who had not promised to attend and to meet their excuses. The boarding house keeper who complained that her boarders wanted a hot meal promised to attend church when the committeeman persuaded the boarders that a cold lunch was acceptable that day.

It is said that twenty shut-ins and the policement were the only people in the village who were not in church. The Episcopal church brought in chairs from neighboring houses, and there were 100 more people in the Presbyterian church than ever before.

The Baptist and Catholic churches were also crowded.

Regular services were held and there was nothing but the extra friendliness of the members toward the visitors to indicate that an effort had been made to reach everyone in town.

Roman Catholic Foreign Missions

The Society for the Propagation of the Faith is the foreign mission board of the Roman Catholic church. In the June "Annals" of that society, the foreign mission receipts are given. The receipts from all over the world amounted to $1,610,315.11. France gave nearly one-half of this sum, or $621,366.19. It is quite interesting to note that the 15,000,000 Roman Catholics of the United States gave only $366,460.59. How ridiculous this looks for the Roman Catholics will appear instantly from the fact that a comparatively new religious body like the Disciples of Christ, numbering about 1,300,000 gave more than $400,000. Furthermore, the Protestants of the United States give about $25,000,000 a year to foreign missions. These figures make one wonder where is the boasted strength of the Roman Catholic church in this country. Missionary contributions to the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, from other lands besides France and the United States, are set forth as follows in The Catholic World (July, New York City):

Germany	$196,013.53
Belgium	71,246.23
Argentine	61,188.81
Italy	54,476.91
Ireland	52,736.96
Spain	40,855.08
Mexico	24,330.86
Switzerland	20,414.77
England	20,127.16
Chili	19,129.77

Speaking of Roman Catholic foreign missions, here is a new reason for greater missionary activity amongst our own people. At the close of 1911 there were in China, 1,363,697 baptized Roman Catholics, with 390,985 catechumens under instruction awaiting baptism, according to a Roman Catholic journal published in England and partly reprinted in The Catholic World. Other figures given by the same journal for the same country, follow: Bishops, 49; priests, 1,426 European and 701 Chinese; students for the priesthood, 1,215; nuns 1,896, of which 1,328 are Chinese. Shall China be Roman Catholic? We think facts like these, once grasped should result in doubling our efforts all along the line.

Congregational Gains in America

Advance proofs of the annual Year Book of Congregationalism reveal the following gains over 1912 (July): In churches, sixteen; in members, 4,285; in Sunday-school members, 11,048. Against the 140 churches added last year, 124 were dropped. In thirty-eight states, there was a gain of 7,117 members, but in nineteen other states there were net losses amounting to 2,832. The Sunday-school figures reveal the same tragedy. While in thirty-four states there was a gain of 16,873, yet in nineteen other states there was a loss of 5,825. The annual report shows that there are 743,026 members in 6,064 Congregational churches in the United States, with 675,677 members in the Sunday-scools. A loss of 3,298 is reported in the total membership of young people's societies. Losses are reported in benevolent offerings to various societies and likewise in Congregational benevolence. Evidently, Congregationalism lacks the evangelistic passion.

Charles Stelzle Resigns

For ten years Charles Stelzle has pioneered his way into the hearts and minds of thousands of Christians now absorbed in social service programs. He established the world-famed Labor Temple. He organized the Department of Church and Labor in the Presbyterian church, U. S. A., the first bureau of its kind in any denomination the world over. His department with other departments was criticized as a piece of extravagance by some of the more conservative element of his church. There may be nothing in the way of connection, however, between this criticism last May and his resignation as superintendent of the Presbyterian Home Board's Bureau of Social Service, which resignation Mr. Stelzle announced on June 27 from his New York office. Associates attempted to get him to withdraw his resignation, but Mr. Stelzle stood pat on that document. He refused to reconsider his action.

Mr. Stelzle had been closely watched by many Presbyterians, who thought that his labors had carried him to certain extremes, like socialism and labor unionism. There was some talk at one time of having him "up" for these extremes before some church tribunal. In announcing his resignation, Mr. Stelzle stated that he expected to become consulting sociologist for undenominational church organizations, industrial enterprises and social service agencies. Mr. Stelzle for one year was executive secretary of the Federal Council's social service commission. Other work done by him was that of director of the social service features of the Men and Religion campaign and director of the publicity campaign for the home missions council during last year. We wish Mr. Stelzle well in his newly announced ambitions, which should make him useful on a much larger scale now than ever before.

Christian Science Heretic Defiant

Mrs. Augusta E. Stetson is the arch-heretic of Christian Science. Likewise, she is something of a thorn in the flesh of the powers that be in Boston. Once upon a time she was so beloved by "Mother" Eddy that the latter gave her expensive jewelry as a slight token of her affection. Evidently, Mrs. Stetson figured on some kind of apostolic succession, and that she would not be overlooked, when Mrs. Eddy would pass out of sight. But Mrs. Stetson was laboring under a "real" delusion. In short, this lady heretic was excommunicated—but not silenced. For many moons we had lost track of this estimable lady in New York City. We had heard nothing from her or of her. We now understand why. She secluded herself to pour all her troubles into a 1,200 page book entitled "Reminiscences, Sermons and Correspondence." It is a regular Eddy-otic title, and no doubt Christian Scientists will accept it to some extent. But we predict that Mrs. Stetson's copyright will not prove as valuable as Mrs. Eddy's. In this book, Mrs. Stetson is a defiant heretic. She comes back at the church bosses of Boston. She maintains that she is the only authorized interpreter of the Eddy-otic teachings, and that the Boston people should not consider themselves the hub of the church. It appears to be a clothes-line scrap between a woman and an official church organization. Watch for publication committee activities from now on. This Stetson effort will certainly add to the gayety of nations. Further deponent saith not.

Protestant Episcopal Exclusiveness Again

Can it be possible that the Protestant Episcopal church is two-faced? We are familiar with one face. With that face, much of its representative leadership goes into ecstasy over church unity and boasts that the parent Church of England has issued a call to all the Christian world to confer together on faith and order with the end in view of the reunion of all Christendom. That face, again, is the familiar face we see behind the Protestant Episcopal Church Commission on unity which conferred recently with our own brethren in New York City. But there is another face to that church. It is the face of exclusiveness, the face that says "No, we cannot participate with you in any common enterprise."

On June 12, the central committee of the United Missionary Campaign met in the Methodist Book Concern for further conference about the big missionary campaign next fall. This campaign will be nation-wide. About 2,500 missionary conferences will be held, to be followed in March by a simultaneous every-member canvass of practically every evangelical body in the United States. Now, it will be recalled that Bishop A. S. Lloyd, president of the Protestant Episcopal foreign mission board, was elected chairman of the central committee. Well, on June 12, Bishop Lloyd pained the central committee by sending it word that the Protestant Episcopal church did not see its way clear to participate, and therefore, he felt obliged to offer his resignation as chairman. Said resignation was accepted, and Doctor Arthur J. Brown, secretary of the Presbyterian foreign board, was elected in Bishop Lloyd's place. Which face of the Protestant Episcopal church do you see in this incident? Is this the face of union, or the face of exclusiveness?

The Westminster Confession in 1913

The Westminster Confession of Faith is not a best-seller. You need not take our word for it, but read what The Continent (Presbyterian (Chicago) of June 26, says about it:

There are probably few Presbyterian pastors who have not had experience with the difficulty of persuading laymen suitable for the eldership to affirm their acceptance of the Westminster Confession, as required in the ordaining ceremony of the church. Many men who ought to be in the eldership will not accept election because they have never read the confession, and don't feel that they have time or patience to read it now. So they decline ordination and miss the opportunities of service which the eldership would bring to them. But pastors should not let valuable workers escape so easily. A perfectly legitimate way out of the difficulty is that which Rev. R. W. Anthony of Cleveland uses, and doubtless many other pastors with him. Mr. Anthony asks prospective elders to read the Brief Statement, and if they can accept that he tells them that they are perfectly safe in affirming the "system of doctrine" in the confession. Indorsed by the General Assembly as a fair epitome of that "system of doctrine," the Brief Statement is certainly an honest short cut through the territory the confession covers.

Preaching at 94.

We respectfully commend Sir William Osler, regius professor of medicine in the University of Oxford, to Rev. David Tully, D. D., "the grand old man" of Chester Presbytery, and pastor emeritus of the Presbyterian church at Media, Pa. Doctor Tully is the oldest living graduate of Princeton Theological Seminary. He is 94 years old, and preaches every Lord's Day of his venerable life at Highland Park, Pa., to a mission church, which he is nurturing. Every Monday morning Doctor Tully attends the ministers' meeting in Philadelpha, and if Dr. Osler thinks that is nothing, we invite him to attend such a meeting and see for himself. On June 8, according to The Continent (Presbyterian, Chicago), Doctor Tully preached the sermon at the dedication of Tully Memorial Church, Sharon Hill, Pa., which he was instrumental in organizing and nurturing to self-support, when he retired.

Social Service News Item

Work on the summer cottage which Mrs. Julius Rosenwald has given to the Hull House outdoor colony at Waukegan is going forward rapidly, and it is expected that the building will be ready for occupancy soon. The cottage, which will cost $20,000, will be an important addition to the north shore plant of the association, and will mean that more tired mothers and delicate children can be accompanied than ever before. It will contain ample living rooms, a sanitary kitchen, outdoor sleeping rooms, a nursery and other accommodations. It is planned to keep the cottage open all winter for the benefit of working girls who need a rest and children who need country air.

Oldest Newspaper in Receiver's Hand

The Standard (Baptist, Chicago) of July 5, on its editorial page prints quite an editorial anent The Watchman, the oldest Baptist paper in the United States. The Watchman Company has gone into the hands of a receiver. Its subscription list has gone below 10,000, though in prosperous New England, with a constituency of 160,000 Baptists. The receivership leaves New England without any local organ. The Standard of Chicago, editorially takes occasion to say that the religious paper must be endowed in addition to the private capital already invested.

Auto Evangelism

The summer evangelistic committee of the Presbytery of Philadelphia will use three automobiles in Philadelphia, to be at three points in the city in an endeavor to reach the masses with the gospel. Doctor W. P. Fulton will act as superintendent of the big undertaking. Here is a splendid suggestion to our own evangelists. Storm the cities with auto evangelism!

From Near and Far

With nearly thirteen thousand delegates attending from all parts of the Christian world, the twenty-sixth international Christian Endeavor convention opened in Los Angeles July 9. The multitude attending the gathering was seated in a gigantic canvas auditorium, amid semi-tropic scenes. Palm tree vistas served for aisles, vines concealed the supporting pillars, and the top of the auditorium was as gay as a big circus tent with the flags of the many nations represented by the delegates. Francis E. Clark, of Boston, Mass., the president of the organization who because of his initials is known as "Father Endeavor," presided and Professor Percy S. Foster, of Washington, D. C., conducted the musical numbers of the program. A chorus of 900 voices, accompanied by an orchestra of 60 pieces, joined in an opening service of praise. Greetings were presented to the convention from President Woodrow Wilson, Secretary of State Bryan and others. President Wilson's message read: "It would be a great pleasure to me if I could attend the convention. Will you not convey to those assembled my warmest greetings and my most sincere wishes for the happy success of their work?" Secretary Bryan's letter said in part: "As you know I feel deeply interested in the Christian Endeavor movement, and appreciate its extended growth and great usefulness. It is one of our largest instrumentalities for Christian service and I feel sure its future labors will surpass its present activities." Dr. Clark was re-elected president of the Christian Endeavor Society. Other officers re-elected were: Secretary, William Shaw; treasurer, H. M. Lathrop, Boston; auditor, J. J. Arakelyan, Boston; editorial secretary, Professor A. R. Wells, Boston; publication manager, A. J. Sharele, Boston; interstate secretary, Karl Lehmann, Denver; superintendent builders' union, Rev. R. T. Anderson, Denver; national superintendent of temperance and national citizenship, Rev. Daniel A. Poling, Columbus, Ohio.

Mr. Dan Crawford is held in England to be the successor to Livingstone. He is coming to this country to deliver a series of lectures on his discoveries in Africa. When a young man of twenty Mr. Crawford was threatened with lung trouble and was ordered to Africa. It was in 1889 that he first saw the coast of Africa slipping past under the port rails of a big steamer as she rolled to the long combers of the Atlantic. He landed believing that he had come for a brief sojourn. As a matter of fact he was not to return for twenty years. His first expedition was two hundred miles inland. After it, what he terms the "boring in" to the interior commenced. Thirty-two months after leaving Great Britain he reached the savage town of Benguella, a thousand miles from the coast. Here he lived with the great King Mushidi. He helped to establish the mission station at Luanza, built on a cliff overhanging the Great White Lake. Here, with unfailing success he preached the gospel to the uttermost parts of Africa, drawing the natives to him from far distant places.

The University of Pennsylvania has just discovered that it owns what is believed to be the first picture of the plow invented by Abraham centuries ago. The plow is a combination seeder and planter and, according to the inscription on the picture, three men were necessary to operate it. Abraham devised this implement so that the people need no longer fear the ravens. The apparatus had a tube which poured seeds to the ground. Then there was a vessel above used as a receptacle for the seed, while an ordinary harrow was attached to the back of the plow. The Babylonians sowed and tilled according to Abraham's commands and with his invention they feared neither the ravens nor any other birds.

Full suffrage in Minnesota is not far off, according to Governor A. O. Eberhart. He says he will sign any bill passed by the legislature. "I am for suffrage," he asserts, "full and equal suffrage. I believe that through the vote of women we can arrive at that high plane in politics for which we are striving. Minnesota's suffragists lost their battle by two votes, but the fight is not over. The victory in Illinois will have a good influence on suffrage throughout the country. I want my state to be a leader in this progressive movement. I use the word progressive in its broader sense, as it has been in other progressive measures."

The rout of the fire bug, in New York, which Fire Commissioner Joseph Johnson believes he has effected in his campaign against the "arson trust," will save New York City $4,500,000 this year, according to an estimate based upon a remarkable decrease in fire losses for the first six months. The losses up to July 1 aggregated $3,580,315, as against $5,819,001 for the corresponding period in 1912—a decrease of $2,238,686. In one of the so-called fire-bug districts, where in previous years there had been as many as fifty fires a month, the average has been reduced to seventeen.

The circulation for the British and Foreign Bible Society for the last year reaches the astonishing figures of 7,899,000 volumes of the Bible. The Bible Society of Scotland for the last year of record, from the report just at hand, has a circulation of 2,359,985 volumes. If these figures are added to the issues of the American Bible Society, which have already been published as 4,049,610 volumes, a superb total of 14,308,595 volumes represents the missionary circulation of the Scriptures on the part of the English-speaking people all over the world.

The question of whether or not a woman can be excluded from a saloon, now that she is a voter, was brought to the attention of the trustees of Peoria Heights, Ill., when a motion was made to bar minors and women from saloons and to force dramshop-keepers to close their places at midnight, as the law provides. One of the trustees said now that women have the right of suffrage they have the same right to enter a saloon that is given to men.

General plans for the descent of woman suffragists on the Capitol have been agreed upon. Officers of the National Woman Suffrage Association determined that the "attack" on the national legislature would be marked by a monster automobile parade. Suffragists from many states have advised the committee of their intention to take part. The women will gather at Hyattsville, Md., on the morning of July 30.

Washington's exclusive clubs soon will be as dry on Sundays as the Sahara Desert. Mint juleps and other alcoholic concoctions will be absent from the tables of statesmen and army and navy officers. After this month the new Jones-Works liquor law, which applies only to the District of Columbia, will be in effect. Under the act it will be unlawful to sell or give away liquor on Sundays.

The next biennial Convention of the Anti-Saloon League of America is to be held at Columbus, Ohio, November 10 to 13 inclusive. It will also be the twentieth anniversary of the founding of the League. Twenty thousand delegates are expected. It is believed that this Convention will formally launch the campaign of the Anti-Saloon League for nation-wide prohibition.

The pace-that-kills ritual of modern life has given the nation hair-edge nerves and set it on a line that takes but a snap to result in insanity, declared Dr. Mary Elizabeth Hanks of Chicago in a paper before the national convention of homeopathic physicians held at Denver. Eugenics is her suggestion for the ultimate elimination of insanity and other diseases.

Four hundred thousand babies die annually from improper diet and improper methods of feeding, according to Dr. Joseph P. Cobb, a faculty member of the Hahnemann Medical College of Chicago, who read a paper on "Errors in Modern Infant Feeding," before the national gathering of the American Institute of Homeopathy recently held at Denver.

Chicago's new $380,000 isolation hospital is to be the finest of its kind in the world, according to Dr. George B. Young, health commissioner. Every patient in the hospital will have a room of his own, built of glass, through which he can see and talk with visitors, a telephone at his elbow and every other modern convenience.

Thirty-one vacation schools for the primary grades have been opened in Chicago. The attendance was estimated at about 14,000. The term is six weeks, and the course will be for the most part branches of manual training, such as sewing, cooking, physical education, games, singing, housekeeping, art and nature.

A city-wide campaign for the enforcement of the Sunday closing law and the city ordinances bearing on the vice situation has been outlined by the Woman's Party of Cook County, Ill. The plan will be a part of the largest political programme yet outlined by any woman's political organization in Chicago.

Further recognition for the new woman voters of Illinois came recently when a full-fledged woman's department was created in the office of the election commissioners. Nine women were named by Judge Owens of Chicago to "man" the new department.

There is a movement in progress in England which is a gracious expression of good will to America. It is the proposal to purchase the Sulgrave Manor, the home of ancestors of George Washington and make of it a national memorial.

The refusal of express companies to accept shipments of liquor consigned to individuals in "dry" territory has forced the question of the constitutionality of the Webb law before the Federal courts.

A Sermon on Beauty

(IN PART)

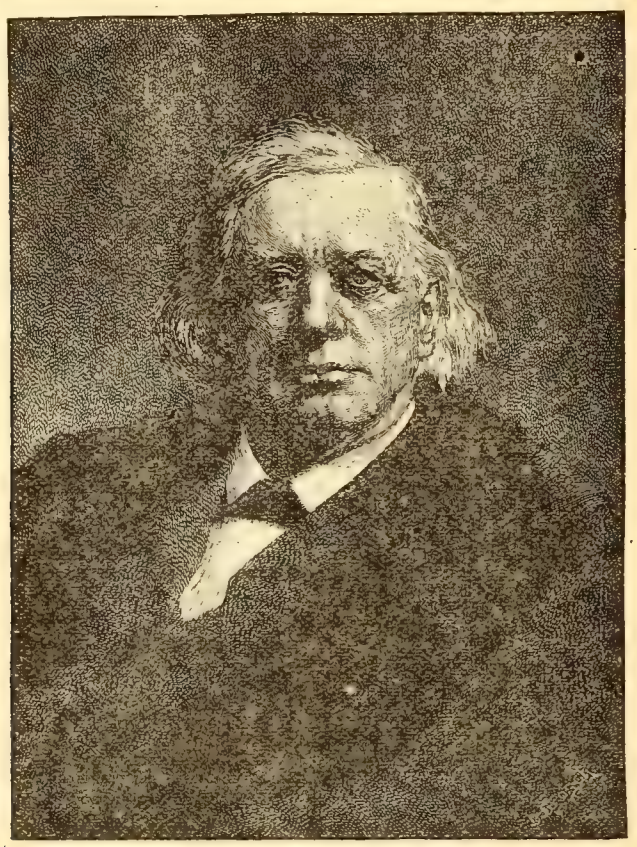
"For how great is his goodness, and how great is his beauty!' —Zech. IX. 17.

By Henry Ward Beecher

The prophet is speaking of the Lord, and has been showing his wisdom; his overruling providence; his special kindness of deliverance toward the people. And in the last verse of the chapter he breaks out, "How great is his goodness, and how great is his beauty!"

One by one the various traits of divine excellence came before the mind of the prophet; and at last he, as it were, generalized them; and the whole vision struck him as a vision of extreme beauty.

Is beauty, then, a reality in the higher spiritual life? Is there, in the inward, invisible and truly spiritual life, that which answers to our idea of sensuous beauty? Or is it figurative? Is it one of those childish things which the apostle says is put away when one grows up? No. I hold that beauty is first spiritual, and afterwards natural and material. I hold that it was divine; that it inhered in the nature of God, and the nature of spiritual existence; and that we call the outward and physical world beautiful, borrowing the term from the higher sources of beauty, instead of, as men are accustomed to think, calling spiritual things beauteous, and borrowing



Henry Ward Beecher.

the term from sensuous pleasure. "That was not first which was natural," says the apostle, "but that which was spiritual." That is not highest which is material, but that which is invisible. And there is more and more real beauty, and less and less figurative and decorative beauty, as one advances toward the spiritual life.

Let us examine the relation of beauty to moral qualities.

As God has created the world, beauty is not a kind of seasoning scattered upon the weightier realities. Men think that the beauty of this natural world is a kind of decoration. As one builds a house, and then puts pictures in it, which are not really necessary to the well-being of the house; as one spreads a table, and over and above that heartiness of food which is needed to supply the body with strength, gives something for the eye, sugaring over the loaf, and tucking in flowers here and there—things that are very well, but things that are not food, and might be dispensed with; so men think that there is beauty, to be sure, in the world, but that it is incidental in the great framework of things. The substantial verities of things in this world, men think, have nothing to do with beauty. But I aver that beauty is not only a part of the course of nature, so that if it were excluded the whole structure would be changed and reformed to a new ideal; that it is not merely a frosting; but that all things in the great scheme of evolution and development tend towards their highest estate by tending towards beauty. Ripeness and beauty are identical. Perfectness and beauty are identical. Maturity, whether it be of fruit, or flower, or what not, works by stages towards beauty, in the material globe.

So that beauty is not an accident. Still less is it the trimming which God gave to the perfected work. It is the divine idea of a mode of creation. It inheres in the structure and in the subtle nature of things. God re-made the world that when organic life began to work towards higher and higher forms, it evinced that higher tendency by the evolution of beauty. It is a kind of goal toward which all right things are tending. It is in nature a kind of signal of attainment. So that it might almost be said, taking it on the great circle, and as a generic fact, that just so far as things are material they are remote from developed perfection.

Growth of the Sense of Beauty.

As the human mind is cultivated, it becomes more and more sensitive to this quality. The less culture men have, the further they are from the admiration of beauty; that is to say, the less comprehensive is their admiration. The uttermost savage admires a glittering bead; but that is not admiring beauty. As men grow cultivated, every single faculty demands beauty. The reason, the social affections, the moral sense, the whole nature, comes more and more under the esthetic; and even the ethic clothes itself in the esthetic. So that when the human mind develops and grows toward its perfection, it grows toward the sense of beauty.

As beauty is the highest thing in nature, as all things have been seen to be developed in the direction of beauty, and as the chief, the sovereign fact in this world is man, so man himself indicates still more signally what is the law and thought of God in the creation of the world, and of the beings for whom the world was created.

Perfection in matter and ripeness of mind, then, are indicated by the tendency to develop, or the actual development and perfection, of the element of beauty.

It would seem enough to say to men, "Be kind, be generous, be benevolent;" but no. Let love be without dissimulation. God loves a cheerful giver. Give without grudging one to another. These are the elements that go to make beneficence; that free it from wrinkles; that give it largeness and generosity.

Men think of humility as being a stoled and draped nun, clothed in black, and downward looking. No; the humility of the Bible is not the exaggerated sense of a man's wretched imperfection. No man is humble who is looking down. Humility is the sense of such ineffable excellence that when a man's aspiration looks up, and he compares what he is with what he would be, he is humble. It is a state of appreciation in a man of excellence, and an ideal of an excellence beyond, sitting in judgment on his relative position, that makes humility. Humility is a head-up quality—not a dragging, miserable, mean feeling. Many men have mortified-pride, and call that humility. Many men have the blues, and call them humility. Many men palm off all the wretched and reactionary feelings of their nature, and call them humility. Humility is one of the noblest and one of the most resplendent of all the experiences of the soul. When every part of a man's nature is sensitive and apprehensive, and when the sense of character and of being is so radiant and large that the man feels his own relative imperfection, compared with that which he now perceives to be possible—then it is that humility is born, and is the child of aspiration.

So of conscience. Conscience is to be draped and clothed in gentleness and tenderness. And so of all the moral excellences. You will find, in one place or another, in the New Testament, not simply that they are commanded, but that they are commanded in certain modes; that they are to be exercised in certain ways; that on the one side the evils to which they are liable are cautioned against, and on the other, innocent, admirable qualities, which make them beautiful, are enjoined. You will find in the New Testament commands in respect to loving, and truthfulness, and generosity, and activity, and various other excellent qualities; and you will find that they are all enjoined in their modes as well as in themselves. And in the instruction of the disciple, there is as much anxiety manifested that he should be beautiful in holiness, as that he should be holy.

Beauty of Character.

There is nothing so beautiful in this world as beauty of character. Oh! how men long for it! I do not wonder that men have worshipped Gods that they made out of men. Man is a worshipping creature, and if he cannot get anything better, he will make his own God. A God he will have, and a God he will worship. Men hunger, they long, for some Being that they can reverence and adore. The artist does not more long for beautiful features or faces or forms, than every moral nature longs to see characters that are so well, so strongly, so harmoniously, so finely and fully developed, that they impress those who behold them with the idea of admirableness, and make them feel that it is pleasant to sit and look at them, and to be where they are.

Ah! the visions that have gone from men! The most beautiful things are the things which you remember, and that were fugitive. Many of you remember the day when you thought God had sent a ministering angel to wait upon you all your life. That ministering angel became your companion; and you were imperfect, and she was imperfect; and you went on battle-door and shuttle-cock fashion; and by and by you settled down into a kind of humdrum life of toleration one for the other. And you would laugh at what you called sentiment and sentimentality, saying to the young, blasphemously, "Take it all out now. I know what that means. I was once in your place." And yet there come hours in which such an one remembers how the most beautiful thing he ever saw in this world was the fair virgin face of the loved one, in that moment when the full assurance of love dawned on her soul. And she remembers his face. And there was not in all their life another point of time in which they looked reality so absolutely in the face.

Men say that that was sentiment. Men say that that was fancy. I say that it was the very alphabet of everlasting truth. I say that it was one moment's gleam through the opaque and sin-contorted world, so that these persons saw how beautiful the soul was in its best feelings, in their best moods, when they were radiant. That was seeing the soul itself. Ah! that the curtain should have fallen so soon! Ah! that the literature should have been so little! Not only do men know that these things are beautiful, but if they grow in this knowledge, if they go on learning, the longer they live the longer and the more perfect becomes, not simply their appreciation of beauty, but their conviction that of all beautiful things there is nothing in this world like a beautiful soul and like the beautiful experiences which proceed from it. Moral quality, then, is beautiful.

The Significance of Suffrage

By Catherine Waugh McCulloch

The awful thirty years' war in Germany for religious liberty was a brief affair compared to the fifty-eight years of peaceful warfare in Illinois for woman's political liberty. In 1855, in Earlville, was organized the first suffrage association here of which we have any record.

Before that time and afterward many great eastern leaders like Susan B. Anthony, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, William Dudley Foulke, Henry B. Blackwell, Lucy Stone and Anna Dickerson lectured throughout the state. It also is true that even before 1830 Abraham Lincoln declared himself for woman suffrage in these words: "I go for all sharing in the privileges of government who assist in bearing its burdens, by no means excluding women."

First in 1855..

Other great men and women personally believed in suffrage, so there were scattered organizations in various places in Illinois following the first one in 1855, until in 1869 these scattered organizations formed the Illinois Equal Suffrage association, with Mary A. Livermore, later of Boston, its first president. Through these years and up to 1891 a constant effort was made to obtain complete woman's suffrage through constitutional amendment without asking any fragment of suffrage by bill.

At the time Thomas C. MacMillan championed in the senate a school suffrage bill which many feared might be declared unconstitutional. He pushed this through the senate, and Dr. H. M. Moore, a member of the third party, secured its passage in the house. Several supreme court decisions relating to the various fragments of school suffrage finally established his proposition: That while the legislature has no power to extend suffrage rights to women for officers mentioned in the constitution, it did not have power to extend suffrage to women for offices not mentioned in the constitution, whose positions had been created by the legislature.

Wanted Township Suffrage.

So in the succeeding session in 1893 in addition to our regular appeal for a consitutional amendment for full enfranchisement we presented a bill asking for township suffrage, about the smallest thing, and the next step forward. R. W. Coon, of Waukegan passed it through the senate and we had hopes of carrying it through the lower house, but the dilatory tactics began then which followed for twenty years and we were unable to get a vote on that measure in the house.

From then we have had a variety of suffrage bills introduced, as well as the constitutional amendments. This large suffrage bill which has now passed was first introduced about 1895 or 1897.

At special sessions of the legislature we would have bills adapted to come in under the provisions of the governor's call. At one special session in 1898 concerning taxation, George H. Munroe, of Joliet, introduced a bill to exempt women's property from taxation until they had the right of suffrage. This made fine propaganda for the newspapers. At a recent special session concerning primary elections and commission form of government we asked that women might vote at all primary elections and at every election relating to commission form of government.

Some said this was absurd, to give us a vote at primaries, when we did not have a vote at the regular elections. We readily pointed out to them that this absurdity could easily be removed by full enfranchisement.

Other senators who represented measures and nearly brought them to success were D. A. Campbell, O. T. Berry, E. C. Curtis, John C. McKenzie, Charles Billings, James Gibson, William M. Brown and H. M. Dunlap. Senator Billings had twenty-five votes, lacking only one in 1909 for this bill which has now succeeded, and Senator Brown last session carried a similar bill through the senate, with, however, a referendum clause attached, which was not desired by the suffragists.

Lost by One.

The splendid struggle for municipal suffrage for women in the Chicago charter, when delegates from women's organizations aggregating a membership of 100,000 asked this measure of justice, was only defeated at first by one majority, and this charter, without woman suffrage, did not receive the assistance of women and so was defeated by the Chicago voters at the polls.

Mrs. Ellen M. Henrotin, Miss Jane Addams and Mrs. Ella Stewart were the suffrage leaders in this effort and in one which followed in 1909, when the suffrage proposition received a majority in charter convention, but went to defeat in the legislature. The woman's suffrage part of the recommended charter provisions received more votes than any other portion. Our efforts in 1912 at the Chicago primaries and our canvass for petitions last summer brought us many friends, though not quite enough.

Illinois has been blessed with noble, talented and cultivated women for its state suffrage presidents. The one who was longest president was Mrs. Mary E. Holmes, who held office for five years beginning in 1884 and then for seven years, from 1890 to 1897. Other presidents were Mrs. Elizabeth Boynton Harbert, who was first elected in 1876 and altogether held office for ten years; Julia Mills Dunne of Moline, who was president about three years; Elizabeth F. Long of Barry, Rev. Kate Hughes of Table Grove, Dr. Marion K. Bowles of Joliet, Mrs. C. W. McCulloch and Mrs. Elvira Downey of Clinton, who held office for one year each.

During Mrs. Holmes' presidency up to 1897, the state association was in a flourishing condition and had many auxiliaries. During the years of many succeeding presidencies the woman's club movement sprang up, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union took the interest of many women, so that many suffrage associations languished and died.

Mrs. Stewart Elected.

Then in 1906 the youngest state president of all, Mrs. Ella S. Stewart, was elected. For six years, without salary and with a harmonious though not wealthy board, she brought the state work up from a discouraged, forlorn condition to one of importance and prominence. She raised the money for state headquarters. She obtained a $9-a-week stenographer, she and Dr. Anna E. Blount put in $100 worth of books and leaflets to start the literature work, which last year printed for Illinois readers over 1,000,000 leaflets.

It was Mrs. Stewart who encouraged the summer suffrage auto tours, beginning with the 1910. She loaned her family auto for a month of work. She probably prides herself most of all having discovered Miss Harriet Grimm, a talented orator, at the University of Chicago, who has since been in constant demand in Illinois and campaign states as a suffrage organizer and orator. Miss Grimm was said by Wisconsin's old pioneer worker, Rev. Olympia Brown, to be the best vote getter in the state. She was an excellent lobbyist at Springfield in 1909 and 1911.

For many years these state presidents and workers from all over Illinois have gone to the capital biennially urging the enfranchisement of women. At one session Frances E. Willard and our constant allies, the W. C. T. U., took up a petition with 180,000 names. Members of this organization, of the Federated Clubs and of the Woman's Relief Corps have been loyal to suffrage. While the names of all the workers during the last sixty-eight years never have been in print, nor will appear in this article, the foundation work done by them was what led to this splendid culmination.

Did As Usual.

This session we began our work much as usual. Mrs. Elizabeth M. Booth, the new legislative superintendent of the Illinois Equal Suffrage association, and I went to Springfield in February to select the men to introduce our bill. Senator Hugh S. Magill, a Republican from Princeton, and Representative Charles T. Scott of Graysville, championed this same bill which had met so many vicissitudes in past years. Mrs. Booth and I were greatly encouraged by our interviews in the senate and decided then we had enough senatorial votes to carry our measure.

There were so many new men in the house that we were not sure in our first week of work how the line-up might be, though we were cheered by discovering many splendid men in the places of some old opponents and the return of many faithful friends.

Since then Mrs. Booth, Mrs. Trout, the new state president; Mrs. Antoinette Funk and Mrs. Medill McCormick have been frequently in Springfield urging the progress of the bill and have received much commendation from the legislators for their kindly, courteous and persistent efforts. One senator said at the banquet he must lay this tribute at the feet of the women suffragists, "Oh, persistency, thou art a jewel." Others will speak more about this year's work. I am asked to tell of the past and the future.

There will be no time now to drop tears of sorrow on the graves of the many suffrage workers who have done the seed sowing and very little time to give any more flowers and compliments and thanks to those of us who are living to enjoy the fruits of our predecessors' work, for we shall be busy preparing ourselves for our new duties.

To Study.

Courses in civics and political economy are now uppermost in the minds of the women. Mrs. Florence Bennett Peterson, secretary of the Illinois Equal Suffrage association, has prepared a course of study for the new voters, which can be obtained at suffrage headquarters. She names the books which are best adapted for various lines of civic study. Of course, for a few weeks we will be full of rejoicing. Great celebrations of our almost complete enfranchisement will take place throughout Illinois, and on July 4 the women of Illinois in picnic and public gathering will thank the men of this state for this measure of justice meted out to them. They will listen to the Declaration of Independence, feeling that its splendid words are becoming true. And the men of Illinois will urge a constitutional convention so that women as speedily as slow constitutional methods can prevail may be fully enfranchised.

If the house next week will pass the Curtis resolution for a constitutional convention, which the senate passed Thursday, there will be submitted to the men voters in November, 1914, the question as to whether we shall have a constitutional convention. If the vote is favorable the legislature of 1915 will provide for the election of members of this constitutional convention, probably in November, 1916. In January, 1917, such convention might meet, prepare the new constitution, with women suffrage for every election included, and select the time for the ratification of this constitution.

If this constitution should be submitted in November, 1917, and be approved by the men voters, women could achieve complete enfranchisement in 1918, the one hundredth anniversary of Illinois' admission into the Union.

Until that time, thanks to the legislature of 1913, women can vote for almost all city, township and drainage officials, for propositions and for presidential electors. The vote of the women recently enfranchised will bring the total of women voting for presidential electors to about 3,000,000. Political parties, please take notice.

The United Missionary Campaign

A Nation Wide Interdenominational Movement

By S. J. Corey

No more notable event has occurred in missionary history than the launching of this great united movement. On March 19, the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of David Livingstone, the leaders of the Home and Foreign Missionary Boards of America met in New York City and decided to unite in a nation-wide campaign, beginning in September of this year and continuing through March, 1914. Five months of this campaign is to be educational, and the closing month of March next spring is to be used for an every-member canvass for missions and benevolences, as far as possible in every Protestant congregation in America.

S. J. Corey.

This campaign is to be different from any heretofore projected, in that it is to be outlined and carried through by the united leadership of the missionary boards of America. Each board will do its share with its own constituency while at the same time engaging in the united movement and receiving power from the impetus of the great national campaign. The movement will be under the direction of the missionary societies, rather than under the direction of interdenominational movements. The conferences and convention features of the campaign will be under the direction of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, and the literature and educational features under the leadership of the Missionary Educational Movement.

The objective of this great campaign is, as will be readily seen, the every-member canvass in the churches next March for all missions. It would be hard to measure the importance of such a canvass. In the first place, the various religious bodies will be so stimulated that it will not be difficult for each to link up its local churches to the whole movement. In the second place, the general campaign throughout the country among the various religious bodies will greatly stimulate the churches and prepare the way for a united canvass in each city or town. It is calculated that five hundred conventions and conferences will be held throughout the land in the five months preceding the every-member canvass. In the third place, it means a united campaign for home and foreign missions in every religious body in America.

In this campaign the missionary leaders of America will have the advantage of a united educational impact and co-operation in bringing the great task of world evangelization to the churches. There are many advantages in this wide co-operation, some of which are the following: Greater tested efficiency in plans; economy of funds and forces; the power of united testimony; co-operation without the slightest compromise of conviction; the united conviction that the churches must meet adequately the astounding religious need of America and the world.

The educational campaign will be conducted by about twenty teams of trained men who will hold a series of conferences and conventions all over the land. Many of these men will be especially trained by attendance at the conference held at Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, the last of July. Already the following men from our own fellowship have been chosen to help in the leadership of this great campaign: Grant K. Lewis, George W. Muckley, John E. Booth and Stephen J. Corey. Other workers and missionaries will also be chosen to aid in the work. There will be four men, representing different communions on each team.

Each religious body will conduct its own campaign for the every member canvass next March.

For the Disciples of Christ we believe this united campaign offers an unprecedented opportunity. It is our profound conviction that we should enter into it heartily with all the strength at our command. It does not mean spending money and time in a movement not entirely our own. It does mean taking our share of burden and blessing for our churches in a great campaign which belongs to no movement in particular, but to all the religious forces of America. Here is one of the greatest movements for union Christian effort ever launched, and one of its by-products for us will be the unification and correlation of our own missionary work.

Famous Men on Missions

Charles Darwin, Naturalist.

The slanderers forget—or rather they do not want to think of it—that human sacrifices, the power of an idolatrous priesthood, a voluptuousness that has not its equal in the whole world, child murder and so forth—that all of this has been removed and abolished and that dishonesty, intemperance, and imprudence have decreased to a great extent by the introduction of Christianity. It is the lowest kind of ingratitude that the reports of travels forget this. If it should happen to them that they would suffer shipwreck in one of these islands, they would send an earnest prayer to heaven that the teachings of the missionaries should have penetrated to the inhabitants.

Governor Young of India.

I say, "Hats off" for the simplest missionary. His work is more effective than that of any other class of people that work in India. If the Hindus have any idea of Christian love; if they know anything of high, lofty, unselfish motives, and self-sacrifice, it is mainly due to the missionaries from whom they learned it.

"The Fruit of the Spirit—Peace"

Dr. Charles E. Jefferson of the Broadway Tabernacle, upon his return from a recent visit to the leading countries of Europe, makes the following powerful arraignment of militarism:

"I have studied militarism now face to face in every country of Europe, and I came home this last time more convinced than ever that militarism is materialism in its deadliest incarnation, and that it is commercialism in its most voracious development, and that it is atheism in its most devastating form, that it is the most colossal of all extant humbugs, the most gigantic swindle since Tetzel sold indulgences. I am persuaded that the military hierarchy is the most treacherous and despotic enemy that lords it over the nations since the power of Rome was shattered, and that unless the Christian Church puts on the whole armor of God and goes out united to make war upon this Goliath that struts in armor plate and boasts of bayonets and lyddite shells, it renounces the mission to which it has been called, and surrenders its position as Christ's anointed leader and Saviour of mankind."

Along with this arraignment of militarism made by Dr. Jefferson comes the portentous fact that there are ninety vacancies in the incoming class of the United States military academy at West Point. Let us hope that this is an argument that the army no longer has its old-time attractiveness for ambitious young Americans, and that it is prophetic of that near-at-hand day when all nations shall "beat their swords into plowshares."—Epworth Herald.

Our Feminized Churches

A report of the recent Primitive Methodist Conference of England covering the Sunday-school work of seven years shows that in that time the number of male teachers in their schools had decreased 798, and at the same time the females have increased. It is interesting to note that during the same period there have disappeared over twenty thousand scholars. The causes assigned for this loss of membership are, lack of parental control, social upheaval and industrial unrest, the competition of Brotherhoods, inferior methods, a lack of brightness and attractiveness. These are all symptomatic of the times and we wonder how far this state of affairs is reflected elsewhere.

Recent American statistics show that out of a total of over thirty millions of members identified with all denominations, the women furnish over seventeen millions. The proportion is most uneven among the Christian Scientists, where the gentler sex represents 72.4 per cent of the whole. The feminine support of the Congregationalists is sixty-six per cent, while the Methodists, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians follow in line.—Exchange.

Getting Up Early

"I reckon," said the first farmer, "that I get up earlier than anybody in this neighborhood. I am always up before 3 o'clock in the morning."

The second farmer said he was always up before then and had part of the chores done. The first farmer thought he was a liar and decided to find out. A few mornings later he got up at 2 o'clock and went to the neighbor's house. He rapped on the back door and the woman of the house opened it.

"Where is your husband?" asked the farmer, expecting to find the neighbor in bed.

"He was around here early in the morning," answered the wife, "but I don't know where he is now."—Exchange.

Scouts Will Translate Manual

The Boy Scouts of America in Mexico City are planning to translate into Spanish the entire manual of the Boy Scouts of America. They have taken up the plan at the suggestion of William Wochatz, secretary of the local council. Every Scout, before he can obtain a merit badge for interpreting, will be required to translate a page or more of the handbook into Spanish. In that way the local council of the Boy Scouts of America in Mexico City hope soon to have a complete translation of the manual.

An Endless Marathon

A small negro boy was a regular attendant at a boys' reading club, and always called for the same book, and always turned to the same place, at which he looked eagerly, and then laughed heartily.

The attendant's curiosity was aroused by the performance, so he followed the little fellow one night, and, looking over his shoulder, saw that he opened the book at a picture of a bull chasing a terrified negro across a field. He was just about to ask what the joke was, for the laugh had again come rippling up to him, when the boy looked around grinning.

"He ain't kotched him yit!" he cried, slapping his knees.—The Continent.

Where Language Fails

Perhaps the most charming of all Joaquin Miller's works is his prose romance or autobiography, "Life Among the Modocs," a story of Indian life, in which the soul of the red man is more sympathetically figured than in any other book, suggests a contributor to The Humanitarian, London.

Take this passage:

"I said to the old chief one day: 'Your language is very poor; it has so few words.'

"'We have enough. It does not take many words to tell the truth,' he answered.

"'Ah, but we have a hundred words to your one.'

"'Well, you need them.' . . . The old Indian rose as he said this, and gathered his blanket about his shoulders. His dog lay with his nose on his two paws, and his eyes raised to his master's. 'You have not words enough in all your books to give a single look from the eyes of my dog.'"

It is the boast of Carleton College, Farmington, Mo., that every student attending the school this year is a member of some church.

Special classes in politics for women have been announced by Rev. R. A. White, pastor of the People's Liberal Church, Chicago.

St. George, one of Toronto's residential streets. Toronto, is one of the healthiest and most beautiful cities in North America. It is a great center, already having a population of 425,000 and growing rapidly. Toronto is an ideal convention city. Many large religious convocations are held there each year. Massey Hall is one of the most ideal auditoriums on the American continent. Its acoustics are perfect. It has numerous committee rooms and other accessories, and a massive pipe organ. The great convention meets in Toronto Sept. 30-Oct. 6.

HOW A FAMOUS POEM WAS WRITTEN.

Admirers of Sam Walter Foss's poem, "The House by the Side of the Road," are many. The story of his writing it is known to few. He was an enthusiastic traveler, and on one of his trips through England he came, at the top of a long hill, to a little unpainted house set almost in the road, so near it was. Near one side was a queerly constructed signpost finger, pointing to a well-worn path and a sign, "Come in and have a cool drink." Following the path, he found in the side of the bank some distance from the house a spring of ice cold water into which a barrel had been sunk, and above which hung an old-fashioned gourd dipper. And on a bench near by—a wonder —was a basket of fragrant apples, with another sign, "Help yourself."

Scenting a story, he went back to the house where he found a childless old couple in straightened circumstances, with the rocky farm as their only source of livelihood. But it was rich in the delicious spring water and an abundance of fruit, so the sign was placed guiding to the water, and from the time of the ripening of the first purple plum to the harvesting of the last red apple, a basket of whatever fruit might be in season was placed near, that everyone passing might rest upon the long hill and refresh himself.

The old gentleman explained that they were too poor to give money, so took this way to add their mite to the world's well-doing.

The beautiful thought and its real helpfulness so impressed Foss that he immortalized with his pen the spirit of the ideal home. We feel sure our readers will enjoy reading the poem the more that they know the circumstances of its writing.

"There are hermit souls that live withdrawn
In the peace of their self-content;
There are souls, like stars, that dwell apart
In a fellowless firmament.
There are pioneer souls that blaze their paths
Where the highways never ran—
But let me live by the side of the road
And be a friend to man."

SHOWING ELIHU ROOT HOW.

Elihu Root tells a story about himself and his efforts to correct the manners of his office boy. One morning the young autocrat came into the office, and, tossing his cap on a book, exclaimed:

"Say, Mr. Root, there's a ball game at the park today, and I want to go down."

Now the great lawyer was willing that the boy should go, but thought he would teach him a little lesson in good manners.

"James," he said, "that isn't the way to ask a favor. Now you sit down in my chair and I'll show you how to do it properly."

The boy took the office chair, and his employer picked up his cap and stepped outside. He then opened the door softly, and, holding the cap in his hand, said quietly to the small boy in the big chair:

"Please, sir, there is a ball game at the park today; if you can spare me, I would like to get away for the afternoon."

In a flash the boy replied:

"Why, certainly, Jimmie; and here is fifty cents to pay your way in."—Ladies' Home Journal.

SECRETARY LANE ON IMPROVING AN OPPORTUNITY.

They were talking about improving an opportunity the other afternoon when Secretary of the Interior Lane contributed to the conversation.

"Makes me think," he smilingly said, "of a youngster who lives in our town. One afternoon he was invited to a party, where, of course, refreshments were bountifully served.

"'Won't you have something more, Willie?' asked the pretty hostess, toward the close of the feast.

"'No, thank you,' replied Willie, with an expression of great satisfaction. 'I'm full.'

"'Well, then,' smiled the hostess, 'put some fruit and cakes in your pockets to eat on the way home.'

"'No, thank you,' came the rather startling response of Willie. 'They're full, too.'"—Epworth Herald.

A GOOD YARDSTICK.

Apropos of a statesman of whom many malicious things had been said, William Jennings Bryan quoted in Washington a Chinese proverb:

"Towers," said Mr. Bryan, "are measured, the Chinese tell us truly, by their shadows, and great men by the enemies they have made."—Daily Magazine.

HOW BEECHER AGONIZED FOR SUCCESS.

Mr. Beecher's great fame as an orator is a fit subject for study. He had so much to overcome. He says:

"I had from childhood a thickness of speech arising from a large palate, so that when a boy I used to be laughed at for talking as if I had pudding in my mouth. When I went to Amherst I was fortunate in passing into the hands of John Lovell, a teacher of elocution, and a better teacher for my purpose I can not conceive. His system consisted in drill, or the thorough practice of inflections by the voice, of gesture, posture and articulation. Sometimes I was a whole hour practicing my voice on a word—like 'justice.' . . . Now I never know what movements I shall make. My gestures are natural, because this drill made them natural to me. The only method of acquiring an effective education is by practice, of not less than an hour a day, until the student has his voice and himself thoroughly subdued and trained to right expression."—Congregationalist.

WASTED ENERGY.

Enrico Caruso, at a dinner preceding his departure for the Covent Garden season in London, said that, when he grew too old to sing, he would probably teach.

"Teaching the voice is a difficult task," he continued. "It is a fine thing to be a good teacher. Some pupils are so very stupid.

"You can no more hurry a voice than you can hurry a flower; but most pupils want to become star singers in a month or two.

"A lady said to one of my friends, a superb teacher:

"'I'm going abroad next month, and I want twenty-five lessons in voice culture before I sail.'

"'Impossible!' said the teacher.

"'Why impossible?' said the lady. 'I could take two lessons a day some days.'

"'Or, better still,' said my friend sarcastically, 'you could take the whole twenty-five lessons all at once one after the other. A day would do it, then.'

"'Splendid!' cried the lady. 'Shall we make it tomorrow?'"—Chicago Record-Herald.

THE DISCOURAGED POET.

Alfred Noyes, the British poet, though usually very successful in marketing his wares, suffered a slump on toward the end of his American visit, and naturally became low-spirited in consequence.

"Everything seems to be going wrong," he sighed one evening at the Franklin Inn in Philadelphia. "I'll have to change my luck somehow or other."

He laughed grimly and resumed:

"I asked the maid at my lodgings this morning what had become of the paper that I'd left lying on my desk.

"'Oh, sir,' said she, 'I thought it was waste paper, and I threw it in the waste-paper basket.'

"'No,' said I, 'it wasn't waste-paper. I hadn't written anything on it yet.'"—Daily Magazine.

W. F. McCOMBS TELLS STORY.

At a banquet recently William F. McCombs told of a conversation in a club in which several philanthropic personages were mentioned and lauded to the skies.

The conversation had gone to some length, Mr. McCombs said, when a man who was sitting in a corner arose with a merry smile flitting over his features and broke into the gabfest.

"Your philanthropists are all right," he remarked, "but I think it is only just that my next door neighbor should be included in the kindly disposed bunch."

"We are willing to add him to the list," responded one of the others, "but is he really so generously inclined?"

"Well, I should say that he is," was the emphatic declaration of the first. "Dozens of tramps hammer at his back door and I have never known him to send one away empty handed."

"You don't mean it?" returned the second a trifle incredulously.

"That's right," rejoined the first; "he always gives them a letter of introduction to me."—Chicago News.

PRESIDENT WILSON DISCUSSES CHURCH.

President Wilson is quoted as follows by Bishop Candler in the Raleigh Christian Advocate: "When we say that the way to get young people to the church is to make the church interesting, I am afraid that we too often mean that the way to do it is to make it entertaining. Did you ever know the theater to be a successful means of governing conduct? Did you ever know the most excellent concerts or series of concerts to be the means of revolutionizing a life? Did you ever know any amount of entertainment to go farther than hold for the hour that it lasted? If you mean to draw young people by entertainment with something that is not entertaining, but which grips the heart like the touch of the hand, I dare say there is some excuse for alluring persons to a place where good will be done them; but I think it would be a great deal better simply to let them understand that the church is a place where life is dispensed, and, if they want life, they must come to that place."—Exchange.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

Recent Victories for Woman Suffrage

Suffrage victories used to be few and far between—now, they are coming in groups of several at a time. Last November, Kansas, Oregon, and Arizona came into the fold together, and a short time after, Alaska gave her women full suffrage. Now, almost simultaneously, Illinois and Norway have enfranchised women, and the United States Senate Committee on Woman Suffrage has reported in favor of a nation-wide amendment, forbidding disfranchisement on account of sex.

Norway is an object lesson to states which have given their women limited suffrage, for it shows how partial suffrage is a stepping-stone to the full franchise. Norway began by giving the municipal vote to women who had or whose husbands had, an income of about one hundred dollars a year; then it gave parliamentary suffrage to the same women. Next, it made municipal suffrage universal, and now, without a dissenting vote, the Storthing has decided to make parliamentary suffrage for women universal too.

Significance of the Victory in Illinois.

But while we rejoice in every victory in any part of the world, we are especially jubilant over Illinois. It is the first state east of the Mississippi River to enfranchise women, and has thus put a quietus on the frequent statement, that woman suffrage was peculiar to the West and that the Father of Waters was a dead line which it could not cross.

It is also the first state to grant presidential suffrage to women by direct action of the legislature, instead of by the slower and more cumbrous method of constitutional amendment, and submission to a popular vote of the people. Illinois is the third state in the union, and contains the fourth largest city in the world. It has twenty-nine votes in the electoral college, more than any other state, except New York and Pennsylvania. And this action of the legislature not only gives women the right to vote for president of the United States, but for most municipal officers, as well.

It is fitting that the state of Abraham Lincoln, who championed the cause of woman suffrage in 1836, should be the first in the East to grant this right and honor to its daughters.

What Leading Illinois Women Think of the Victory.

How this news rejoices the hearts of the noble band of Illinois women, whose good works, apart from their views on suffrage, have made them famous throughout the land!

Frances E. Willard in 1879 secured a petition of 180,000 signatures for equal suffrage in Illinois. She did heroic work in the early years, while the cause was still unpopular. Though she has long since passed over to the other side, yet we have faith to believe that her true heart has been made glad, because her state has given the ballot to women.

Mrs. Catharine Waugh McCulloch, who has labored so long and unceasingly for the cause of women, says: "It is the biggest thing that has happened east of the Mississippi since the Civil War."

Jane Addams says: "The women should have votes. The problems of our time will be solved only when all of the best mind, conscience and talent in the community are brought to their solution."

Julia C. Lathrop says: "Woman suffrage is a natural and inevitable step in the march of society forward. Instead of being incompatible with child welfare, it leads toward it, and is indeed the next great service to be rendered for the welfare and ennoblement of the home."

Judge Mary Bartelme of the court for delinquent girls, when asked by a Chicago paper to comment on the suffrage victory, answered, "I have nothing to say but 'Hurrah!'"

Miss Sophonisba P. Breckinridge, the beloved assistant dean of women at the University of Chicago, says: "The ballot is a labor-saving device, like the biscuit machine which has been introduced to make the 'beaten biscuit' of Kentucky, instead of beating it in the old way by long pounding with a flat-iron. Reforms can be gained even without the ballot—we have secured some good laws in Illinois—but these things are done much more wastefully, with much more labor, while women are limited to indirect methods."

Mrs. Ella Flagg Young says: "It is the greatest thing Illinois has ever done. If you had been deprived of your civil rights ever since you were legal age, how would you feel when you were finally given them? Do you believe words could express your happiness?"

Mrs. Raymond Robins, president of the National Women's Trade Union League, says: "Every forward-looking woman is a suffragist. The ballot is a practical necessity to protect the working mothers of our country."

An Earnest of Greater Victories to Come.

Victor Hugo says there is one thing more powerful than kings or armies, and that is "The Idea whose time has come." Many things are working together to make this the time for the arrival of the great Idea, that the mothers of the race, and the makers of its homes have equal rights with men to a voice in the administration of the state and nation, which are but our larger homes.

The cumulative work of those whose citizenship is now in heaven, like Miss Willard, as well as the noble army of men and women who still remain with us, the victories already won—all have contributed to make this the fulness of time for the enfranchisement of women. And this gives us ground for good hope, that great as are the triumphs of suffrage today, they are but foretastes of more sweeping and splendid triumphs yet to come. I. W. H.

Ella Flagg Young on Suffrage

Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, superintendent of the Chicago schools, was one of the women to rejoice at the recent suffrage victory in Illinois. She said in an interview:

"I am not prepared to say just what effect the votes of women will have in our municipal affairs, but you may rest assured that the new body of voters will be on the side that is striving for improvement in social and civic affairs. I do not mean, either, that all the women voters will align themselves with a single party. In fact, the women are going to accomplish what you men have been trying for years. They are going to erase the partisan lines in our municipal government.

"I am not prepared to say just yet how I am going to cast my vote, and I suppose that is the situation with the majority of Illinois women. Their vote, however, will appear strong at the first opportunity. In my opinion it will be only a short time until the women will be voting in numbers that will have effect on elections. As many of the women, comparatively, will be voting as are men now.

"I am going to vote at my first opportunity, and I think that generally the women will be found ready to cast their first ballot in the first election open to them. And the women's votes are going to be found intelligent votes. The women are going to study political situations and men in public life, and when they vote it is going to be recognition of merit for the candidates so favored."

Former U. S. Senator Makes Bequest

The late U. S. Senator Thomas W. Palmer, who has recently passed away in Michigan, has left $5,000 to the National American Woman Suffrage Association. Senator Palmer was an earnest and able champion of votes for women when he was in Congress, and he never lost his interest in the cause. He was much respected and is sincerely mourned.

Senator Palmer left about $250,000 for various charitable and benevolent objects.

Mother-hunger

If I could only find her, for the mother-hunger's on me;
I want to see and touch her, to know her close beside;
I want to put my head in the hollow of her shoulder,
I want to feel her love me as she did before she died!

In all the world is nothing, love of husband or of children,
In all the world is nothing that can soothe me or can stir,
Like the memory of her fragile hand from which the ring was slipping—
The hand that wakes my longing at the very thought of her.

The window in the sunshine and the empty chair beside it,
The loneliness that mocks me as I find the sacred place—
O mother, is there naught in the unerring speech of silence
To let me know your presence, tho' I cannot see your face?

Thank God that I have had you; that we held each other closer,
As women and as sisters and as souls that claimed their own,
Than any tie of blood could bind! and now my heart is bleeding,
My heart is bleeding, mother, and yours is turned to stone.

O, no, I've not forgotten the triumph and the glory—
I would not bring you back again to struggle and to pain;
This hour will pass; but O, just now, the mother-hunger's on me—
And I would give my soul to-night to kiss your hair again!

Disciples Table Talk

Another New Church for Lincoln, Nebraska.

June 29 was a glad day in Lincoln, Neb. The occasion was the laying of the corner-stone of the new Church of Christ, East Lincoln. This is the sixth church begun or dedicated within the last six years in the capital city of Nebraska, all but one of them entirely new structures. The building will cost $30,000 when completed. It is situated in one of the most strategic portions of the city. Near it is located the state agricultural school, and the entire state university will likely be moved to this location within a few months, bringing four or five thousand students to this portion of the city and into close proximity to the church The auditorium will be as large as that of any building the Disciples have in Lincoln, except the one at Bethany. The entire basement floor, the only part to be finished at this time, will be arranged for modern Sunday-school work. The building has been needed for several years past but not a sufficient number in the church had the vision to make a start possible. Three years ago the official board through its committee, invited J. W. Hilton, who had served the church four years while a student at Cotner and the state university of Nebraska, to take up the work in his old field with the end in view of leading the church into an appreciation of its need of enlarged facilities for its service. For two years brother Hilton served the church in connection with his duties as professor of ethics and sociology in Cotner university. At the close of this period the work was taking on such a spirit of activity that it was no longer possible for the minister to serve the university as teacher and dean of the college of liberal arts, and continue with the church; and it was decided that the call of the church for all of the time of Prof. Hilton should be accepted for a time at least. At the dedication service H. O. Pritchard gave the main address upon the subject, "The True Foundation." H. H. Harmon gave greetings from the joint board of the churches of Christ in Lincoln and suburbs, and E. J. Sias, John Clark and W. H. Vanderzee, other city ministers, performed minor parts in the service.

J. S. Hughes Hears "Billy" Sunday.

We print an excerpt from a description of the work of "Billy" Sunday sent in by Jasper S. Hughes. It should be stated, in fairness to Mr. Hughes, that he believes such men as Sunday are not useless, but that they serve to win men to better lives whom more refined preachers cannot reach. "Every one has heard of him and thousands go to hear him every night because he speaks where the many thousands are. He has a fairly good voice and a toughness that corresponds to a well formed body and symmetrical head and face and has the type of a successful business man one who would succeed any where you might put him. The most outstanding of his doings is the complete concentration of all his forces to draw a crowd. His tabernacle, his music, his speech, his every act has for its first aim to get the crowd and he is a success at it as every one knows. But it takes something more than anticlerical antics and the use of some street phrases to hold and keep up a hearing. So Bro. Sunday has a fine stock of stories and illustrations and is clever in handling a climax. His preaching has the same old trend we have heard all our lives, spiced, however, in a way strictly his own and original enough for a free lance such as he is. I notice the pastors of Indianapolis after some debate decided to not engage him for a tabernacle series in that burg, some objecting on the ground of his unseemly catch words, but Billy, like the late Sam. Jones, knows the value of certain words among the commonest people to draw—words filled with more soul than scholarship. Without these there would have been no Sam Jones or "Billy" Sunday and we should have had instead—Rev. S. P. Jones of the village of Antioch and the Rev. Wm. Sunday of Greggs Crossing."

S. E. Fisher Rounds Out Ten Years.

July 7, the University Place Church, Champaign, Ill., celebrated the tenth anniversary of the entrance upon the pastorate there of Stephen E. Fisher. A fine record has been made during this period. Two buildings have been completed; 2,087 persons have been received into the membership of the church, the present membership being now about 1,000. When Mr. Fisher began work, 125 members constituted the congregation. Almost $90,000 has been raised by the church for all purposes. Two local missions and a missionary in Africa are supported by the University Church. Mr. Fisher has been unanimously re-elected. He states that for several years the immediate local interest will center in freeing the new plant from debt.

Dr. Ainslie in Chicago.

Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, spoke to large crowds at the Moody Institute, Chicago, July 6 and 13. The Institute has been without a pastor since A. C. Dixon was called to the Spurgeon Tabernacle at London. Dr. Ainslie addressed the students of the Divinity House of University of Chicago, last Thursday evening.

The congregation at Pulaski, Ia., are happily located in a new church home, dedicated June 29, 1913. The house is of the chapel-bungalow type, and will serve the needs of the people for years to come. The entire cost was $3,500. The indebtedness was $2,200, all of which was easily raised and $200 additional with more pledges still to come. The splendid victory is due to the able leadership of Thos. F. Paris, Cedar Rapids, Iowa. The congregation at Pulaski was made glad by the gracious aid of the churches at Bloomfield, Stiles, (Mr. Paris' boyhood home), Milton, and Mt. Sterling. Henry Esch is the efficient pastor at Pulaski.

For the second time during his pastorate of ten years in that city, Thomas A. Boyer of Oakland, California, delivered the Fourth of July oration there this year. This is a recognition that has never been accorded to any other minister of that city. In presenting him, W. E. Gibson, the president of the Chamber of Commerce, gave expression to the sense of pride the whole city of Oakland felt in the orator of the day. The daily papers published the address of Mr. Boyer in full.

C. R. Sine, pastor at Hamilton, O., writes of the death of the wife of William Law, pastor of the Lindenwald Church, on June 26. Her death occurred at Miamitown, where she had gone to her home on a brief visit in company with Mr. Law. She was ill for only a week. Mr. Sine conducted the funeral at Miamitown, June 28.

The many friends of W. H. Bagby and wife will sympathize with them in the loss of Mrs. Bagby's mother, who departed this life at Waco, Texas, June 30. Only a few months ago they returned to Texas, locating in the nearby town of Taylor, Texas, that they might be near her in her declining years.

The address at the Fourth of July Celebration at Fullerton, Cal., was delivered by Bruce Brown by the invitation of the committee in charge. The annual St. John's day sermon to the Masonic Order, lodges of Orange County co-operating, was delivered by him June 27.

A unique dedication at Marion, Ohio, was recently conducted when a missionary library of sixty volumes was formally set apart by the Christian Endeavor Society for the use of the whole church. Dr. Royal J. Dye and Bert Wilson were present and made addresses.

Third Church, Indianapolis, celebrated the first anniversary of the coming to its pastorate of T. W. Grafton, June 29. During the year 115 persons have been added to the church and the work of completing the church building has been begun.

News comes from Dr. James Butchart and Dr. Paul Wakefield at Luchowfu, China, that the great medical work is taxing the capacity of the hospital and the strength of the missionaries. More than 30,000 are treated there annually.

R. W. Lilly, of Keokuk, Ia., (First), has been granted a two months' leave of absence to deliver Chautauqua lectures. "The Mountaineer," a study of religious conditions in the Tennessee mountains, is his theme.

First Church, Keokuk, is planning to provide a "Junior Church" for its younger members. The services will be held in the basement. This church has recently instituted an efficiency campaign in its Sunday-school.

W. S. Lockhart, Central, Texas, is delivering a series of open air lecture-sermons during the summer. "Ben Hur," the Passion Play, and "The Other Wise Man" are among the topics being discussed.

Miss Sylvia M. Siegfried, who has been in the Philippine Islands about five years, returns to her home about the first of August for her regular furlough. She lives at Newark, Ohio.

H. L. Willett preached to a large congregation at the University of Chicago, July 6. He gave an interpretation of the misionary situation in the Orient.

E. S. Ames, with his family, is summering at Pentwater. Dr. G. B. Foster, of the University of Chicago, occupied his pulpit at Hyde Park, July 6.

Dr. Wm. M. Hardy and wife and Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Baker will start on their long journey across China to the Tibetan border early in August.

J. F. Roseborough who has resigned the pastorate at Clinton, Ill., will move to Eureka, Ill. Mr. Roseborough will serve as field secretary for the sixth district.

S. F. Fowler, of Erwin, Tenn., is looking for a man to assist him in the music and otherwise in a mission meeting beginning August 10.

E. N. Duty, Charleroi, Pa., reports the close of the Sunday-school contest with Beaver Falls, June 29. Charleroi won by 521 points.

The congregation at Paris, Tex., has raised $38,000 toward building a new church. About $40,000 will be spent in this enterprise.

A Call to the Churches

The Sixty-third Annual Missionary Conventions of the Churches of Christ will be held at Toronto, Can., September 30 to October 6, 1913. As this is the first convention held on Canadian soil we should have a large attendance. A general invitation is hereby extended to all the church members to pray for this gathering and as many as possible to be in attendance on its sessions and assist in making this one of our greatest conventions. Each church is urged to select regular delegates in accordance with the provisions of the constitution of the American Missionary Society. On this subject the constitution reads as follows: Article 3. Membership—Its membership shall consist of members of the Church of Christ as follows: (a) Life directors, qualified by the payment of $500 each, in not more than five annual installments. (b) Life members by the payment of $100, each, in not more than five annual installments. (c) Annual members by the payment of $10 each. (d) Delegates from churches. Each Church of Christ is entitled to one delegate, and one additional delegate for each one hundred members beyond the first hundred and up to five hundred. No church is entitled to more than five delegates. (e) Presidents and Corresponding Secretaries of all State and Provincial Societies. (f) Missionary societies, churches, Sunday-schools and other organizations may bestow directorships, and memberships on the above conditions. (g) Those persons who have become life members or life directors of this society by the payment of other sums than those mentioned in this Constitution are to enjoy and exercise all the rights conferred upon them under the former Constitution of this society.

The laws read as follows: By-law I. All members of the American Christian Missionary Society attending its meetings must furnish credentials in order to exercise the right to vote. By-law II. All members of the Church of Christ attending the annual meetings of this Society have the privileges of participation in its deliberations and discussions, but are not entitled to vote.

Thus we see this matter of selecting delegates is not new amongst us. It has been in some form in the constitution since the organization of the society. The authorities of each church are urged to bring this before the congregation and select these delegates and furnish them with proper certificates. Such blanks will be sent to each congregation by the committee on unification. Your president must follow the constitution and only those properly accredited will be considered delegates and permitted to vote. This does not in any way restrict the attendance or the other privileges of the convention as all who are present will be able to attend all sessions and receive all the benefits. Places will be reserved for the delegates and they will take an active part in the general business of the societies. Every congregation amongst us should be properly represented. Let us have the hearty cooperation of all in making this a profitable and helpful convention.

GEO. A. MILLER,
President American Christian Missionary Society, Washington, D. C.

ARE YOU THINKING OF GOING TO SCHOOL?

Try a Bible College in combination with a great State University. Together we have an equipment worth $3,750,000, and an annual income of $760,000. Do you realize what that means? It insures both equipment and talent. The quantity and quality of work is not surpassed. It is seldom equalled. Over 260 teachers are at your service. Salaries are paid which command the best talent. Yet, tuition is nothing for Missourians, and is only $20 per year for students from elsewhere.

Moreover, the spiritual atmosphere both in schools and in town is of the best. A deep religious spirit results each year in students dedicating themselves to the ministry or to the work of foreign missions.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointed by churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

The Bethany System of Sunday School Literature

Schools that have used our Bethany Graded Series have hitherto been compelled to purchase other supplies from other publishing houses. We take pleasure in announcing that we have arrangements completed for a full catalogue of Sunday school supplies. Whatever your school needs can be ordered along with our splendid Graded Series. We need only say that our complete line of materials will be up to the standard set by these popular courses.

The Follies of the Wise and the Sins of the Good

The world has many treatises on the follies of fools, and many sermons have been preached denouncing the sins of the sinful. There has been far too little calm and dispassionate consideration of the follies of the wise and the sins of the good.

No man is wise at all times; no man is wise in all things. The man who is reputed to be wise is only an ordinary man whose folly has been checked in one or two well advertised directions. As for the rest of his thinking he is at best only an ordinary man and is in danger of being something less than that, having sacrificed somewhat of his wisdom in things in general to his proficiency in some one direction. As for the good man, he is, to be sure, quite different from the bad man; that is, he is a different man than he himself would be if he were bad, but he has his human weaknesses, and these have a sad way of showing themselves just where he has supposed himself strong. Character is not a chain which can never be stronger than its weakest link; character is a rope of many strands, and often the stronger fibers hold where the weaker ones have given away and his life meets the strain unbroken; but as a rope frays out when its strands are broken one by one, so often does a human life display its weakness in pitiful fashion when repeated tests had seemed to show that it could not be broken.

We must not assume, therefore, that the world has failed to discover the follies of the wise and the sins of the good. Indeed, it is not too much to say that the world has been busy in all ages seeking out these very facts. A considerable number of men and women in every generation have found their greatest satisfaction in life in their ability to discover spots upon the sun and elements of evil in people and things accredited as being good. There is a homely old proverb concerning the man who can see a knothole in a barn door and never see the barn. The world has had quite too many of that kind of people. Delighting in the frailty of humanity, they have rejoiced in real or apparent sins and follies on the part of those to whom the community at large has shown respect. Let no right-minded man or woman covet these critics the precarious joy they find in such an avocation. There is such a thing as human goodness, and if that were our present theme, we should find much material on the wisdom of fools and the goodness of those who are bad. But though our task be not that of the gossip or the fault-finder, it is a real one and may be a useful one in the discovery of the follies of the wise and the sins of the good.

Not only has the world gone far wrong in using the follies of wise men and the sins of good men as an implied denial of goodness, but it has made a further mistake. It has used this sad discovery to justify evil and folly of its own. The world is seemingly full of people who point out men supposed to be exemplary and who say one of two utterly fallacious things, either "If this man is a good man, I have no faith in goodness," or "This man was undoubtedly good, yet he did thus and so, why may I not do the same?" Everyone knows that both these excuses are illogical and wicked, yet thousands of people reason in this way, and others act as if such reasoning were valid.

Then again, we need somewhat to revise our theories on youth as the sole time of danger in human life. As a matter of fact, youth is not life's only danger period. It is a period whose dangers are of such a character that age and experience somewhat easily discern them and gravely point them out. Middle life has its dangers and some of them are very real. Youth is protected from some dangers by its very ignorance and innocence. Age and experience lose some of these safeguards through familiarity with things that are wrong. Moreover, youth has a protection in its idealization and future hope. Middle life is in danger of losing its ideals, of dropping to the dead level of the commonplace, of ceasing to hope very much for anything better in the future and of permitting its aspirations to sag.

* * *

Solomon is only one of the many men who entered into life with a noble and holy ideal, who maintained an unblemished youth, but who fell in middle life. David in his youth was a man after God's own heart, a radiant, warm-hearted, generous and pure-minded soul. It was in his middle life he fell. In the years when many men assume that temptations are over, then often comes temptation with unexpected and fatal power; when the fires of youth have burned themselves out, then often some smoldering coal of passion breaks forth in sudden flame. A large proportion of the disastrous forest conflagrations rise from fires which campers supposed had burned themselves out. The monotony of middle life, the dead level of the every day routine sometimes creates an occasion of temptation which youth escaped unharmed.

Whole-hearted Service

Where the results of action follow immediately the importance of whole-hearted service is apparent to every one. If the commander of a frontier fortress is divided in his allegiance, and his state of mind becomes known to the nation he ostensibly represents, he is relieved of his command instanter. Loss of the fortress, of an army, of independence, may be the penalty of allowing a man of doubtful loyalty to have command at a strategic position. War has taught men never to trust such a man. The party leader is expected to know his mind and to be fully committed to the principles which he professes. To waver in the midst of a campaign is to lose. One traitor can give the game to the opposing team.

Is his heart in it? Does he feel what he says? These questions we always ask when we listen to a speaker. We are disgusted with manufactured enthusiasm. The politician professing a love for people whom he despises, the preacher proclaiming the glories of a faith he does not have, a salesman who disposes of a gold brick by pretending to be deeply interested in the welfare of the person to whom he wishes to sell his wares, and a lecturer who goes about from place to place and has himself announced as a prophet of some sort when he is really seeking money and popularity, are pests which we have to endure for a season because they are able to deceive some of the people and to pass themselves off for genuine men.

We do injustice to our friends often, accuse them of disloyalty and treachery because we demand of them the wrong kind of loyalty. The right kind of loyalty was displayed by the Macedonians of whom the apostle could say, "First they gave their own selves to the Lord, and to us through the will of God." Loyalty to God was first. Then followed service to those who were doing the will of God. Paul invited men to help him only as he was doing the work of an apostle of Christ. Our friends may not be able to live up to their ideas of duty and service and at the same time do what we ask of them. We must allow them to decide for themselves what the Lord requires of them. When they pledge themselves to us, they reserve the right to judge of what is right for them to do.

The fanatic is whole-hearted. The trouble with him is that he neither respects the rights of others nor does justice to himself. He will give up home, friends, comforts, a good reputation, even life itself, for what he conceives to be right. We are compelled to admire his constancy. But he declines to be fair to men who cannot see life as he does. All who hold opinions contrary to his are enemies of God and deserve the wrath of God. He wrongs his own heart. He is a man and has the feelings of a man, but these he must crush in order to live up to what he conceives to be the truth. Religion for him is the impoverishment of mind and heart. Having learned that the life is more than food and raiment, he fiercely defends the proposition that the delights of the table and apparel that is attractive are exceedingly wicked. Since some philosophies have been declared unprofitable, he sets himself strongly against all systematic thought, holding that men must not think when they are searching for God, that God has given man reason only that he may put it to confusion.

A critical attitude is consistent with whole-hearted service. No one can be loyal to an institution without the desire to remove from it all imperfections. The patriotic citizen, if invited to speak on the Fourth of July, does not devote all his time to the glorification of American institutions and customs and the belittling of all that is foreign. On the contrary, he endeavors to discover the ideals that are worthy of our nation and to point out where we fall short of them. He studies the past that he may understand the present. He looks abroad that he may learn from the experience of older nations. Enthusiasm for his own country does not make him suspicious of the foreigner. His country is one among many, and his joy in it comes from his conviction that it is contributing in a worthy manner to the progress of humanity. In like manner the whole-heartedness of the true churchman includes a program for the betterment of the church. To identify whole-heartedness with adherence to things as they are is to do violence to the heart of man. What is to be as well as what is commands our enthusiastic support. We lose interest in our work if we are merely holding our own. We gather strength day by day if we feel that we are correcting ancient evils and putting away hurtful superstitions. [Midweek Service, July 30. Eccl. 9:10; I Cor. 6:20.] S. J.

Southern Chivalry

"Last week I saw in two counties in North Carolina what seems to me to be about the most successful butchery of the laws of chivalry that I have ever known." Thus writes a native of that state to the National Child Labor Committee expressing his surprise at the conditions surrounding female and child labor in his own state. "At two different places," he continues, "I saw women and children go to work at six in the morning. There were scores of them. Just one hour after the women and children went to work, I saw the men go to work. They came from practically the same community. Men working ten hours, women and children working eleven hours! It is there going on all the time, all the week, all the month, all the year. If women and children can work eleven hours, why not men? They can, but we have learned that it does not pay to have men work so long. Nobody seems to have given much thought to the women and children. They simply take what is coming. . . . I heard an officer in one of these mills working eleven hours by day and twelve hours by night, pray to God that we be shown our full duty. As the words fell from his lips, I could not but think that an answer to that prayer was woefully needed in his case." We read with the greatest care many religious papers coming from a wide area in the South, and we are at something of a loss to understand just why it is that so much space is given to theological controversy, often about questions on the periphery of human interest, and so little reference is made to these wretched conditions obtaining in more than one southern state. We should be glad to receive enlightenment.

A New Use for Idle Schoolhouses

In an address last week before the National Education Association at Salt Lake City, Mr. Lee F. Hammer, of the Russell Sage Foundation, pointed out the value of using schoolhouses as evening social centers. Students of corrective agencies claim 80 per cent of all misdemeanors occur between six and eleven p. m. The schoolhouse evening center is being made a strong counter influence by occupying this free time of the people with wholesome activities. In 1912, according to Mr. Hammer, 101 cities carried on some form of evening center work; this new line of educational activity—338 centers in all throughout the United States—was operated at an expense of $139,535, an average cost of $412 per center. Boston, for example, had four such centers last winter, in which there were twenty-nine musical clubs, which included orchestras, bands, glee clubs, mandolin clubs and mixed choruses; also fourteen dramatic clubs, eleven plain sewing, novelty sewing, and Irish lace, one millinery, eight folk dancing, one social dancing, four young men's civic clubs, one young women's civic club, one men's civic club, eight athletic clubs, one printing, nine art, four boys' games clubs. four girls' games clubs (not for the playing of games, but to prepare girls from seventeen to twenty to tell stories to children and to teach them games and songs) and four mothers' clubs—in all, ninety-nine groups. As to results, they are incalculable. "Men and women," Mr. Hammer declares, "who have been all day under the direction of other people, or who are bound by the thongs of necessity to uninteresting and monotonous tasks, need in the evening something more than passive amusement. Active participation is what furnishes recreation charged with life-giving power." It is to be hoped that this new sphere of community social uplift may do something to arrest the growing immorality which is observable in many sections of the country and as to which not a few good folks are still asleep. Our idle schoolhouses, as well as our idle church buildings, have been idle long enough. Another use to which schoolhouses in cities may profitably be put is for polling places. There is not a sufficient number of ward schoolhouses to house every precinct polling place, but, as far as they go, schoolhouse basements would be an improvement over saloons and barbershops.

An Optimist Goes by Our Door

Every day he passes. He is a stranger but he ministers to our courage and healthy joy in life. He drives the garbage wagon. On the side of his wagon is a sign which reads "PURE GARBAGE." Heaven bless a faith that dares to display a sign like that. Other carts may gather garbage less noble than his, but as for him he will have nothing less than pure garbage in his receptacle. It takes a gentleman of taste to gather pure garbage. We suspect that he dumps the cans into his cart quite as other garbage collectors do; but it is all in the ideal, and his is pure garbage. Then scarcely ever does he pass without displaying on the side of his dull cart a bouquet that he has salvaged from some heap of remains that survives a banquet or a wedding. This may be somewhat wilted and worn, but the driver of the pure garbage cart puts it bravely on the side of the wagon and drives through the neighborhood to bless it with the sight of flowers. He is a poet; he is an artist; he is a philanthropist. I lift my wilted spirit at the salute of his faded flowers. I may have to do humble business in this life, but it shall be exalted and it shall be adorned. I will do as well as the good teacher, the unknown driver, whose faith and courage make my complainings seem profane.

Synagogue and Church!

We are informed that while the new edifice of the First Congregational Church in San Francisco is being erected, the congregation is to worship in the Temple Emanu-El whose authorities have placed it at the disposal of Doctor Aked's people. Not only is the offer of the house of worship significant but in a letter signed by the president and rabbi of the Jewish congregation occurs the following sentence, equally significant: "We consider it a privilege to have your congregation worship in our synagogue, and ever after the thought that you have been our joint occupants will add a new consecration to the shrine which is so dear to our hearts." Perhaps these expressions of mutual helpfulness would be more frequent, had Christians been more careful to have the attitude of the great apostle to the Gentiles toward the Jews as expressed in Romans 9-11.

Absolutism!

The editor-in-chief of the Toronto Globe, Dr. James A. McDonald, who was one of the Canadian delegates to the Christian Endeavor Convention at Los Angeles, gave an address on "The Problem of Capital and Labor as Related to the Churches," in which he is reported to have made the following statement: "All over America there has grown up an industrial absolutism more baneful and much more arrogant than that of any Stuart queen; but where is the church of John Knox that will stand against tyranny and oppression for the will of God and for the rights of men?" If such words as these came from the lips of any ordinary agitator, they could be easily disregarded, but uttered as they are by one of Canada's most influential citizens who is the editor of Canada's most influential newspaper, no thinking person can fail to give them due consideration.

Homeopathy in Criminology

Last week a man entered a Chicago restaurant and ate, drank and smoked to a total value of $7.10. As he was passing out, the waiter presented him his bill, and the well dined man turned his pockets inside out and showed that he possessed assets to the amount of sixty cents. As it was impossible to replevin the dinner, they sent him to the Bridewell, where he will have free board for thirty days. Thus it is that the law as a punishment for securing free meals sentences a man to more free meals. Unfortunately the process goes farther. As a punishment for larger crimes it teaches him how to commit more crime, and this at great cost to the tax payers. Our prisons are schools of crime, as everyone knows, yet here is where we send men to punish them for the crimes they have already learned. Some day it will occur to some wise man that there is something wrong in the method. Too long have we been curing crime with a hair of the dog that has bitten us. Some day we shall learn better.

Henry Ward Beecher Said:

All over the world, so long as religion consisted of dead institutions, or dead institutions pretended to be religion; so long as priests walked up and down the earth claiming supernal power, and professing to wield it; so long as men fought for abstractions, and called abstract doctrines religion, or held them up as indispensable to religion—so long there could be no unity; the sticks lay dead in the old fire-place, or on the altar; but just as soon as the concurrent feelings of mankind begin jointly to look upon religion as love to God and love to man—just as soon as the common feeling is good will—the sticks will begin to burn; and moment they begin to burn, nothing in God's universe can stop their coming together; and this feeling is that which is forging unity.

The Christian World

Religious Delirium Tremens!

The Baptist Standard of Dallas, Tex., ever since the Southern Baptist Convention at St. Louis last May, has been "seeing snakes" or something, in the modern spirit of Christian Union. Every week some editor or writer in that otherwise worthy contemporary, is beating the Baptist tom-tom, calling the Baptist braves for a war-dance around the tepee of its own editorial sanctum. The latest explosion appears in the Baptist Standard of July 3. One Victor I. Masters, editorial secretary of the Home Mission Board of that denomination, appears to be convinced that there is "an insidious, powerful propagandism planned and matured in America by an undenominational group who have constituted themselves into a body to help the great Christian bodies along toward a demise." He screams with this peroration: "What do Baptists think of it, and what will they do?" So far as we are able to judge down here in the Southland, the Baptists are eating three square meals a day and tabooing everything that is not Baptist. Baptists have no "think" coming to them. Their "think" has already been thought, and decided upon. The Baptist game is to make a noise like a brass band, drowning out all other noises. But, levity aside, a two-page "leader" like the one Brother Masters puts over, is evidence of religious delirium tremens. Any man who sees a menace in Christian fellowship and a menace in breaking down rank sectarianism like that exhibited by Brother Masters himself, needs a trained nurse. The charge, or implied charge, that men like Dean Shailer Mathews, Charles Stelzle, Bishop E. R. Hendrix, Washington Gladden are trying to run the church of Christ into destruction, is one so utterly unworthy of any denominational paper printing it, as to compel doubt about the sanity of the man that makes it. Happily, the Christian world is bent on massing its strength, instead of dissipating it, Dallas, Texas, notwithstanding.

Methodists and Presbyterians in Canada

Christian union sentiment has been flourishing better in Canada than in the United States, for years past, but a good-sized cloud hovered over it for a moment or so during the Canadian General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. As has been narrated in these columns in times past, there has been a significant move on foot for years to unite the Methodists, the Congregationalists and the Presbyterians in one great Canadian Christian church. It was this proposition that was up for debate in the General Assembly of Canadian Presbyterians the other day. But there was a fly in the ointment! One strong anti-union speaker rose up in open meeting to say, that if ever the proposed merger became a fact, it would mean a funeral service for the Presbyterian church. Another brother had to relieve his pent-up feelings by averring that the unionists were persons disloyally aiming to blot out their own fellowship. A vote was taken on this procedure, and it was discovered that while 251 commissioners disapproved of such talk, there were 75 other commissioners who did approve of it. Obviously, the Presbyterians in Canada are not ready yet to talk business with their Methodist and Congregationalist brethren. However, The Continent (Presbyterian, Chicago) sheds some tears over the affair, as follows: But the incident is instructive because it reveals the snare that inheres in denominational conditions even where the leaders of a church are laboring with all sincerity to keep down sectarian pride and to cultivate the spirit of co-operation with other communions. Say all that one will, in sober earnest or sentimental extravagance, about the denominations being simply different regiments of one army, the mass of the people don't think of it so. They see the churches separately organized and differently named, and nothing on earth can keep the average church man from looking on them as so many separate bodies of independent existence. The sad result is that when it is proposed to combine two or more of these bodies into one, it is only the few who see that fragments of one thing are being matched together to produce a whole; the many declare that the old entities are being destroyed, wiped out, killed off, in order to make room for some new thing never in existence before. The theory that a "realizing sense" of Christian unity can be created among the church quite as well without as with an external union is a fallacy with which sensible men cannot afford to delude themselves. As a plain matter of fact, our denominationalism never under the best conditions works that way. Unity gains what it does gain not by denominations but in spite of them.

But it is unfair to our Canadian friends to dwell on the embarrassments which their sectarian minority is causing them. Certainly the majority continues to bear itself with marvelous patience. In an equable temper, which is beyond all praise, it persists in its purpose to exalt the undivided interests of the kingdom of God, while still laboring with truly Christian delicacy to make an easy path into union for the palsied knees of even the lamest sectarians. And meanwhile the church goes on efficiently and prosperously, blessed in its prevailing generous spirit even though yet retarded from this one particular aspiration. The high and aggressive life pervading the denomination was thrillingly demonstrated in the church congress preceding the Assembly, and the missionary fervor of the Assembly itself was another infallible token of living spirit. It was certainly befitting that such an Assembly should have been presided over by such a warhorse of missions as Dr. Murdoch Mackenzie, the "hero" of Honan.

Methodists and Presbyterians in India

While the Methodists and Presbyterians in Canada apparently failed to harmonize, due to Presbyterian sectarianism according to The Continent, yet it is pleasant to know that the Methodists and Presbyterians in India managed to harmonize very well, according to the same journal of July 3, which says:

Denominations Harmonize in India.

Comity and co-operation between different denominatons on the foreign mission field has had another remarkable victory in the adjustment just obtained in the united provinces of India between the American Presbyterian and Methodist missions, whose work has overlapped in several sections of that region. In a five-hour session at Cawnpore, where the Christian unity felt and the disposition of self-sacrifice manifested were regarded as singular evidences of the presence of the Holy Spirit, a boundary line was drawn across the country and it was agreed that the Presbyterians should withdraw all their work to one side of the line, while the Methodists confine their efforts to the other.

To accomplish this division of labor and eliminate competition the Presbyterians passed over to the care of the Methodist mission 600 converts, while the Methodists gave the Presbyterians a community in which the Christian population is estimated at 15,000. A joint commission was appointed to appraise all property thus transferred, and a strict financial accounting will be made, in which the mission found to have profited most by the transaction will pay over to the other a cash balance equal to its gains. A commission was named of three members from each part, which is to have full power to adjust any future question that seems to threaten the good relations of the two missions.

A Roman Catholic Bishop on Modern Dance

It is gratifying to know that Tennessee has a fearless Roman Catholic bishop in the person of Right Reverend Byrne of Nashville. Bishop Byrne has "cracked down" on the indecent dance. Bishop Byrne not only says that these dances have been working "sad havoc among young men and young women," but the good bishop goes further forbidding his people in Tennessee to dance these dances, threatening them with refusal of absolution in the event of disobedience. Bishop Byrne bases his attack primarily upon the testimony of members of the Memphis branch of the Knights of Columbus, who announce their determination to expel any member who attends any entertainment where the "turkey trot." and similar dances, are part of the entertainment. There's Puritanism for you, with a vengeance! True, Protestant ministers cannot "forbid" Protestants with the high hand of Bishop Byrne, but the Protestants can forbid themselves, and it is time they were about it at that.

Centenarian Made a Doctor of Laws

The Reverend John F. Mesick, D. D., a minister in the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born June 28, 1813. He was therefore one hundred years of age, when Rutgers College uniquely conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Laws last month. The same college sixty years ago, in 1853, gave Doctor Mesick the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Doctor Mesick enjoys the distinction of being the first centenarian on record, perhaps, to receive an honorary college degree. He also enjoys a reasonable degree of physical health and mental vigor at his home in York, Pa. We enjoy reading about it, and would enjoy telling Dr. Osler about it, if we could, right on top of a story of a preacher still preaching at 94, which we gave in these columns recently.

Big English Missionary Deficit

Probably the oldest missionary society is the London Missionary Society. It was founded in 1795. It has been a world-force in the Christian civilization of heathen people ever since. Its missionaries belt the entire globe. And yet that venerable and honorable society is facing a deficit of $350,000, which has accumulated for a number of years. In the interest of a retrenchment policy, already that society has recalled some of its missionaries from Asia, Africa, New Guinea and the South Seas. In this way, the Society will reduce expenses by $75,000 a year. Now the question naturally arises: what is the matter? From this distance, it is difficult to make a diagnosis, but we guess the trouble is either in the unbusiness-like method of collection or lack of enthusiasm, such as characterizes foreign missions in America. We might also venture a guess that perhaps the English Establishment is paralyzing the spiritual life of the English people.

Thorpe and the Theolog

And now it comes to pass that a theological student in Princeton Seminary betters the all-around athletic record of Thorpe by twenty-two and a half points. This does not look much like the unnourished and gently complaining evangelical divine, against whom the newspaper humorists always have been able to aim the shafts of their sarcasm with good success. When the report of the achievement of Thompson was read to a crowd of students at Lake Geneva they applauded to the limit. It was a ringer for the Christian ministry with men who are used to taking the measure of a fellow by his physical ability as well as according to his mental attainments. There seems to be a certain consistency in the ability of a theological student and prospective minister being able to make "points," especially in Princeton, where five of them are said still to be held in esteem. Congratulations to Champion Thompson, and may he use his strength to good advantage in the militant business of the church which he is to serve.

Southern Presbyterian Statistics

The Presbyterian Church U. S., commonly called the Southern Presbyterian Church, at the end of March, 1913 had 300,771 members; 15,979 additions on confession of faith, during the ecclesiastical year; a net increase in membership of 7,926; 260,838 persons erolled in the Sunday-schols; and gave more than $631,000 for foreign missions, $150,061 for home missions, and $283,395 for education, which includes ministerial education, schools, colleges and orphanages. Not a bad record, is it?

World Conference on Faith and Order

By Robert H. Gardiner, Secretary.

The Protestant Episcopal Church in October, 1910, appointed a commission to bring about a conference for the consideration of questions as to the faith and order of the Christian Church, in the hope that such a conference will promote the cause of Christian communions throughout the world which confess our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour to unite with the Episcopal Church in arranging for and conducting such a conference. More than twenty such co-operating commissions have been appointed, including all the leading communions in the United States and the Church of England in England and Canada. Invitations are now being sent to the other leading communions outside the United States as fast as the names and addresses of their officers can be obtained. The Episcopal commission is publishing leaflets, explaining the scope and methods of the conference, and giving a list of books on Christian unity, and those leaflets have been circulated all over the world. The commission is glad to send them free to any one who will apply for them to the secretary, Robert H. Gardiner, Gardiner, Maine. He has received probably ten thousand or more letters on the subject, coming from every part of the world and from members of every communion, Protestant and Catholic. Persons applying are entered on a permanent mailing list, so that they will receive all future publications.

The Episcopal commission is trying to carry on the undertaking in the spirit of Bishop Brent, who urged, at the meeting when the commission was organized, that the side of organization shall not be made too prominent, but that we shall seek spiritual power. The first step shall be, in a new and full and deep way to rededicate ourselves to God, free from past prejudice, in order that, so losing ourselves, we may have a spiritual power simply compelling.

Ministers and laymen and women in Pennsylvania to the number of 570 have already been brought together, at least to the extent of enrollment on the list, which is arranged geographically so that those who are interested enough in Christian unity to apply to be placed on the list may obtain the names of others in their neighborhood also interested, with whom they can meet for unity prayer for the reunion of Christians and for conference as to how it can best be brought about. The list includes Congregationalists, Baptists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Lutherans, Methodists, Moravians, Reformed Church in the United States, German Evangelical Synod of North America and Roman Catholics. The executive committee of the commission of the Episcopal Church, of which the Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., rector of Trinity church, New York, is chairman, has recently issued a circular letter urging such local conferences. The world conference may not be held for a number of years, for it will be a long undertaking to get the approval of all the leading communions all over the world, though the project is being received with great cordiality.

From Near and Far

Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, has received a memorial from the Japan Mission of the American Board of Missions, relative to friendly relations between the peoples of Japan and the United States. The missionaries deplore unfriendly race legislation and request the Federal Council, which represents the Protestant Churches of America, to appoint a Commission to study this whole question, and that it seek to rally the Christian forces of the United States for the promoting of such measures as are in accord with the highest standards of Christian statesmanship. The missionaries state it as their belief that the solution of the question is to be secured not by the adjustment of treaties, nor the modification of laws, but only by the activity of the Christians of America.

Twenty-five towns, besides St. Louis, are to be included in a united missionary campaign, plans for which were laid at a luncheon recently in St. Louis. The promoters of this general movement, to continue from September to March, have headquarters in New York and have districted St. Louis as the center for eastern Missouri and southern Illinois. The towns outside named for the campaign are: Columbia, Mexico, Fulton, Jefferson City, Moberly, Fayette, Poplar Bluff, Fredericktown, Mo.; Cairo Duquoin, Alton, Belleville, Ill.; Webster Groves, St. Charles, Kirkwood, Hannibal, Louisiana, Macon, Kirkville, Mo.; Quincy, Springfield, Jacksonville, Lincoln, Decatur, and Mattoon, Ill.

Daniel A. Poling, recently elected superintendent, temperance and citizenship of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, said, in recent national convention, regarding the attitude of the society to prohibition: "We declare for national prohibition in 1920 as the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. And because of past bitter defeats where good laws have been intrusted to unfriendly and uncommitted administrations, we declare for the election of candidates and administrations outspokenly committed to the enforcement of existing temperance laws and to the complete destruction of the liquor traffic."

Secretary of the Navy Daniels proposes to convert every battleship and training station into a school where enlisted men will receive three hours' daily instruction under graduates of Annapolis. Besides making enlisted service more attractive, Secretary Daniels says this new plan will offer to every young American an opportunity to receive a minor college education at the same time that he is serving Uncle Sam. It will offer a chance to young men to fit themselves for a trade or a profession, so that when their enlistment is ended they may become useful citizens.

Defending his entering the lecture field, to add to his income, Secretary of State Bryan said: "I did not think it improper to go from the Chautauqua platform into a presidential race, and if I should have been elected President I would have thought it no stepping down to return to a Chautauqua platform. These meetings enable me to keep in touch with the people. I know of no better opportunity than they offer to present a message worth presenting to those to whom it is worth while to present a message."

An eight-hour day for women and better labor conditions in general as a result of the Illinois equal suffrage law were prophesied by Miss Jane Addams at the Women's Trade Union mass meeting held last week in Garrick Theater, Chicago, to protest against the killing of the fifty-four-hour amendment to the ten-hour law. This was Miss Addams' first public appearance since her return from the world equal suffrage congress at Budapest.

The Perry celebration, which is to include the celebration of General Harrison's campaign and the hundred years of peace since the signing of the treaty of Ghent as well as the famous victory of the Commodore, was inaugurated at Put-in-Bay, Ohio, July 4. The commemoration program is to extend to October 5, and is to include celebrations at a number of lake ports.

Mount McKinley, the highest peak in North America, will be given the name of "Denail," an Italian word meaning "The great one," if Archdeacon Hudson Stuck, the Episcopal missionary, whose party was the first to reach the summit of the great peak, is able to prevail upon the national board of geographic names to make the change.

A request has been made by Madame Dieulafoy, French feminist, that women have an accepted place in the French army. Her plan is that women be enrolled as soldiers to relieve men for the firing line who are doing clerical duty, but does not include that they be given muskets and placed in positions of danger.

A bill to pension old people over sixty-five years of age whose income is under ten dollars a week has been introduced in Congress. The provision is to pension those with incomes of less than $6 a week at $4 a week, incomes of from $6 to $7 at $3, between $7 and $8, $2 a week, and from $8 to $9, $1 a week.

What is said to be the largest single gift ever made to the Young Men's Christian Association in this country was announced by the Brooklyn Association. It is a gift of $500,000 by Mrs. Roxy M. Smith, widow of William Van Rensselaer Smith, a retired sugar and coffee merchant.

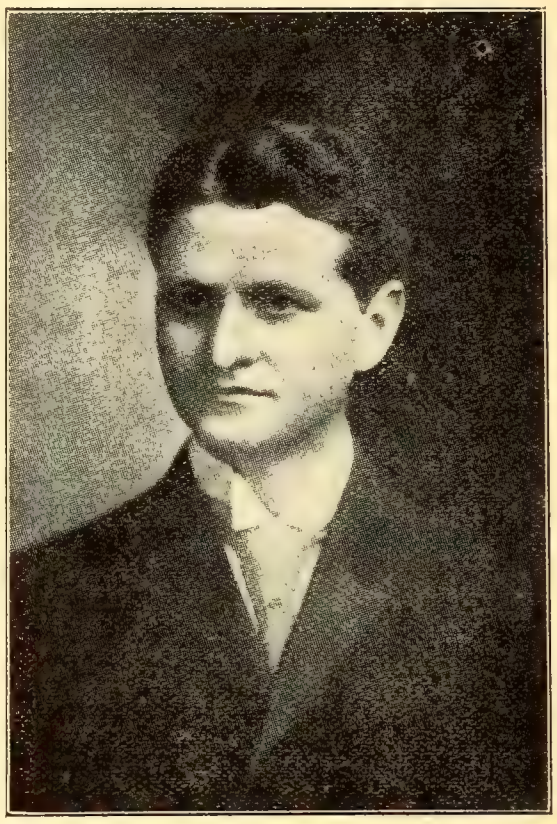
The Unrealized Vision of Jesus

The Church the Chief Agency in Its Realization

By W. F. Rothenburger

The unrealized vision of Jesus is like an unfinished painting or an unfinished mosaic; it stares us in the face and challenges completion.

The war between Capital and Labor was never more aggravated, but what agency is better able to reconcile these two inevitable and contending forces than the Church whose founder taught the dignity of labor and the sin of oppression? The pulpit must have a prophetic message at this point, and the Christian employer and employee must exercise the same spirit of mutual interest during the six working days of the week which characterizes their worship together on the Lord's Day. Failure at this point is a betrayal of the trust which has been committed to the Christian. There is no solution to this gigantic problem but that of fraternity and love. Dr. Frank Gunsaulus upon returning from a study of European conditions a few years ago voiced a sentiment which found a hearty response in many quarters when he said, "The solution of the great problems of today is a religious one. We have tried everything else but Christ. But labor, smutty and begrimed, will become calm at last, not by might, power, the sword, or by arms, but by Gethsemane and Calvary." This is the task of the Church.



W. F. Rothenburger.

Jesus' vision of a clean and temperate life is yet unrealized. When one thinks of the White Slave Traffic, the influence of which need not be depicted, when one remembers that despite the temperance wave which has swept over the states the "consumption of alcoholic liquors per capita of the nation has more than doubled in the last twenty years" (Commons—Social Reform and the Church), and that legislation has failed to control it, when we contemplate the multiplicity of sins that are born in the social world, let it be remembered that the Church, as no other institution in the world, holds within its grasp the power of solution. When in nine days 218 divorces were granted in our own county, at the rate of twenty-four per day, let us ask, What institution can stem the tide of domestic infidelity and realize Jesus' vision of the perfect family, so well as his own Church? What shall be said of the great army of the unemployed, the unconfessed caste system, and many other conditions which have been with us so long and from which the Church dare not turn its face?

But there is a comparatively new problem confronting us in these latter days, or perhaps better, an old one which has had a rebirth and has leaped into commanding proportions. I refer to the question of physical health. In nearly every city there are apostles of good health, some of whom are sane and are making a real contribution to the welfare of the race, while of others, as much could not be said. The Dowie Movement of a few years ago which called into being a city of 10,000 people almost in a night, the Immanuel Movement of a more recent date, and the Christian Science Movement which is assuming such proportions that no astute mind will pass it by unnoticed—these make us ask whether the Church has been negligent at this point and has divorced the soul and the body so long that the very nature of the Gospel of Jesus and the growing physical needs of the race have formed a union independent of it. But even more important than this is the protection of the race from disease which finds its source in social sins. If frequently quoted statistics are true that so large a percentage of our masculine population is infected by transmissible diseases, the results of which are all too visible, where can we look for reform at this point which strikes at the very heart of our civilization as well as at the happiness and health of the millions yet unborn, but to the Church whose Christ was the exponent of the highest moral standards? I believe the time has come when the Church dare not longer be silent here. One denomination, or one minister in a community could not accomplish the reform, but if heaven could put its seal upon any modern trust, it would be upon that combination of ministers who would covenant among themselves to refuse to unite two people in marriage who did not present a bona fide certificate of health from a reputable physician. No greater testimony to a young man's cleanness of life and his fitness to become a good husband and father could be had, than his willingness to patronize this trust on his wedding day; no greater reform could sweep the nation and leave in its path a more splendid evidence of health and happiness; and no chip of marble could add more mightily and more beautifully to the mosaic of Jesus' social vision than this. May it receive our deepest and most devout consideration.

If the Church is to be the medium through which the vision of Jesus for a more perfect society is to be realized, it is well that we pause for a moment at several other vital considerations where a better adjustment is in order. One school of thinkers is emphasizing regeneration as a sole need of men and the supreme task of the Church, while another school places environment far in the supremacy. There is quite a universal faith in the regenerating power of the Gospel as presented by the Church, and there is a rapidly-spreading sentiment in favor of environment. It seems that Jesus and the Apostles never taught either at the expense of the other. The question now arises, Shall we demand that the Social Settlements, the Young Men's and the Young Women's Christian Associations, the public schools, and the Municipal associations be held entirely responsible for such an environment as will be wholesome for a regenerated life, or shall the Church feel a sense of responsibility at this point? If scientific investigation has proven that "poor diet, poor homes, unfavorable occupations, and heredity produce three-fourths of our modern intemperance," then it is unfair to expect the spirit of God to make a reformed drunkard immune from these influences when they might be removed. If human nature demands social life in the community, it will not be unwise for the Church to afford a homelike place for the young people to meet and form their friendships rather than on the street corners and the public dance halls, or other improper and dangerous places. I cannot sympathize with those who, like Dr. Johnston Myers, feel that the art of preaching and of worship have little place in the life of the modern church, but I am equally convinced that these are inadequate to realize the vision of Jesus. One admires St. Peter's in Rome, with its massive pillars, its beautiful mosaics, its white Carrara, its porphyry, and its beautiful alabaster marble; one is hushed into silence under the vaulted dome of Michael Angelo; but to walk the streets of Rome and see the poverty, the squalor and the sin within sight of this massive and beautiful piece of art, one is convinced that places of worship alone cannot accomplish the task. The Church needs to look upon regeneration and environment as her twin emphases, each ministering to the success of the other.

To realize the vision of Jesus, two other schools need to be brought more closely together and their respective principles harmonized; and these are in part but different aspects of the two above mentioned, viz: that which believes in the scooping-in process which would build up a big organization, the end of which is tantamount to colonization, while the other would have the kingdom extended by a studied and well planned radiation of its life into every corner of the community. The first rings absolutely true to the ideals of the Apostolic Church which was still warm with the breath of Jesus upon it; it seeks to bring men to repentance, to an open confession of their faith in Jesus, and to an open allegiance to his propaganda, as on the day of Pentecost; it seeks to crystalize the teachings of Jesus into definite form with unmistakable name, but it is in danger of becoming simply an institution-builder. The other process which seeks to reproduce the fruits of Jesus in society without the label rings also true to the ideas of Jesus, but it is in danger of becoming so latitudinarian as to forget its source. This process, in its extremest form, would be in danger of developing a moral and humanitarian condition of society without recognizing Jesus as its real source. The one extreme would spend all its time on the care of the vine, while the other would forget the vine and be concerned only with the fruit. The Church will become the most effective medium by which the vision of Jesus is to be realized only when these two great principles join hands and recognize their true relationship.

The greatest weakness of the Church today is its divided state. After all allowance is made for different types of mind which need to be satisfied, for the restoration of principles which needed to be emphasized, it remains true that our divided forces are a most serious handicap. There was a time when it seemed necessary to spend much time in controversy, in order that the atmosphere might be cleared, and that the Church might determine the essentials of its belief. But this pragmatic age looks back upon such as the Arian controversy, realizing that it played some part in its day, but smiles at the impossible task to which it set itself. The Christological controversies of the early centuries which gave rise to Nestorianism, Eutychianism, and Monophysitism, each of which tried to describe the nature of the incarnation, have no charm for the man of today except as a matter of history. And we are glad for that spirit among both the laity and the clergy which winks at the non-essentials that separate us today. The astute business man looks upon us as most extravagant spenders of money for purposes which do not accomplish the greatest mission of the Church. Men like Stelzle, Thompson, Commons, Strong, and others tell us that the Church is losing ground in the city. Be that as it may, it is certainly making an unwise expenditure of its money by maintaining superfluous equipment. In this respect, the city is overchurched. There are many centers in our own city with a half dozen plants where one or two would be entirely adequate to accommodate the amount of work accomplished. Millions of dollars are invested in superfluous buildings which, if invested in extending the Kingdom would multiply our power many fold, and all because we are still holding to our denominational shibboleths with a more deadly grip than we are to the real task of the Church. Nowhere is this more in evidence than in the relative amounts expended for maintenance and extension. Last year the Methodist Body of Cleveland spent $9.49 per member for local maintenance, and $4.58 for missions and benevolence; the Disciples spent $10 per member for local maintenance and $3.75 for extension; the German Evangelical figures are $10.60 and $3.50, the Baptists $14.30 and $4.16; the Congregationalists $14.42 and $2.65; the Episcopalians $16.25 and $2.07, and the Presbyterians of Cleveland spent $26.78 for the maintaining of their local churches while giving $3.72, less than 14 per cent of that amount, for general extension. The economist looks upon this as a most reckless and disproportionate expenditure of money. If the Church of Jesus Christ ever makes an impression upon the city which is worthy of its divine appointment it will be by minimizing denominationalism and sectarianism and magnifying its supreme task of making men Christlike. The country problem is suffering from the same cause. A church to every two hundred of the population in many villages each of which is struggling for even a half decent existence; two or three church buildings at a township center, only one of which gives any evidence of religious life, while the others have occasionally been dedicated to the centralized school system or left as decaying monuments to the disgrace of a divided church, but with ruins less enticing than the ruins of the old world, these are conditions which demand readjustment. The prayer of Jesus for a greater oneness of his people must be answered more fully before his vision of a well-ordered and redeemed society can be realized.

Christianity, when it properly represents its Christ, holds supremacy among all the forces of men. "It contains nothing in its essential life that can decay. It has the step of immortal vigor. On its thigh is the sword of universal conquest and dominion; and in its eyes, that look before and after, the light of divinity, and the tender look of helpfulness and love." To make this force operative and thereby realize the vision of Jesus is the supreme task of the Church.

Sagamore Sociological Conference

The Story of a Mountain Peak Occasion

By Richard M. Vaughan

"I have attended the various religious and sociological conferences of the country," said Prof. Edward A. Steiner at the closing session, "but Sagamore is the mountain peak." Down near the elbow of the arm with which Cape Cod shelters Massachusetts Bay is a cluster of cottages where a group of men prominent in the Christian Endeavor movement took their outings. It is a picturesque scene with its woods and rock-strewn lands, its dunes and far-stretching sea. But the distinction of Sagamore is not scenic, it is intellectual and moral. For three days early in July for seven successive years a most unique and influential gathering has been held in the quaint Cape Cod country. What is there about it to justify the tribute of the distinguished author of "On the Trail of the Immigrant?"

The Organizer.

The Sagamore Conference is the embodiment of an idea of a remarkable man. The genius of Chautauqua is John H. Vincent; of Northfield, Dwight L. Moody; of Sagamore, George W. Coleman. It requires a distinct act of self-denial not to write at length of "one of the most likable men in America," as Peter Clark Macfarlane terms him. The encomium occurs in a character sketch entitled "Sunshine George." The mission of Coleman in the world is publicity, he believes in the power of truth. The historic Baptist passion for democracy and freedom in faith and speech has no nobler modern exemplar than the founder of the Ford Hall meetings and the Sagamore conferences.

There are few things in a democracy so important as introducing the various social classes to each other. While the conference of 1913 was in session at Sagamore Beach, Governor Mann, of Virginia, was saying at the semi-centennial at Gettysburg that the Civil War would never have taken place if the men of the sixties had known each other as well as we do. There are thoughtful men who see conditions in our time similar to those which preceded the French Revolution. If the coming revolution is an evolution and a bloodless one we will owe it to the men who promoted mutual acquaintance among social classes. When men like George W. Perkins and Arturo Giovannitti fully understand each other it will be better for both and for us all.

The place of the catholic and dynamic Coleman as the vital factor in the Sagamore conferences was well expressed on the final evening by Pres. W. L. Poteat, of Wake Forest College. "I am going back to my Carolina home," said he, "with a Sagamore sunburn which I owe to Sunshine George."

The Program.

The 200 guests of the president of the conference and his associates hailed from all parts of the country, although naturally most of them were from New England. The spread of the Sagamore idea, no less than the Ford Hall idea, is much to be desired, in order that larger constituencies may be reached. But those present at Sagamore, for the most part, were leaders of opinion in the various walks of life. They listened to seven addresses, all of which were followed by general discussion of the livest sort.

The opening remarks were made by Dr. Dillon Bronson, a Methodist clergyman. He read, pertinently enough, about Peter and Cornelius. He said that the spiritual man was the man who is good to live with. The frog in the well is prone to think its waters are the ocean, it needs an enlargement of knowledge. Only larger acquaintance can break the hardening caste lines in American life. God has no pets. The "Mayflower" pilgrims all traveled steerage. English is not the only language God can understand. The pastor who neglects the people of foreign speech about his church needs only to close his eyes to be dead.

Then came Charles Rann Kennedy, author of "The Servant in the House." This drama sets forth the influence of Jesus as the great social reconciler. He did not speak as announced on "The Drama as a Social Force;" he did better, he illustrated it by dramatic readings from the New Testament. This dramatist by all his training and traditions is an English Tory but by conviction of sin he confessed himself a socialist. To many his readings were a revelation of the social passion and power of the Bible. Historical study has brought about the rediscovery of Jesus, we have long been told. In a growing literature the Christ who has been rediscovered is the revolutionary Christ. Surely, this is not the total truth concerning the Son of Man but it is the avenue of approach to multitudes today. To this fact the experience of one young woman bore eloquent testimony. She declared publicly that she had never had a Bible in her hands, but the discovery of the social sympathies of Jesus as interpreted by Kennedy had kindled a resolution to buy a Bible and to study it.

The next day was a day full of opposites. Three successive addresses by a representative of big business, a leader of the Independent Workers of the World, and a champion of trades unionism were an education in tolerance and an enlargement of social horizon.

George W. Perkins, whose former connection with J. P. Morgan Company is well known, read a paper on "The Workers' Fair Share." He found the source of the industrial problem, not in tariffs and trusts, but in improved methods of human intercommunication. Destroy the tariff, the trust continues; destroy the telegraph, it becomes impossible. His cure for industrial ills was publicity, abolition of privilege, and especially, profit-sharing. Such sharing, however, must be a far remove from a mere bonus system or aught that smacks of charity, toilers must become real partners in the business. We should not cut down the tree until we have at least tried to remove the parasites. Competition may have been the life of trade but it was the death of manhood; coöperation is the hope of all.

The Arch Syndicalist.

Interest was tense when Arturo Giovannitti arose to speak on "The Constructive Side of Syndicalism." The gifted Italian youth, a poet of no mean powers, once a student for the Protestant pulpit, now a leader of the portentous I. W. W., was given a fair hearing. He preferred the name industrial unionism to syndicalism. He declared that it was not only a fighting force but a constructive one. It seeks to destroy the capitalistic class by assimilation. Labor, be it manual or mental, produces all, to it belongs alike the products and the machinery of industry. The workers frankly propose to take what is their own. They care more for justice than they do for peace. Every contract with capital on the part of labor is a farce, it is made under duress. Sabotage is at times a justifiable instrument of the weak, less blameworthy than the food adulterations and rotten fire hose of capitalism. Class lines must be tightly drawn, then will come the test of force. Syndicalism is not the coming slavery but the new individualism.

His hearers felt the deep social sympathy of Giovannitti, his love for the man lowest down, but they regarded his thoughts as the outpourings of an impractical idealist. But, strangely enough, extremes met. Perkins wished to make every laborer a capitalist; Giovannitti, every capitalist a laborer.

In A. J. Portenar, a linotype operator, conservative trades unionism found a doughty champion as he spoke on the theme, "The Perversion of an Ideal." He believed that syndicalism made a true indictment of modern society but that it was an unworkable scheme. It was involved in inescapable contradictions. The part of wisdom is to proceed constructively. The capitalist has the greater resources; before he is half starved, the laborer will be dead, in any test of force. We must take a step at a time. The injustices against which syndicalism is a protest must be removed.

Servants of Industry.

The following day two level-headed young business men showed the means employed to make our industrialism more effective. Mr. Robert G. Valentine spoke on "Servants of Industry." The term described a new calling, in which the speaker is a pioneer. He is a counselor on labor problems to whose office men in business difficulties repair. He was recently instrumental in settling the differences between the telephone company in Boston and its operators. Mr. Miner Chipman, who is known as an efficiency engineer, spoke luminously on "One Interest, One Standard, One Aim, for Employer and Employé." He diagnosed our industrial ills as due to inefficiency. The removal of incidental ills does not touch the fundamental question of the justice of private ownership of natural resources, but we will never see the trees until the brush wood is cleared away.

The closing address was by Prof. Edward A. Steiner, of Grinnell College, Iowa, upon "The Immigrant as an Economic and Social Asset and Liability." In words which scintillated with humor and wisdom he told the story of the incoming human tide. The working man is an incorrigible idealist who shall not and does not live by bread alone. The immigrant produces more than he costs. He gets more wages in the states he throngs than do the lowest paid toilers in states into which no immigration pours. The primitive folk from southeastern Europe are far more easily assimilated than the representatives of highly cultured peoples. The Englishman is the last man to take out naturalization papers; he is not assimilated until he is in the cemetery. Immigrants do not herd nearly as much as they are herded. The Bible, the flag, and the public schools are the hope of the new America.

Miss Helen Keller was present at the conference. Her deep interest in social questions, her adherence to socialism, are matters of public knowledge. Her teacher, Mrs. Anne Sullivan Macy, communicated to her by means of the manual code every word spoken at Sagamore. Miss Keller was persuaded to address the people present. She did so in a speech remarkable for its insight into the problems of the day and for its literary qualities. Her crowning achievement is the acquisition of speech. She said that they were blind who did not see the misery of the world, they were deaf who did not hear the cry of the exploited. We live for each other and we are finding out that this is the only life worth living.

Many opinions but one spirit, such is Sagamore. Whatever the surface contradictions there were ever visible underlying unities. There was new confirmation of the fact that earnest people may be many as the waves, yet one as the sea.

The Tears of Jesus

By Robert Stuart MacArthur

"The Son of God in tears" is a striking picture, and it suggests a touching theme for remark. The tears of Jesus have melted men's hearts through all the centuries. Three times during his earthly life Jesus wept. The first two instances of his weeping are recorded in the gospels; for the last instance, we must go to the letter to the Hebrews. There are marked distinctions between these instances of weeping on the part of Jesus; and there is genuine progress of thought from the first occasion on which he shed tears to the last instance given in scripture.

The first time of his weeping is recorded in John 11:35. In our version, we have as descriptive of this act two words—"Jesus wept." The more literal translation would be, "Jesus shed tears." This is the shortest and, in many respects, the sweetest verse in the Bible. The stone which closed the grave of Lazarus is taken away by those who stood near. God never performs unnecessary acts. God needs human helpers even in his greatest miracles. Then came the royal command, as becomes the majesty of God—"Lazarus, come forth." This was the mightiest miracle, humanly speaking, which our Lord performed during his human life. Legend tells us that Lazarus lived thirty years after he was raised from the dead, and died at the age of sixty. It has been well said that he came forth from the tomb with the fragrance and bloom of a bridegroom.

Human Sympathy and Divine Power.

Marvelous are the manifestations both of human sympathy and divine power on the part of Christ in connection with this miracle. His tears showed his tender sympathy. At the same time he groaned, being indignant in spirit as he observed the ravages of sin in producing sorrow and death. The word which is used in the third verse of this chapter may well be used regarding Christ's love to Lazarus; but the beautiful decorum of scripture forbids its use in the fifth verse, where Martha and Mary are included with Lazarus in the expression of love. In the fifth verse a different word is employed; this word denotes regard, esteem, friendship. The word in the third verse means personal affection and ardent love. The writer thus sacredly guards the relations which Jesus sustained to this family from any perversion which enemies might attempt to employ to his injury.

Christ loved this family, and yet he tarried. He tarried because he loved this family. The evangelist John, writing perhaps sixty years afterward, presents to us the sublime spectacle of "the son of God in tears." Christ is one with us in our sorrows and joys; Christianity knows nothing of a stolid stoicism. It knows of the regulation but not of the suppression of natural affections.

In the second instance of weeping, Christ shed tears of patriotic fervor. Here he wept over Jerusalem, the city of song and story, Luke 19:41. At the grave of Lazarus, he dropped silent tears; the word employed in John 11:35, to set forth our Lord's sympathetic love, is edakrusen. The word used in Luke 19:41 is eklausen. Here he wept aloud; here his emotions choked his utterance; he never completed the sentence he began regarding the fate of the doomed city.

Our Lord stood on the lower part of the Mount of Olives, whence the view of the city is even now most striking. The scene is solemnly and sublimely instructive. As the procession turned the shoulder of the hill, Jerusalem rose before these passover pilgrims in its unique glory. It shone resplendently in the morning sun. Before their gaze arose the temple, with its white walls and courts glittering with gold; there also were the mighty castles and the sumptuous palaces of Herod. Over all was the mystic spell of two thousand years of history. Christ knew that soon all this glory and splendor would be a hopeless ruin. He was a true patriot as well as a sincere religionist. He forgot all his own momentary glory; he thought only of the coming misery of the people he loved. The scene overpowered him; his heart was filled with indescribable sadness. All the shame and sorrow of his anguish and torture a few days later did not produce such demonstrative grief as he now manifested in his triumphal entry into the Holy City. He saw beneath the fair exterior of this queenly city now in its holiday attire, the awful sorrow soon to come when the people by thousands should be sold as slaves, and by hundreds should be crucified, and the glory of Judea should be a heap of ruins or a desert waste. What a history of divine love and human sin lay open to his gaze!

A Comparison and Contrast.

It is instructive to compare and contrast these three cases of weeping on the part of Christ. The third instance of our Lord's weeping is recorded in Hebrews 5:7, in the words . . . "With strong crying and tears." The evangelists do not expressly state that he wept in Gethsemane; but we might expect that the agony which caused a bloody sweat would be accompanied by tears. Religion does not make the heart insensible, but rather the more susceptible to sorrow. It is not unmanly to weep. In suffering we often find sweet relief in tears. A "stony grief" which cannot weep is most difficult to endure. The fact that Christ wept should deeply affect our hearts. That man has a stone and not a heart in his bosom who can contemplate without emotion the fact that for him the Son of God wept, bled, and died.

The first were tears of family friendship; the second were tears of patriotic fervor; the last were tears of sacrificial love. The first tears were a rill that flowed for an afflicted family; the second tears were a rivulet, streaming forth for a doomed nation; and the tears, in the third instance, were a mighty river that has swept across humanity for the world's woe. He wept that we might weep. This element of tenderness in Christ gives him resistless power. As we share, in our measure, in his tenderness, we shall share also, in our measure, in his mightiness.

The Golden Day

Robert J. Burdette, in Los Angeles Times.

There are two days in the week upon which and about which I never worry—two care-free days, kept sacredly free from fear and apprehension.

One of these days is Yesterday. Yesterday, with all its cares and frets, with all its pains and aches, all its faults, its mistakes and blunders, has passed forever beyond the reach of my recall. I cannot undo an act that I wrought, I cannot unsay a word that I said on yesterday. All that it holds of my life, of wrong, regret and sorrow, is in the hands of the Mighty Love that can bring honey out of the rock, and sweet waters out of the bitterest desert—the Love that can make the wrong things right, that can turn weeping into laughter, that can give "beauty for ashes, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness," joy of the morning for the woe of the night.

Robert J. Burdette.

Save for the beautiful memories, sweet and tender, which linger like the perfume of roses in the heart of the day that is gone, I have nothing to do with Yesterday. It was mine; it is God's.

And the other day I do not worry about is To-morrow. To-morrow, with all its possible adversities, its burdens, its perils, its large promise and poor performance, its failures and mistakes, is as far beyond the reach of mastery as its dead sister, Yesterday. It is a day of God's. It sun will rise in roseate splendor, or behind a mask of weeping clouds. But it will rise. Until then, the same love and patience that hold Yesterday hold To-morrow. Save for the star of hope that gleams forever on the brow of To-morrow, shining with tender promise into the heart of To-day, I have no possession in that unborn day of grace. All else is in the safe keeping of the Infinite Love that holds for me the treasures of Yesterday—the Love that is higher than the stars, wider than the skies, deeper than the seas. To-morrow—it is God's day. It will be mine.

There is left for myself but one day of the week—To-day. Any man can fight the battles of To-day. Any woman can carry the burdens of just one day. Any man can resist the temptations of To-day. O friends, it is only when to the burdens and cares of To-day, carefully measured out to us by the Infinite Wisdom and Might that gives with them the promise, "As thy day, so shall thy strength be," we willfully add the burdens of those two awful eternities—Yesterday and To-morrow—such burdens as only the Mighty God can sustain—that we break down. It isn't the experience of To-day that drives men mad; it is the remorse for something that happened Yesterday, the dread of what To-morrow may disclose. These are God's days. Leave them with him.

Therefore, I think, and I do, and I journey but one day at a time. That is the easy day. That is the man's day. Nay, rather, that is our day—God's and mine. And while faithfully and dutifully I run my course, and work my appointed task on that day of ours, God the Almighty and the All-loving takes care of Yesterday, and To-morrow.

Try Marshall Hoe-cake

The fickle spotlight of federal popularity as to food shifted today from grape juice and white radishes to hoe-cake and milk. The unfermented beverage and colorless vegetable combination immortalized by William Jennings Bryan, secretary of state, was forced from the stage of publicity by the favorite luncheon combination of Thomas R. Marshall, vice-president of the United States.

For today news came clicking over the wires from Washington that the vice-president has hoe-cake and rich milk and nothing else for his noonday meal 365 times a year. He says, too, that the simple diet is a builder of happiness, and he attributes his day-in-day-out good nature to the virtues of his meager luncheon.

The news furnished inspiration for Chicago experts in the baking line and scores of local ovens turned out a hoe cake that Chicagoans might emulate the vice-president and test the efficacy of his diet. Among the first to set a steaming hoe-cake before her patrons was a popular cook who is in charge of the culinary achievements in the restaurant of a big downtown establishment. She served it piping hot and with it came a pitcher of fine rich milk.

"Mm-m! Swell!" was the ejaculation of surprise from a switchboard girl, who chanced to be the first hungry one to taste the delicacy.

The cook supplied the recipe to one of her more inquisitive patrons. Here is how she makes a double loaf of Vice-President Marshall's favorite hoe-cake:

"Take one quart of sour milk, a quart and a half of corn meal and a pint of white flour. Add a cup of molasses, two small teaspoons of baking soda and two small teaspoons of salt. Mix well and bake for two hours in a slow oven. Serve with rich milk. It's great. No wonder the vice-president likes it. It's a luncheon for a king."—Chicago Tribune.

When He Went Up

A Cleveland clergyman has given to the Plain Dealer of that city this account of infant resourcefulness:

My little daughter was feeling a bit under the weather the other evening, and consequently was put to bed early. She had not been under the covers more than five minutes before she called out:

"Mama, I want to see papa!"

"Go to sleep, dear," answered her mother. "Papa can't see you now."

In a few minutes she called once more:

"Mama, I've got to see papa!"

"I can't disturb your papa now. He is very busy. Go to sleep."

There was a silence for nearly four minutes. Then these words floated down the stairs:

"Mama, I am a very sick woman, and I must see my pastor at once!"

Then I went up.—Youth's Companion.

Prevent the Fly, Scouts!

"Prevent the Fly" will be one of the slogans of the Boy Scouts of America this summer. The boys will go scouting for the fly. Though last year "Swat the fly" was their motto, a plan of campaign has been outlined for them which goes more effectively into the question of eradicating those disease-bearing pests.

Cards bearing the motto "Prevent the Fly" will be sent to the boy scouts. These cards will contain not only the life-history of flies and give a picture of the damage they do, but also will contain specific instructions for the scouts.

First: the scouts will be urged "to swat the fly"; namely to kill the old ones that have lived through the winter time, or are of the first brood of the spring season. Second: they will go scouting for the breeding places for flies, such as stables, pig-stys, garbage cans and the like, for by cleaning up those places they prevent the fly. If the breeding place is a stable, the scout will go to the owner and will endeavor to get him to sign a promise to keep the stable clean. Third: if the scout finds a garbage can that is not being taken care of properly he will report it to the city authorities. Fourth: if he finds breeding places that are not being properly cared for and no available means are provided for cleaning up these places, he and his companion scouts will undertake the work themselves.

The plan is to divide up each city and town into sections and appoint a troop to look after that section. As a troop has several patrols, the section will be sub-divided so that each patrol will have a separate district to cover.

The Worker for the Summer

If your waiter seems a little new and green
  At the summer place you've chosen for the season.
If the porter has a cultivated mien,
  There's a reason, gentle reader, there's a reason.
If you find a stableman is up in Greek
  And the clerk discusses Ibsen with each comer,
Here's the answer to your question ere you speak,
  He's a college student working for the summer.

You will find him on the steamers, scrubbing deck,
  You will see him in the stokehole, where he swelters,
You will find him picking currants by the peck,
  And he labors in the factories and smelters;
He's the canvasser who lingers at your door,
  He's a trolley car conductor and a plumber,
And the extra clerk who serves you at the store
  Is a college student working for the summer.

The iceman—you had best be kind to him,
  For he may be champion strong man of his college.
And the girl you hire to keep the house in trim
  May be Vassar's very pride and full of knowledge.
There is nothing that a student won't essay;
  He's a willing little toiler and a hummer;
You will find him near at home or far-away,
  The college student working for the summer.—Exchange.

SENATOR GORE'S STORY.

Senator Thomas P. Gore, of Oklahoma, recently told the following story:

A prisoner was brought before the bar in the criminal court, but was not represented by a lawyer.

"Where is your lawyer?" asked the judge who presided.

"I have none, sir," replied the prisoner.

"Why not?" queried the judge.

"Because I have no money to pay one."

"Do you want a lawyer?" asked the judge.

"Yes, sir."

"Well, there are Mr. Thomas W. Wilson, Mr. Henry Eddy, and Mr. George Rogers," said the judge, pointing to several young attorneys who were sitting in the room, waiting for something to turn up, "and Mr. Allen is out in the hall."

The prisoner looked at the attorneys and after a critical survey, he turned to the judge and said:

"If I can take my choice, sir, I guess I'll take Mr. Allen."—Lippincott's.

OUR NEW SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

A man rather below the average size, sturdily built, with deeply lined, weather-beaten face, like that of a Maine skipper, Josephus Daniels would attract attention anywhere. Especially on Broadway, for he does not dress as Mrs. Grundy prescribes. In summer he wears white crash clothes. In winter his round, soft black disdains all changes in styles. Usually he wears a black string tie in a low collar. These are but the frame of the picture. The face, with deep-set, dark eyes, surmounted by black hair, is that of a personality. Until it breaks up into a hundred winsome wrinkles, his countenance seems stern. But even the children of Raleigh know better. They called him by name as we walked the streets. The familiar, genial greeting of men and women also marked him as a friendly man, a good neighbor. One pictures the dismay of the gentlemen with the gold lace in the navy department at Washington as "the folks" from North Carolina "stop by" to see "our Mr. Daniels," the man whose word now moves the sailors and battleships. If the present administration is asked to point to any one man who more than another visualizes American democracy, it may indicate either the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of State.—Exchange.

THOMAS W. LAWSON TELLS STORY.

Thomas W. Lawson, the Boston financier, said the other day of a scandalous financial deal:

"Those people traded on popular ignorance. They were like Calhoun Clay, who opened a bank in Nola Chucky.

"All the colored people around Nola Chucky deposited their savings in Calhoun's bank, and Cal soon began to wear, instead of cowhide boots and jeans, patent leathers and broadcloth.

"Then, one day, Wash White called at the bank and said:

"'I'd like for to draw out my money, sah."

"'Your money?' said the banker, lighting a 10 cent cigar.

"'Yes, sad, my $10.'

"'Your $10?'

"'Yes, sah, my money.'

"'Why, man alive!' shouted Banker Calhoun Clay, angrily, 'don't you know the interest done et that up three months ago!'"—Chicago News.

ONE ON OLLIE JAMES.

Physically speaking, Ollie James, the senator from Kentucky, weighs close to 300 pounds, and in a political sense he tips the scales at 1,500 tons. His last achievement was to give Luther Burbank, the plant wizard, a new and difficult job.

Last summer James toured California, and one day he lunched with Burbank, who seemed intensely interested in the vast amount of food the big Kentuckian stowed away and his manner of doing the stowing. Immediately after the lunch the scientist made a quick dash back to his experimental station.

"Why are you in such a hurry, Luther?" asked one of the party.

"I want to rush back," he responded seriously, "and see if I can't propagate a square shaped pea that won't roll off Ollie's knife."—The Popular Magazine.

MORE TAFT PHILOSOPHY.

Ex-President Taft concluded one of his Yale lectures in the late spring with a wise word on the subject of vacations.

"A lean, dyspeptic judge," he said, "once remarked to me with a groan on a hot July day:

"'Vacation time again! Vacations are a nuisance. I can't understand how it is that, no matter where they go, some people always have a good time on their vacations.'

"'That's easy to explain, judge,' said I. 'They take the good time along with them.'"

PUTTING GRANDMA RIGHT.

Dean C. Worcester, secretary of the Philippine commission, smiled gleefully the other afternoon when he heard several of the brethren boastfully telling each other who ruled the domestic roost. He was reminded, he said, of the keen perception of little Willie.

One day, according to the story told by Mr. Worcester, Willie's grandmother, who lived a thousand miles in the beautiful distance, came for an extended visit. It was the first time that Willie had ever seen her, and naturally his examination of the elderly one was long and critical.

"And so you are honestly and truly my grandmother," finally remarked the youngster, going closer to the visitor.

"Yes, my dear," was the fond rejoinder of the old lady, "on your father's side."

"Well, that's where you're in bad to begin with," was the startling response of Willie, "you're on the wrong side."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

VINDICATING JOHN D.

"Old John D. is a maligned man," a broker said on a roof garden. He stirred a pop bottle vigorously in its bucket of ice, took a long puff at his regalia, sighed up sentimentally at the moon and resumed:

"John D., as I was saying, is maligned. He never gave out those precepts of miserliness we are always hearing. Old Uncle Russell—Uncle Russell Sage—gave them out. John D. has always advised a reasonably high scale of living. He's been maligned. And he feels it, too.

"He talked about it the last time I golfed with him at Pocantico Hills.

"'Why,' he said, 'I'm no Russell Sage. As we journey through life let us live by the way—that's my policy. Down with those people who are so intent on putting something by for a rainy day that they never get any enjoyment out of pleasant weather!'"—New York Sun.

A BILL NYE STORY.

A tale told about Congressman Smith is his interview with Bill Nye. The city editor told him to get a column or two of funny stuff. Smith went to each member of the staff of the paper and asked them to write about 200 words each of what they thought Bill Nye might say. He lined up the result, had the matter set up and went for Mr. Nye.

"Here is the proof of my interview with you, Mr. Nye," he said. "I want to submit it to you before using, for fear some inaccuracy might have crept in."

Mr. Smith began to get nervous before the now solemn Mr. Nye had finished his careful perusal of the proof slip. Maybe his scheme hadn't worked!

Turning to him finally, Mr. Nye said:

"My boy, I've been interviewed many hundreds of times, but I must say that this is the first time I've ever been quoted correctly."—Chicago News.

BISHOP DOANE ON "CAPTAIN SCRAGGS."

The late Bishop Doane, in a Fourth of July address in Albany, once urged his hearers to fight against socialism as their own ancestors had fought against the British.

"Put up a good stiff fight," said the bishop, "and the pluck of these miserable Socialists will be no better than that of Captain Scraggs.

"Captain Scraggs saw active service once. The engagement was pretty stiff. In fact, it looked hopeless to the captain. However, he said cheerily to his men:

"'My brave fellows, fight like heroes till your ammunition's gone, then run for your lives. I've got a sore foot, so I'll start now. Au revoir, my hearties.'"—Daily Magazine.

DEAN STANLEY'S SIMPLICITY.

Andrew Lang once told this charming story of Dean Stanley's amiable simplicity. He was dining out and arrived late, with his collar unfastened and the ends vibrating like little white wings about the head of a cherub. The dinner was progressing when his hostess ventured to ask if he knew that his collar had broken adrift. "Oh, yes!" said the dean; "do you mind?" "Not at all," said the lady. "Then I don't mind, either," answered the dean; "the button dropped off while I was dressing." And he continued his conversation.—Congregationalist.

BEECHER ON BIG AND LITTLE HEADS.

My father was once defending a man who was accused of egotism, and his defense was this. If a man has the "big head," you can whittle it down; but, if he has the "little head," there is no hope for him. Egotism is offensive, but the very fact that it is offensive makes it less calamitous to the man who has it; the fact that it is offensive makes all his friends willing to help him reduce the swelling of his head. But if a man has the "little head," how are you going to help him?—C. E. World.

GARFIELD ON SELF-RELIANCE.

"Poverty is uncomfortable, as I can testify; but nine times out of ten the best thing that can happen to a young man is to be tossed overboard, and compelled to sink or swim for himself."

Missouri Minister Mourns Country Churches.

In "The Country Parson," monthly messenger published by Nelson H. Trimble at Columbia, Mo., Mr. Trimble puts the paper in mourning and offers the following concerning conditions in country churches: "Within the last ten years over 700 country churches have died in Missouri. Grant K. Lewis told me, and he's a walking encyclopedia and knows. We have put the paper in mourning for this appalling list of dead What does it mean when churches disappear like this? Many things, but especially that the country community is changing and the church is not adjusting itself to the new conditions. It will not be sufficient reason for you to dismiss this statement if the church you work with is in strong circumstances now. There is a tomorrow. Perhaps the causes that killed the other churches may be at work under the surface in yours today!"

P. J Rice Pleases Mexicans.

On a recent Sunday, P. J. Rice, pastor at El Paso, Tex., preached a sermon on "The What and How of Peace in Mexico," in which he closed as follows: "I am praying for the peace of justice, of equal rights, of patient dealing with ignorance and superstition, of enlightenment. And if we will have patience that will result in Mexico. We cannot force it on them. We cannot shoot it into them. Armed intervention is not needed. Nor is intimidation by warnings from the powers. Mexico represents a civilization a hundred years behind our own. Remember only a hundred years of our own history and learn to be patient. Perhaps we may be able to help make it by keeping hands off. A stronger and more statesmanlike diplomatic representation is greatly to be desired. Every expression of friendship and good will is eminently to the point, but patience and forbearance with ministries of enlightenment are of paramount importance." On the Sunday following seven representative Mexicans met Mr. Rice by appointment and delivered their congratulations and expressions of appreciation in a characteristic and formal manner. They also presented to him a letter in Spanish which began as follows: "With true satisfaction we read the discourse pronounced by you last Sunday night in the First Christian Church of this city, expounding the following subject: "The What and the How of Peace in Mexico." Permit us, Sir, to congratulate you in the most cordial and respectful manner because in the midst of the great number of material interests which are being agitated in regard to our country, crying for peace without taking into consideration for one moment either the dignity or future of the noble Mexican people, you, with a height of view and independence of character which is rare to find in the present time, have placed yourself on the side of justice, not directing to your people any but words of truth."

Z. T. Sweeney Visits Lloyd George.

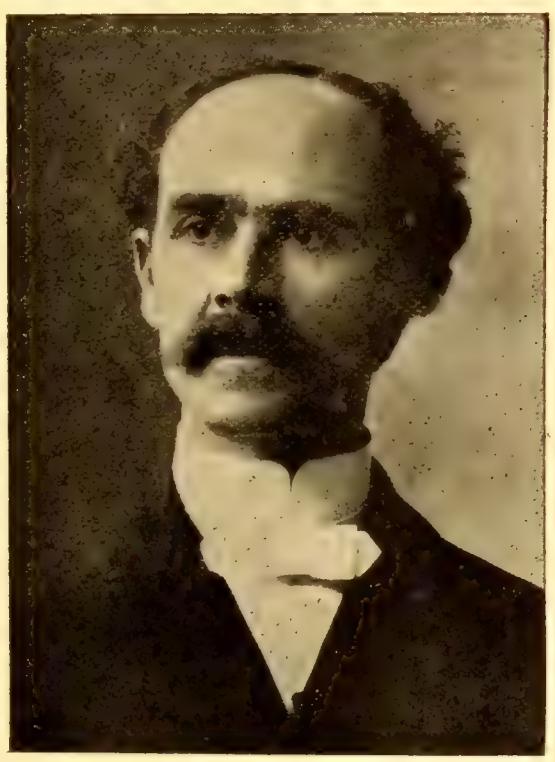
Z. T. Sweeney writes from Windermere, Ontario: On April 23 I left the United States being an invitation from the A. C. M. S. to Hon. Richard Lloyd George to attend our next general convention at Toronto. On May 1 I called at the House of Parliament and after considerable circumlocution and the exercise of some diplomacy I obtained an audience with the chancellor. He is a modish and unassuming gentleman, but bears in every movement the evidences of the force and power that make him today the highest embodiment of Christian civilization on the earth. A month later I worshiped with the church in Criccieth, where he holds his membership. He was present with his family and was a very attentive and appreciative listener. I was entertained at Criccieth in the home of his brother—the chamberlain—William Lloyd George. I was also invited by the chancellor to be his guest in his town house at London, but unfortunately was unable to return to London again. He took the invitation of the A. C. M. S. under advisement and I am greatly in hopes he will give it a favorable answer unless the sitting of parliament interferes. If he does we should greet him at Toronto with not less than twenty-five thousand of his brethren from 'this side.'"

University Offers Ministers' Course.

Indicative of the interest that is being taken in the problems of the country, is the course being offered during the summer at the University of Missouri, located at Columbia—A "Ministers' Short Course in Country Problems." The course is strictly non-denominational. Its aim is to give everybody interested in religious work in rural districts an opportunity to study the problems which confront them under the direction of men of widest sympathy and interest in rural conditions. Among the studies offered are the following: Rural Society and the Country Church; Rural Sociology; Rural Economics; Fruit Growing; Principles of Crop Production. Alva W. Taylor has charge of the work in Rural Sociology, July 22—August 7 is the date of the course for ministers.

Christian Union at Franklin, Ind.

"We have been preaching Christian union for years; it is time we were taking some practical steps toward cultivating the spirit of union," declared Judge H. C. Barnett in the Tabernacle Christian Church at Franklin a week ago. He then proposed that the entire congregation go across the street to the Presbyterian Church and worship as an evidence of good will and Christian brotherhood. All of the 250 members of the congregation fell in with the plan and, headed by the pastor, Rev. William J. Wright, crossed to the other church. They were given a hearty welcome. The two congregations joined in singing "Blest Be the Tie That Binds Our Hearts in Christian Love," and the Presbyterian pastor, Rev. W. B. Tyler, insisted on the Tabernacle pastor assisting in the service. Both congregations were so well pleased with the plan that several of the leaders said similar visits to other churches would follow.



I. McCash, Resigning A. C. M. S. Secretary.

The Annual County meeting of the Christian Churches of Tipton county, Indiana, embracing within its fellowship the congregations at Windfall, Nevada, Curtisville, Hobbs, New Lancaster, Union Chapel, East Union, Normanda, Kempton, Independence and Tipton, will be held in Carr's Grove near Hobbs station on the Union Traction line the first Sunday in August. All cars will stop at the grove. W. H. Book, pastor of the Tabernacle Church, Columbus, Indiana, will be the preacher for the day. A most cordial invitation to this meeting is extended to all by G. I. Hoover, Chm. Com. on Publicity, representing the participating churches.

E. D. Salkeld, of Chicago Heights, reports a Children's Day offering of $200, and an attendance of over 500 at the Sunday-school, on Flag Day. The school on this occasion was presented with an American flag by ex-Mayor Stolte. Mr. Salkeld and family left July 21 for a vacation cruise on The Great Lakes, and visiting in Ohio and Pennsylvania. Mr. Salkeld reports "Chicago Heights Day," observed July 19, on which day the church was represented by several floats and a number of automobiles in the civic parade, which is a feature of this annual celebration.

C. G. Baker reports that he will close his work at Douglas Park, Chicago, October 1, and expects to take further training for social service work. He reports the church in normal condition, with an average Sunday-school attendance of 157, church attendance of about 75. Twenty persons have been added to the membership since the last of March.

C. R. Scoville, who recently closed the Pleasantville, Ia., meeting, with 281 accessions, is in Chicago, taking care of a broken right leg and arm. A ball game with the merchants of Pleasantville and an automobile crank are responsible for the injuries.

Canton, Ohio, P. H. Welshimer, pastor, has picked Indianapolis as a good rival in a Sunday-school contest for the nine Sundays of July and August. The Indianapolis schools have a combined average attendance of about 3,000.

On the last day of August, B. B. Tyler will surrender the pastorate of South Broadway Church, Denver, to D. Y. Donaldson, of Kansas City, Mo. Dr. Tyler will thus conclude fifty-two years of service in the Christian ministry.

I. McCash has tendered his resignation as Secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, owing to the uncongenial climate of Cincinnati and the opportunity to serve an educational institution.

At the Camden Point, Mo., Retreat, last week, G. A. Campbell, of Hannibal, was chief speaker. Taking for his theme "The Challenge of the Age to the Church," he spoke four successive mornings.

F. W. Burnham, of Springfield, Ill., will tour Palestine in early spring, 1914. Finis Idleman, of Des Moines, C M. Chilton, of St. Joseph, Mo., and Grant Speer, of Toledo, will also be in the party.

First Church, Bloomington, E. D. Jones, minister, raised $3,500 July 13 to finance the addition of another story to the Sunday-school department.

In the six months of the work of Walter B. Zimmerman, minister at Pleasantville, Ia., there have been 240 persons added to the church membership.

As a feature of the membership contest in the Muncie, Ind., schools, moving pictures were made of the assembled school on a recent Sunday.

Lake Geneva Conference on Missionary Education

Lake Geneva, Wis., August 1-10.

The Lake Geneva Conference promises to be one of the most stimulating and helpful that has ever been held under the direction of the Missionary Education Movement in the central west. The character of this conference, in assembling leaders from many denominations, makes the atmosphere unique.

The program is almost complete, having among its speakers and leaders, ministers, laymen, missionaries, teachers, and other experts in missionary education.

The registrations are coming in rapidly, and already more are enrolled at this time than in any previous year the same number of weeks before the opening date.

It would be difficult to discover a more congenial place to spend ten days. The beauty of the surroundings, the purity of the water, and the opportunity offered for rest and recreation are unrivaled. The conference grounds are in the midst of heavy timber, and the water attractions—fishing, sailing, rowing and bathing—cannot be excelled.

The grounds are under the expert management of the Institute and Training School of the Y. M. C. A., which insure first class accommodations. Every reasonable comfort will be provided to make the surroundings wholesome. Accommodations are offered in tents, and a few cottages are available for those who prefer entertainment at a higher cost.

The Rev. J. M. Stifler, of Evanston, Ill., will preside, and Rev. Morris W. Ehnes, Editorial Secretary of Missionary Education Movement will be Executive Secretary of the conference. Among those who will appear on the platform are, Mr. L. Pern Moore, of Chicago; the Rev. Lynn H. Hough, Baltimore; the Rev. John M. Moore, Boston; the Rev. Henry A. Atkinson, Chicago; the Rev. V. P. Backora, Gary; Mr. C. V. Vickrey, New York; Mrs. Laura De Lany Garst, Japan; the Rev. David S. Tappan, Jr., China; the Rev. Elmer L. Williams, Chicago; the Rev. L. B. Rogers, Burma; the Rev. J. R. Denyea, Java.

As in previous years, adult mission study will be given a prominent place. Classes in both subject-matter and normal training will be available.

Missionary education in the Sunday-school is occupying a more prominent place than ever before, as the missionary training of the young is one of the most hopeful fields of activity; Mr. R. E. Diffendorfer, secretary of the Sunday-school Department of the Missionary Education Movement, New York, will be in charge of this section.

The open Parliaments under the direction of the Rev. George F. Sutherland, secretary, Missionary Education Department, Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, will occupy the last hour of each forenoon. Methods for missionary education in the local church will be fully discussed, and all of the delegates are invited to participate in these sessions. Mr. Sutherland will be assisted by the Rev. Lynn H. Hough, Miss Susan Mendenhall, Mr. R. E. Diffendorfer, Mr. C. V. Vickrey and others.

Persons connected with any Protestant denomination are invited to enroll. The registration fee is $5.00.

The Conference opens on Friday evening, August 1, and closes Sunday evening, August 10.

Send application to Stephen J. Corey, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio, Robt. M. Hopkins, 108 Carew Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, or to the Missionary Education Movement, Room 705, 19 South LaSalle Street, Chicago, Illinois.

The Church Extension Offering Approaches

Every congregation that is interested in the work that the Board of Church Extension is doing will prepare well for the offering beginning the first Sunday in September. The preachers of these churches will not be satisfied with a "hat collection," because an offering carelessly taken would not express their appreciation of the great task before the Church Extension Board. A great offering comes only by wise education.

On July 1 a Wall Chart was mailed to every preacher and a card was enclosed for ordering supplies. The orders are coming in rapidly which is very gratifying to the Board. These orders are an index of what the offering will be. We suggest that, if you do not want supplies, you write on the post card a promise to take the offering and give us that encouraging word.

A Good Start.

The first nine months of the year show a gain in receipts of $13,614.31 from churches and individuals. There is a falling off of $1,018.03 from the churches but a gain of $14,632.34 from individuals. The total receipts to July 1 are $59,392.44. If we can keep up our gains during the next three months the new receipts for Church Extension will be over $100,000 this year. That would be a great victory for the first year on raising the Second Million for Church Extension as recommended by the Louisville convention.

Many Applications for Loans.

A growing Brotherhood requires a growing Church Extension Fund. Forty percent of our new organizations require help to build their first new church. A little help in a small town does the work. It requires a large loan in a city. Over $30,000 of requests were laid aside or refused at our July meeting, because of no funds. Only a few small loans were granted: Grandview, Wash., $750; Beloit, Wis., $750; Robertsdale, Ala., $500; Como, Texas, $400. These were granted from small balances in our Name Funds.

We earnestly beseech the brethren to enlist for a great offering. Both secretaries are out among the churches.

G. W. MUCKLEY,
Corresponding Secretary.

A Quick Observer.

When Judge Hicks of Minneapolis was in London, he asked the way of a policeman. "You're from America," said the latter, positively. "You can't 'ide the haccent."

International Convention

(Toronto, Sept. 30-Oct. 6.)

Our next big convention will be for the first time in its history truly international. Never before have its sessions been held off the soil of the United States. This year upon British soil and under the friendly folds of "Old Glory" and the "Union Jack" American Disciples will meet to view their record and plan for the future.

Our preparations are going steadily on. Massey Hall, a magnificent and beautiful structure, centrally located, will be the place of meeting. Near by, the Metropolitan Methodist Church, one of the most important church buildings in Canada, will be available likely for overflow and other meetings. Summer excursion rates will prevail; hotel accommodation will be good; abundant accommodation may be had reasonably in choice homes. (This is a feature of Toronto as a convention city.) Full announcement of rates later. If you think of coming write Rev. C. O. Reynard, 16 Harbord St., Chairman of Committee on Entertainment. Address the General Secretary, Prof. H. F. Dawes, 600 Manning Ave., for information of any other kind.

At a recent joint meeting of the local committee and international secretaries, it was decided to cut the registration fee to 50 cents. This important reduction ought to insure a big attendance. Decide early.

ARE YOU THINKING OF GOING TO SCHOOL?
Try a Bible College in combination with a great State University. Together we have an equipment worth $3,750,000, and an annual income of $760,000. Do you realize what that means? It insures both equipment and talent. The quantity and quality of work is not surpassed. It is seldom equalled. Over 260 teachers are at your service. Salaries are paid which command the best talent. Yet, tuition is nothing for Missourians, and is only $20 per year for students from elsewhere.
Moreover, the spiritual atmosphere both in schools and in town is of the best. A deep religious spirit results each year in students dedicating themselves to the ministry or to the work of foreign missions.

American Missions

This has been a good year in our Home Missionary enterprise. Specifically marked has been the progress made by the State societies in affiliation with the American Christian Missionary Society. The conventions which have been held this spring and summer—north, south, east and west—have all indicated prosperity in the work. The early fall conventions will soon be setting in. As far as we have them they are:

Nebraska, August 11-17, Hastings.
Wisconsin, September 4-7, Ladysmith.
Illinois, September 8-11, Jacksonville.
Virginia, September 8-11, Lynchburg (Col-

Drake University

The most essential form of development in Drake University in the last ten years, cannot be set down in figures. It consists mainly in the increase of standards and of a constant advance in ideals.

Ten years ago the buildings and grounds of Drake University were valued at $112,000.00. Today the value of buildings and grounds is conservatively estimated at $400,000.00. In June, 1903, the equipment was valued at $39,000.00, in June, 1913, at $175,000.00. The net resources of the institution in 1903 amounted to $356,000.00; in 1913 to $1,250,000.00. The endowment, productive and unproductive, in 1903 amounted to $242,000.00, with an income of $10,800.00; in 1913 the endowment, productive and unproductive, amounted to $785,000.00 with an income of $47,000.00. The tuition for the year ending in June, 1903, amounted to $47,000.00; in 1913 the tuition amounted to $131,000.00. The total income available for current expenses in 1903 was $66,500.00; in 1913 it was more than $203,000.00.

The constant growth in equipment and income has enabled the authorities to strengthen the faculty and add to the equipment, making possible the constant advancement of standards, so that, at the present time, every college and department of Drake University is ranked with the highest and best in this country. Kendric C. Babcock, specialist in higher education in the Bureau of Education, Washington, D. C., places Drake University in the highest class of colleges in this country.

The attendance in the College of Liberal Arts in 1903 was 276; in 1913, 742. In the Law College in 1903 the attendance was 65; in 1913, 102. In the Institute of Fne Arts, including the Conservatory of Music, the attendance in 1903 was 311; in 1913 it was 527. The faculty of the College of Liberal Arts was increased from 21 in 1903 to 50 in 1913.

Next year, in order better to serve the purpose for which the institution was established, every student entering the freshman class will be required to take a two-hour course in the Bible, and each student during his Junior or Senior year will be required to add another two-hour course.

The work of the College of the Bible is on a higher plane today than ever before and is better patronized by a higher grade of students than during any previous time in its history. One hundred and twenty-one ministerial students were enrolled last year. The institution is preparing to receive 300 ministerial students this next fall. The work of the Department of Religious Education has been of the greatest importance. This department is recognized as the leading school in this country for training Sunday-school teachers and other Christian workers.

Twelve hundred and thirty-thre ministerial students have been enrolled in Drake University since it was established in 1881. Of these more than forty have gone to foreign fields as missionaries.

At the last commencement 254 students were graduated from the various departments. Of these, eighty-four were from the College of Liberal Arts and eighteen from the College of the Bible.

A. C. M. S. REPORT

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT OF RECEIPTS OF THE AMERICAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY FOR THE FIRST NINE MONTHS OF OUR MISSIONARY YEAR.

	1912	1913	Gain.
Offerings from Churches	$ 56,197.80	$ 44,618.64	$11,579.16
Offerings from Sunday-schools	27,527.22	34,284.58	6,757.36
Offerings from C. E. Societies	242.10	337.30	95.20
Offerings from L. A. Societies	310.70	338.75	28.05
Offerings from Individuals	5,720.50	11,037.26	5,316.76
Annuities	10,701.18	3,200.00	7,501.18
Bequests	2,761.09	9,541.21	6,780.12
Moninger Memorial	5,111.94	10,754.66	5,642.72
Receipts from other sources	15,011.60	21,260.91	6,249.31
	$123,584.13	$135,373.31	$11,789.18

We would call attention to the splendid increase in total receipts for the year—more than $11,000. The Sunday-school receipts were $6,700 ahead of the same period last year and the offerings from individuals more than $5,600 ahead. There is a loss in annuities, but we are hopeful of hearing from other friends of the cause of home missions, with goodly sums, ere our books close.

It is with regret we report a loss in church offerings, especially at the close of June, the second month of offerings for home missions. We believe, however, that the apparent loss is due to the fact of many of our stronger churches having adopted the budget system or duplex plan of giving. These churches will remit later in the year. Many of our strong, loyal churches have not been heard from in a substantial way, but through correspondence we have the assurance that they will respond before September 30th. We rejoice to learn that out of 983 churches contributing during the past few months 250 have sent increased amounts and 357 churches that had no part in the offering last year have sent fine offerings this year. This is one of the encouraging features.

We are confident that our ministers and the entire brotherhood are just as anxious as the secretaries and the board of trustees to have the offerings this year for American missions surpass those of any previous year. We all want to go up to Toronto reporting not a cent less than $200,000 for home missions.

We urge all church treasurers everywhere to remit the amount now in their treasuries to the credit of the American Christian Missionary Society, then send the balance later.

We would especially ask our budget churches to send remittances before the summer slump is on.

Make all checks payable to the American Christian Missionary Society and send to 108 Carew Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Drake University--A School of Ideals

Liberal Arts—Bible—Law—Education
Music—Dramatic Art—Painting and Drawing
Home Economics—Physical Education

Memorial Hall—College of the Bible.

Drake University is an institution of higher learning devoted to the best in education. It believes in cultivating the religious nature in man as well as the intellectual and physical. It is standard in every department, and is so recognized by every standardizing agency in this country. No short courses leading nowhere are offered. The faculty is composed of thoroughly trained Christian men and women, who, because of their attainments, command the respect of educators everywhere. The equipment in every department is adequate. No matter how valuable your time, you can afford to spend it in Drake University. It is a school that gives value received. There is no pretense—no exaggeration.

The College of the Bible meets the approval of the Disciples of Christ. It is true to the principles of the fathers of the religious movement we would further. This college is sending out an educated ministry to bless the churches. The department of Religious Education is one of the greatest training schools for Sunday-school and other religious workers to be found in this country. The rural church problem receives attention here.

We want Two Hundred new ministerial students to enter next September. We will assist each one in many ways. Scholarships, loan funds, and opportunities that the student appreciates will be available so that he may remain in the college until he is thoroughly prepared for his world task. Last year nearly 1,600 students attended Drake University. This number included 121 ministerial students. We ask 300 to come next year.

The College of Liberal Arts is superior in every respect. Seven hundred and forty-two enrolled last year in this department.

The College of Law enrolls more than One Hundred each year, and is as well situated as any in the country.

The Conservatory of Music is acknowledged to be the peer of any in this country. The teachers are artists of national reputation. Enrollment last year, Five Hundred Twenty-six.

Write for catalogues and particulars concerning any of the departments herein enumerated.

CHICAGO

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture. In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member. A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and is entitled to one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote. Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued. Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current. The meetings of the Society are held annually. The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings. The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated. The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ. The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meetings full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society. Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointedby churches and Sunday-schools. The plan of organization thus puts the enterprise completely in the control of the people. It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it. It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools. It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house. In a word, the Disciples Publication Society is a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually barred. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God. It is worthy the support of all Christian people.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

A Communication and a Statement

The text for the following statement will be found in a communication printed on page 6 of this issue, sent by Rev. Graham Frank, of Liberty, Mo. We ask our readers to turn to that page before reading the editorial.

A personal letter accompanying Mr. Frank's communication assures the editors of The Christian Century that the author holds this paper "by far the least culpable of the three" national organs of the Disciples. We do not resent being mentioned vicariously in his indictment if thus the deplorable situation may be called to the attention of the churches. It is possible that this paper may have failed at times to live up to its ideal, but it certainly has always been our purpose to be not only less culpable than others but to be not guilty at all of the coarse methods to which Mr. Frank refers. We believe that a Christian newspaper ought to show the Christian spirit, ought to be like Christ, just as a Christian man ought to be like Christ. And we could not condone in The Christian Century any slightest degree of the commercially motived wrangling and mutual denunciation, in which Disciple journalism has for many years been involved, to the great discredit of our people in the eyes of the Christian world. We have no time nor inclination for journalistic backbiting. And it is becoming clearer daily that intelligent and earnest Disciples of Christ have no stomach for it, either.

The letter of Mr. Frank is typical of a widespread feeling and gives us occasion to state concisely what our attitude is toward the present unseemly situation. The situation is, in brief, as follows:

One newspaper assumes for itself and its publishing house a superior position because its "profits" are applied to missionary societies, and contends that churches and Sunday schools ought not patronize its rival house because the profits of its rival "go to enrich individuals." It urges its claims for patronage in terms that presume to test one's "loyalty to the brotherhood." An annual "dividend" amounting to the petty sum of $10,000 is thinned out into quarterly installments and further subdivided amongst a half dozen societies so as to furnish occasion and reading matter for the repeated exploitation of its generosity.

Stung by this offensive and arrogant procedure the other newspaper retorts that its own gifts to missionary interests far exceed the "dividend" of its rival house and it charges its rival with heading a conspiracy to control the affairs of the brotherhood for its own commercial interest and in the interest of its clique of directors.

We wish our readers to know that The Christian Century will not be drawn into this back-door quarrel. We deplore it as not only reflecting upon the cause of Christ, but discrediting to Christian journalism. Our own paper and every Christian journal loses by such unseemly strife.

It is not infrequent that this office receives new subscriptions accompanied by the information that the subscriber has wearied of what he calls the unseemly "scrap" between rival papers and publishers and wishes to read a religious paper that aims more at helping the religious life than at making money. But the number of such subscribers is small compared with those who might be prevailed upon to read The Christian Century, but who have become disgusted with all so-called religious journalism and its backbiting.

In this connection we wish to say on behalf of the Disciples Publication Society that, although its property is owned and directly controlled by the churches of the brotherhood, and its profits appropriated to the work of the brotherhood, we regard this feature of our organization as quite incidental.

The Society does not intend to parade it as a virtue.

It is no sufficient reason why the churches and Sunday schools should patronize this house rather than any other. The organizers and co-workers in the Disciples Publication Society regard the brotherhood ownership of the enterprise with satisfaction as furnishing a basis for rendering unselfish service, but they do not propose to exploit it as a motive for patronage. If the Sunday schools like the goods produced by any other concern we do not assume to say that there is any reason whatsoever why they should not patronize that other concern.

The Disciples Publication Society will do all in its power, within the limits of courtesy and self respecting business ethics, to get the churches and Sunday schools to like and to buy the goods it produces, but it emphatically disavows any intention of building up its business by attempting to tear down another's business.

* * *

If there is anything Mr. Frank or any body of the brethren can do to put a stop to the continuous spectacle we have been witnessing for a number of years The Christian Century will be grateful, for no Christian newspaper "lives to itself," any more than Christian brethren live to themselves, but when one journal brings discredit upon itself it brings discredit upon the whole craft.

The Value of Meditation

"It is not the number of books you read, nor the variety of sermons you hear, nor the amount of religious conversation in which you mix, but it is the frequency and earnestness with which you meditate on these things till the truth in them becomes your own and part of your being, that insures your growth."—F. W. Robertson.

Meditation is difficult. Those who think it is easy mistake idle dreaming for meditation. When we meditate, we face the facts. If we have played the fool, we let that fact stand out in the open. We try to get its meaning. If we are weak and selfish, we do not cover up our blemishes. An impartial examination of experience is essential to profitable reflection on the life we are living.

Meditation is an attempt to bring order and consistency into conduct. We cannot give prolonged and serious attention to what we have done and to the outcome of our conduct unless we have some notion of what a life ought to be. Having this notion, we are able to determine whether we have always made it central in thought and action. By means of it we can judge of what is small and what is great. If we have been faithful to our ideals and yet are dissatisfied with life, we may have to criticise the ideal we have been following. We may be wrong in our fundamental principles. There may be need of rebuilding from the ground up.

Independence is impossible without meditation. The book agent knows that if you ask time to reflect on his offer the chances are against his making a sale to you. His success comes when you forget that you owe the grocer and butcher and that you need other books more than the one he is trying to sell. You will buy his book if he can keep your attention fixed upon its merits as he describes them. The merchant makes his windows so attractive that many of us buy what we do not need before we know what has happened to us. The persuasive preacher wins our approval on Sunday and on Monday the lure of business or pleasure causes us to drop all thought of righteousness and temperance and the judgment to come. We are helpless unless we are able to make the sensation of the moment serve life instead of letting it be the whole of life.

Enforced leisure is often profitable because it compels us to think. We have the feeling that we are doing something worth while in church and in state when a careful observer is aware that we are running around a circle. We ought to be the careful observers of what we do. Sickness, defeat, or something else we set down as a misfortune may be our opportunity to take an inventory and learn whether we are gaining or losing. We probably spend twice as much time at our tasks as we ought to spend because we have not stopped long enough to discover the most economical way of doing our work. If for any reason we are alone and unoccupied, we can, if we have learned how to think, find plenty to do.

When we meditate, we bring before the mind the problems of every day. We look ahead and try to see what is coming. The farmer who does his duty to himself and his country is thinking of the methods of farming that will be employed in the near future. He finds out what is being done by other farmers, what are the probable demands upon the farms of the nation, what new crops are possible, what improvements can be made in old crops, and what treatment the soil must receive that it may retain its fertility. The farmer who contributes something to the thought and practice of farming, does not have to rush off to town as soon as his work is done in order to find amusement. He does not buy his ideas ready made from his agricultural paper or the state university, although he accepts the help of both and values them highly. He looks at the facts and he asks what they mean for him and for other farmers.

Is there not some danger that the church will be weakened through our anxiety to be modern and up with the times? We have fallen into the habit of listening to the voice of professional prophets and we have too little respect for our own thought. The church is imperfect. It should be improved. But the outward changes that come must represent profound convictions. Convictions such as have made the church mighty in the past and will support it in the future grow in the hearts of men who weigh the issues of life. Faith that depends for its strength upon the approving shout of the mob is too feeble to build the church this world needs. The church that conquers is composed of persons who know what they believe and why they believe it. These persons think. [Midweek Service, Aug. 6. Phil. 4:8; Ps. 1:2; Lu. 15:16-24; Prov. 23:7; I Tim. 4:15; Prov. 4:20-23.] S. J.

In Explanation

During the past few months the task of organizing the Disciples Publication Society and securing capital with which to finance it has, in the main, fallen to the lot of the editors of The Christian Century. With the foundation work of the Society now approaching completion, it is expected that Mr. Morrison and Dr. Willett will resume direct editorial charge after September 1, with an enlarged paper and greatly enriched pages.

Prophets

The prophets of the Old Testament and the moral leadership of today, whether in the ministry or without it, have essentially the same task. It is theirs to interpret the universe in terms of God. To translate current events and relate them to the whole sweep of the divine movement of human history is a task given not only to an Amos or an Isaiah but to scores and hundreds of obscurer men—in the twentieth century after as well as in the eighth century before Christ—who perform for a smaller circle of people what has been done by the greater men for the multitudes. Many a minister toiling away in an obscure corner, except for an occasional mention in a local or denominational paper absolutely unknown, is buoyed up by reminding himself every now and then of the essential greatness of the prophet's work. Of that noble company of men, who have lifted up truth's torch in every age making little circles of light wavering against the surrounding pall of ignorance and superstition, he is a successor. What matters it, then, if at times his work leads him up against an impassable wall? What matters it if now the clouds shut in on all sides and not even a single gleam relieves the darkness? What matters it if only the few understand, and the crowd laughs to scorn the message as impractical and visionary while it rushes on heedless of God, and greedy for gold? The prophet of today is not alone. Bearing witness with him is the long line of the noble company of prophets and apostles who in every age have been privileged to be bearers of God's message to men.

Dividing Up Sky and Slums

We have become accustomed to the idea of the partition of China among the powers, an event now altogether improbable, but the idea of partitioning the heavens is a novel one. Scattered throughout the world are about a dozen solar observatories, each of which has been making independent observations of every phase of solar activity. The establishment of a solar physics observatory in New Zealand through a donation of $60,000 from Thomas Cawthorn, of Nelson, New Zealand, now completes the mission of linking solar observation throughout the world begun five years ago by Miss Mary Proctor, daughter of the late Richard A. Proctor, the great English astronomer. Universal solar observation will restrict each observatory to a particular phase of research. For example, one observatory will be allotted the task of observing phenomena attendant on sun spots, while another will study protuberances from the rim of the sun, and so on. Each observatory will do its particular task. Thus division of labor advances whether it is making shoes or watching shooting stars. When the sky gazers divide up the heavens in order to obtain better results in the work of celestial observation, it is time for the sky-pilots of the different denominations to do in our great cities what has already been largely done upon the foreign field and, instead of duplicating each other's work, or working independently, present a well-ordered array of forces in order to combat effectively the tremendous forces of evil which entrench themselves in our centers of population.

Christian Endeavor Reports

Secretary William Shaw, of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, in his report to the International Convention in session recently at Los Angeles, places Christian Endeavor at 75,000 societies and 4,000,000 active members, and finds the movement to be more alive than ever before. The new emphasis laid upon missions, upon social service and upon religious education he traces in large part to Endeavor societies. Especially does he claim for the societies the large fresh air, good health, and in some measure eugenic reform, and gives statistics to show in what an extended list of countries prison relief work is carried on by Endeavor members.

The largest claim made by Secretary Shaw is, however, for efficient societies. Two years ago an efficiency chart was proposed, and thus far more than 3,000 societies have worked themselves up to 100 per cent. Some to have done so began at 25 per cent. The movement has just been taken up by societies in Australia, in which country the next International Endeavor Convention is to be held. For Endeavor Unions Secretary Shaw makes in his report the claim that they are laymen's training schools, fitting men and women for unsalaried service in the churches. The Endeavor movement has an enrollment of people who give a tenth of their incomes to spread the gospel. The number so enrolled is now 29,645.

Churchmen in Congress

Out of 156 senators and representatives who have responded to Leslie's query, "Is churchgoing out of fashion?" only 115 have responded "No." Forty-one have expressed the opinion that the church is not keeping pace with the times. Senator Clapp of Minnesota believes the real broad spirit of Christianity was never so strong as it is today. Senator Fletcher of Florida declares that newer and better churches are being built all the while. Senator Jones of Washington says the bad is advertised more today than it used to be but the good is with us both out of the church and in it. "I believe the automobile has had something to do with the decreasing church attendance," Senator Kenyon of Iowa tells us. "It is pretty hard on a beautiful Sunday to get away from the lure of the country if a person has an automobile, and there is much to be said of the religion of the country."

Of the 129 members of the House of Representatives heard from, 27 expressed the opinion that the church is not keeping pace with the times. About the same number declare that the present system of Sunday-school teaching is not what it should be. Almost all of the number heard from attended Sunday-school and agreed that the training had served them well in after life. Twenty-six are not members of any church.

The Drill-ground of Character

Character is perfected in the stress of conflict and the drill-ground for the discipline of the powers is in temptation and conflict. Without the trial there is no assurance that any trait in personal character will endure the strain. This is the reason why we are to rejoice in all kinds of testing; they are the means by which the disciplined soul is to be made ready for the great service that it can render to God and humanity during an earthly life. It takes a high type of patience for the soldier to go out on the drill-ground gladly and stand under the hot sun in the practice of the manual of arms. Perhaps it takes more patience to do this, and a far higher kind of courage, than it does to go into battle. The final behavior in battle will probably be determined by the way in which the soldier conducts himself on the drill-ground.

Pessimism Is a Disease

It is more than a symptom. It is a disease. It shows that the one who is afflicted with it has not been thinking of God or reckoning with the divine in his estimate of life. This means the sickness of the mind and the disease of the soul. Radical treatment is the only right course under such circumstances. The serious condition of the patient must be recognized first of all. He very likely does not know that he is sick but his trouble is none the less radical. The moment that we detect the signs of the dismal malady in ourselves let us hurry to the best doctor of souls at once. We are in a serious condition. Pessimism is a disease.

The Power of Tenderness

American life needs kindness and tenderness more than it needs new mechanical devices or commercial charts. There is more power in tenderness and sympathy than there is in a dynamo. It is of such a different kind that perhaps no comparison is possible; but if the two can be in any way compared, the difference is all in favor of the power of kindness. When the last word has been said for the mighty energies of the physical universe the story of the worth and strength of tenderness has only just been begun. Mercy is mighty with the power of the ancient stars and eternity is in league with it for the conquest of the world.

The Christian World

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance

United Presbyterian Statistics

The minutes of the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church are out. It took 340 pages to tell of the year's work: ten years ago it required 253 pages. Evidently, the United Presbyterians are growing in work, and this makes their union with the Southern Presbyterians, already voted on, all the more desirable. Its present membership in the whole church is 183,805, of which 142,081 are members in America. Ten years ago the United Presbyterians numbered 119,358 in America. The ministry shows a slight increase for the decennial period: from 1,026 in 1903 to 1,145 in 1913. The increase in the ruling eldership, however, is much more substantial, it being an increase from 3,982 in 1903 to 4,715 in 1913. The number of congregations appears to have grown faster than the ministry. In 1903 there were 998: this year there are 1,129. The figures appear to show that while the church is gaining, and the laity are stirred as never before, the ministry has all it can do to hold its own. But the United Presbyterians are not alone in this showing.

We doubt if there are a more generous people in the United States than the United Presbyterians. They not only work, but they give on an unprecedented scale. In 1903 the 998 congregations gave $681,116 for congregational purposes: this year 1,129 gave $1,082,336 for the same purpose. But it is in the "total contributions" where the United Presbyterians let their light shine before men. According to the year book, 183,805 United Presbyterians gave $3,013,660 for all purposes; ten years ago the total contributions amounted to $1,860,219. The average per member in America has increased from $15.52 to $20.97. We doubt if there is another denomination in the world that can show the same generous record. Not less than 717 congregations contributed for all purposes, a showing the magnificence of which can be best appreciated when it is remarked that perhaps not as many as 40 churches of the Disciples of Christ this year will give for all purposes.

Rev. H. B. Gwyn Resigns: A Tragedy.

A few months ago Rev. Herbert B. Gwyn accepted the editorship of The Churchman (Episcopal, New York City), leaving a prosperous Chicago parish to do so. The Churchman was depended upon to voice the Low Church Party opposition against changing the name of the Protestant Episcopal Church to American Catholic Church. A vigorous opposition was what was wanted, but The Churchman under Dr. Gwyn's editorship failed to produce the goods. The Churchman then came in for a drubbing. The dissensions within the Protestant Episcopal Church proved too much for the editor, and he stepped down and out. With Doctor Gwyn's resignation came also the interesting news of the resignation of Rev. Dr. Milo H. Gates, from the Council of Advice, which council is said to be behind the editorial policy of The Churchman. Dr. Gates' resignation seems to show that the Council has not been able to dwell together in unity. The tragedy of it all lies in the situation that an editor of a religious paper generally must be in the attitude of a celebrated dog listening to his master's voice. It is time that the church newspapers of every denomination come out for a free and untrammeled press. Our sympathy goes out to Doctor Gwyn, but at the same time we admire his spunk in resigning rather than submitting to an unmanly situation.

How D. L. Moody Helped Charles Stelzle

The name of Charles Stelzle is peculiarly held by the affection of American Christianity. His resignation as head of the Presbyterian Department of Commerce and Labor, after some caustic criticisms last May during the General Assembly of his church at Atlanta, is giving the Presbyterians grave concern. In the Continent (Presbyterian, Chicago) of July 17, Mr. Stelzle in the course of an article tells how D. L. Moody helped him, after theological seminaries had turned him down, as follows:

"You will never make a preacher. Possibly after you have spent three years in a theological seminary you may prove to be acceptable to a little country church in which the people aren't very particular." This was the only encouragement given me during my machine-shop days when the burden of becoming a Christian minister was heavy upon me. Then I honestly tried to break into three different theological seminaries, but they would not have me. They declared that I did not know enough. To be sure, I was fully conscious of my ignorance—this is why I desired to take the seminary course. But the presidents of the seminaries with whom I corresponded would not see it my way.

Somebody told me about the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago.

I wrote to Mr. Moody, telling him my situation, referring him to a mutual friend for particulars. A few days later Mr. Moody met my friend, who presented my case, and the big human evangelist and leader asked him simply one question: "Has he 'sand'?" I was accepted. No doubt "sand" is a very poor substitute for scholarship in a theological seminary, but I have always been grateful to the man who made it possible for fellows like myself to enter the Christian ministry.

The "Vicar of Christ" Embarassed

One of our Roman Catholic exchanges is authority for the statement that the Vatican has been defeated in the first contest it has essayed in the Italian courts since the downfall of the Pope's temporal power. Seven years ago a cardinal died in Rome leaving his large fortune to Pope Pius IX., or his eventual successor. The heirs of the cardinal defied the Papal excommunication against those who cite ecclesiastics before civil tribunals, and set up the claim that the bequest was not a personal gift to the Holy See; and inasmuch as the latter is a moral corporation, it must seek royal authorization in order to enjoy an inheritance. The Italian court upheld the contention, and Pius X., not being able to effect a private compromise, appealed the case, but the higher court confirmed the decision. The Pope's claim to civil sovereignty prevents the Vatican from invoking the consent of the state to the inheritance of the property, and the heirs are insisting upon the restitution of the whole fortune, which is said to run into the millions. The claim of the supposed Vicar of Christ to privileges which the Master did not claim is sometimes embarrassing.

Some Personals of Interest.

Prof. Francis G. Peabody of Harvard University has just returned to Cambridge after several months in Japan, during which time he has lectured in many of the large cities and at important educational centers.

Dr. Washington Gladden has recently spent a week at Vanderbilt University, Nashville, lecturing on the Vocation of the Preacher. His audience, made up largely of Southern Methodists, received eagerly his message, embodying the ripened fruits of his long career in the pulpit.

One of the first speeches of Ambassador Page after his settlement in England was at Cheshunt College at the corner-stone laying of a new building. Mr. Page in accepting the invitation to speak expressly said that he did so in recognition of the regard the people of America cherish for Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, the president of the college.

Rev. Charles F. Aked, D. D., of San Francisco, plunges into the wilderness for his vacation. With one of his deacons, Dr. C. H. Woolsey, a guide, saddle horses and pack animals, he will enjoy five weeks of camping and fishing in the High Sierras. Last summer he secured a rainbow trout weighing ten and one-quarter pounds, taken on a five-ounce fly rod. "After that," says Dr. Aked, "New England resorts may tremble lest they be wiped off the face of the earth!"

The Conversion of an African Chief

The Congregationalist (Boston) reports the conversion of Kapitango, a powerful chief of an African tribe at Gamba in the West African field. Kapitango humbly took his place before the pulpit of Reverend William H. Sanders among the 32 received into the church by baptism. It is believed that this dramatic conversion will be followed by many others of the tribe, and eventually another African tribe will be brought captive to the Chief of all chiefs, King of kings and Lord of lords.

Newsy Notations

The Yale Divinity School during the past year enrolled 119 students. These came from all parts of the country and represented all the leading denominations. There were 32 men in the graduating class.

The number of students of theology in the German universities is said to be on the increase. In that country, as elsewhere, for some time past there has been a falling off of the students of theology. This was taken as indicating a loss of interest in spiritual matters and a decline in the faith of the people in the German Empire. In the seventeen Protestant universities, during the past year, there was an attendance of 3,386 students over 2,885 a year ago, an increase of almost one-fifth. The University of Berlin has 555 students; Leipsic, 466, and Tubingen, 336.

The All-Night Mission in the Bowery, East Side, New York, during the last two years has sheltered 70,000 men, fed 40,000 of them and helped 7,000 of them to a new start in life since its organization two years ago. Besides this, 400 trips were made to hospitals, 300 trips to prisons and more than 300,000 loaves of bread were distributed to the needy each year. The mission has been open day and night since its establishment, and all this good work has been done at a cost of a little more than $3,000 a year.

It is understood now that Dr. Campbell Morgan has definitely declined the call extended by Madison Avenue Reformed Church. A committee of three went to London recently to place before Dr. Morgan a unanimous call to become pastor of the church. Dr. Morgan held his decision in abeyance. On two previous occasions a call by the same church has been extended to the London pastor.

Rev. Walter Getty, general secretary of the Presbyterian Brotherhood of America, has resigned. He left Chicago last week to fill a number of engagements at summer conferences. The associate secretaries, Doctors J. T. Henderson and Francis M. Fox, are dividing the work pending the selection of a chairman of Assembly's committee on the brotherhood.

A Supposition and Some Questions

In each of three cities there is a Christian church. Each church has a minister. Suppose that on each Sunday morning, when each minister is supposed to feed the souls of his people on the word of God, he devote at least one-half of his time to saying harsh, unbrotherly things concerning the other two churches and ministers. Suppose he impugns their motives, misquotes their recent sermons, and in every possible way discredits them.

By such a course, would either of these ministers be doing his duty to his people? Would he in such ways best do the work of a minister? Would such a course tend to make the people to whom these ministers minister more like the Master?

If no preacher of the gospel would be justified in such a course, how are we to justify a similar course on the part of religious papers, each of which calls itself Christian?

To a man who is spending some years in the quietude of a small Missouri town, preaching for a church that is trying to be a Christian church, the unbrotherly, un-Christian, competitive, commercial spirit of much that appears in our papers, seems wholly unforgivable. No three preachers who would speak and act toward each other as these papers do, would be permitted to preach in any of our churches! I really find myself at times wondering whether or not we are ever to be freed from this blight to all that is purest and best in Christianity. And I am disposed to believe that no self-announced or self-assumed loyalty to the gospel can ever justify in the sight of God the unholy wrangling which is so constantly kept up by some religious papers.

Why should a man do as an editor of a Christian journal what he would not think of doing if he were minister of a church? If our editorial desks were regarded as pulpits from which to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ and thus feed the souls of his people, rather than as arsenals from which to bombard other editorial sanctums—well, it seems to me it would be an improvement over present methods of procedure, at any rate! But it may be that a man who is only a village preacher does not and cannot know very much about how a religious paper ought to be edited.

From Near and Far

Plans for the celebration in 1918 of the centennial anniversary of the admission of Illinois to the union are being formulated by the Illinois Centennial Committee, created by the recent legislature. Five features were decided upon for the celebration, the commission working along a line designed to create memorials that will endure forever rather than to spend money for a programme of entertainment that would leave nothing permanent after the celebration was over. The features include the following: The promotion of local celebrations throughout the state; the holding of an exposition and pageant at the capital; the preparation of a series of publications putting into permanent form the record of the state's progress in all lines of development; the erection of a permanent memorial building for the use of the historical and educational departments of the state, where shall be preserved the historical relics of the state, and a memorial hall containing statues of Illinois' illustrious men; the erection and unveiling of bronze statues of Lincoln and Douglas on the capitol grounds.

Miss Anne Morgan, the daughter of the late J. P. Morgan, recently gave a picnic for the girls belonging to the vacation savings fund. Miss Morgan is greatly interested in the working people. In speaking of the wage for working women, she said: "I think it's perfect nonsense to pretend that a girl who is immoral on $6.00 a week will lead a virtuous life on $8.00. I think wages have nothing to do with the question of morality, and the girls themselves were the first to resent the suggestion that the minimum wage is the remedy for minimum morals. Of course, we shall all have to see that working women are paid wages upon which they can live, but it is false and ridiculous to assert that there is a direct relation between the wages of women and their morality. Working women were the first to point this out, another indication, I think, that they are their own best helpers."

When the World Federation of the Student Volunteer Movement was formed in 1895 there were 599 local organizations with 33,275 members. These have grown in number to 2,320 with 156,063 members. In the United States there are now twenty student secretaries of the International Committee, twenty-one belonging to state committees, and 138 local secretaries giving their whole time to this work. Successful evangelistic meetings have been held in the State Universities of Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Pennsylvania, Oregon and Washington. The Federation was at the start organized only in North America, Great Britain, Germany, Scandinavia and in mission colleges. Now it is well rooted in Holland, Belgium, France, Italy, Switzerland, Australasia and South Africa.

Topeka, Kan., has now two policewomen in Miss Elizabeth N. Barr and Miss Eva Corning, who received the highest grades in the civil service examination of that city. Miss Barr will be "night woman" the first month; Miss Corning will constitute the day force. While they will report for duty daily to the chief, they will work largely independent of the rest of the police force. Their work will be more along preventative lines than in the arrest of the criminally inclined among the women. For the present a star will be the only uniform the policewomen will wear; aside from that they can dress as they please. Later some distinguishing feature will be prescribed, possibly only a badge or certain style hat or cap.

Announcement has been made of the first changes in the parcel post system, to become effective August 15. In the first and second zones the limit of weight has been increased to twenty pounds, while the rates have been lowered. In the first zone, which includes local, city carrier and rural delivery, the revised rates will be five cents for the first pound and one cent for each additional two pounds up to twenty. The second zone includes the territory within 150 miles of any given postoffice, and the rate is five cents for the first pound and one cent for each additional pound up to twenty. A less cumbrous method of computing rates has also been devised.

The total registration for the first term of the Summer Quarter at the University of Chicago on July 5 was 3,149 students, of whom 1,572 were men and 1,577 were women. The total registration a year ago on the same date was 3,053. For this quarter the registration in the Graduate Schools of Arts, Literature, and Science is 1,063; in the Colleges 1,025; in the Divinity School 180; in the courses in Medicine 96; in the Law School 132; and in the College of Education 754. The total in the professional schools is 1,162 as compared with 1,014 a year ago.

George J. Kasai, a student from Kofu, Japan, who was graduated from the University of Chicago last June and whose oration on "The Mastery of the Pacific" won the Julius Rosenwald prize in oratory last spring, will be sent out by the World Peace Foundation to deliver his oration in cities throughout the East. Kasai's oration dealt with the Japanese question in California and was an appeal for fairness on both sides and the continuance of peaceful relations with Japan. His tour will take him as far east as New York and will last two months.

During the first month's activities in the summer outing department of the United Charities in Chicago, arrangements were made for sending more than 5,000 mothers and children to country homes, camps, and on outings for a day. The unusual demand for outings has more than used the funds received from the special summer vacation appeal. Officials of the organization say at least $14,000 more will be needed to cover the necessary expenses of this department for this season.

An annual five days' encampment of Union and Confederate soldiers, to be held at Fort Myer, Va., at such times as shall be designated by a joint committee from the Grand Army of the Republic and the United Confederate Veterans, was proposed in a bill introduced recently by Representative Johnson of South Carolina. The secretary of war would be directed to furnish tents, subsistence, and medical attention, and other comforts for the encampment.

The Doernbach brothers, Henry Warren, Elwood B., and Stanley B. Doernbach, who have attended the Sunday-school of the Union Church (M. E.), Philadelphia, for 20 years without missing a Sunday, are becoming famous. After ten years of perfect attendance they each received a gold medal, after 15 years a silver loving cup, and their 20-year record was recognized by gifts of gold medals.

Former Governor Vesser of South-Dakota said recently: "If women were given the vote they would bring better conditions into the schools, the prisons and our social and political life in general. Forty per cent of the men in our penitentiaries are there by accident. I think if women had the ballot they would find a way of redeeming a large number of these, and sending them back to society with a chance to become good and useful men."

At one of the sessions of the international convention of the Gideons, held at Toronto recently, E. L. Vogel, president of the Illinois camps, reported that 5,562 Bibles had been placed in the hotels of the state last year by 271 members. This doubled the previous year's record of the Illinois Gideons, but they have taken for their slogan next year "500 members and 25,000 Bibles."

Jack London declared at Milwaukee on his trip east that he was a suffragist because of the belief that woman suffrage means regulation of present-day evils. "I voted for suffrage in California, and I'm glad of it," he said, "for voting by women has brought a higher standard of citizenship out there. I will be glad of the day when women will vote everywhere."

Governor Major has issued a proclamation setting apart Wednesday and Thursday, Aug. 20 and 21, as public holidays, to be known as "good road days." Every able-bodied man in the rural districts and cities of the state is to put in these days working upon the public highways.

Mrs. John Bruce Dodd, of Spokane, Wash., has suggested the idea of Father's Day with a view of impressing paternal responsibility and equality in the home. An organization has been formed to promote wide observance of Father's Day on the second Sunday in June

Ex-President William Howard Taft will be the principal speaker representing the United States at the international celebration of the battle of Lake Erie, which will be held at Put in Bay, O., Sept. 10, the 100th anniversary of the battle, and the day following.

By the use of a glycerine emulsion made from the marrow of the spinal column of a healthy animal, Dr. Irvin McGee, Venice, Italy, declares he has cured sixteen cases of infantile paralysis. He says a similar treatment might be effective in locomotor ataxia.

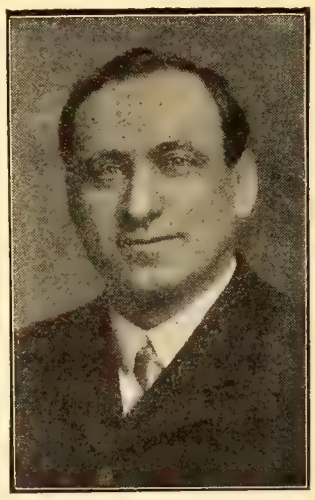
The Goodness of Human Nature

Where the Doctrine of Total Depravity Errs

Ellis B. Barnes

I presume that the doctrine of total hereditary depravity was as good an explanation as any that could be devised in an age that did not worry itself into hospitals asking questions. It has the advantage of dogmatism and the obscurity of the far off days when evil originated, on its side. It is one of those convenient phrases which cover a multitude of perplexities without giving much light. The fathers could not understand how so much evil could grow in a soil that came from a beneficent hand, and they hastened to the conclusion that possibly the deeper the depravity, the more prolific in degeneracy the soil, the greater would be the triumphs of redemption. That men are depraved is true, but that they are totally depraved is not true, and never could be true. The doctrine has a foundation in fact, but like all doctrines which affirm more than can be proved, every vulnerable point is made to contribute to attacks which are likely to do mischief to what should be accepted as facts. At any rate, overstatement is certain to end in confusion.



E. B. Barnes.

It would be just as correct to say that human nature is totally angelic, tubercular, rheumatic, or totally anything else. When we affirm totality of anything pertaining to human nature we do it violence. That nature is a field, not a hospital, not a church, not a dive. It is a possibility for anything, and the power to direct that nature is within the hands of every man. Every cradle is an open book; every grave the closed volume.

Of course the forces for good and evil are in that cradle, the foreshadowings of St. Peter or a Judas Iscariot. Ordinarily there is a shock at the suggestion of total depravity as we look upon the beauty of childhood. It is a tax upon the faculties to associate evil with it. I am sure Jesus did not, though the impatience of his disciples with the mothers who brought their children to him that he might bless them, shows that they were under the influence of a doctrine which reached its highest expression in the theory of depravity, or they believed that Jesus had no place in his kingdom for the child. But we know today that our natures are made up of lights and shadows, of conduct that ennobles and that also degrades, of good resolutions and bad practices. They are comounded of weights and wings, of stings and sweetness, of the fine and the crude, of the blasphemy and the prayer, of the yellow that proclaims the false, and the steel that announces the true. That child in the cradle will become whatever he wills to become. He will cultivate one set of tendencies to the neglect of the other, and ignominy or immortality will be the result.

The Aggressiveness of Evil.

The evils of the world are aggressive and noisy. That may help us to understand why evil plays such a part in the speculations of the theologian, and in the chronicles of all time. Evils flaunt themselves in the market places as long as they can sustain the light of day, and seek only the alleys and the shadows when other seemingly less formidable evils supplant them. They swear and jeer at righteousness as they stand in the corners of the streets and in the market places. They make good "copy" for the chronicler. There is no need to give the same publicity to the man who goes to prayer meeting as we give the man who goes to prison. As a matter of news the criminal is more interesting than the saint. As a question of morals and the obligations to the future, the man who goes to prayer meeting looms in comparison like the sun that dissolves the snow-ball. But we never think of the sun except in hours of eclipse, or when the clouds have obscured his rays. The unusual attracts and interests. And is this not the reason that evil has been detailed for us in fiction, in history, and is being detailed in the daily press? And the very goodness of human nature profits by the records of evil as the summer turns the garbage into blossoms. To the reporter there was little interest in the prodigal's brother, but the world is familiar with the story of the prodigal. He did the unexpected, the unusual. The ordinary course of the world would dry up the reporter's ink and corrode his pen, and to him a lapse from the conventional is like the overflowing of the Nile. At once the dead routine of affairs hums with excitement and activity. The fountains of humdrum are broken up. If the reporter had called at the home of the prodigal during his absence the regularity of the place would have told him that there was nothing for the papers that day. But his home-coming like his home-leaving was a matter of more than ordinary interest. Even the petulance of the faithful son serves as material for an additional chapter of the story. His grouch is worthy a place in the annals of the world because it is one of ten million such, only in this case it gives a proper background, a foil for the merriment of the return to the father's house.

Because of the obedient son the paternal home was secure on its foundations. It was one home among the many that in the long run makes the nation and the world and civilization. The prodigal who lives his brief span in the limelight has nothing more to his credit than the wasting of a fortune, the beggary, the companionship of swine. And he never became of any worth until he comes back to where he started from, and straightway the curtain falls. The reporter must seek for pastures new.

We do not forget the settings of that story, but the center of it is not the goodness of the father but the rebellion of the son. And the goodness of that father is like the goodness of every other father. He had no desire to punish; he was anxious only to forgive and restore.

The humorists as well as the theologians know the effects of vice on goodness. They know that a single evil will bring out the goodness of the neighborhood in encomium as the night brings out the stars. It was a wise man who said if you want to make a fairly good man in your neighborhood famous, make him roaring drunk. What happens? At once Jones arouses the pity of the neighborhood, not only because he got drunk, but because he is too good a man to get drunk. Before the spree, few suspected that Jones had a tract of latent piety slumbering somewhere within the recesses of his being, but now he is invested with a miniature halo. The drink is a mirror in which his virtues are seen. A wife-beater becomes a hero after he makes a record in his special line. All his good qualities are magnified. His friends believe that were it not for his besetting sin he might have a chance at the presidency. If the wife should die, think you he would remain a widower, doomed to life-long celibacy because of his penchant for dealing blows that subdue the turbulent feminine? Be not deceived. It has actually happened that those dames who were loudest in denunciation have been wooed and won by such as he. He may have five hundred faults, but this one is his weakness, and the others are forgotten. There is not a drunken shoemaker, lawyer, doctor, tailor, or any other craftsman in the country who is not invested with goodness of which he never dreamed. Any one of these men would be leaders or successful men among their fellows were it not for the fatal bowl, so we are told. We forget the sober workman who is likely to be better than the drunken, and extol the unfortunate. Instead of regarding men as totally depraved we regard them as tending in the opposite direction and are shocked at these symptoms of depravity. The myth-making faculty within us creates the man as he ought to be out of the man who is what he ought not to be. We are not going to allow our friends to be kicked into oblivion because of a few vices. On the contrary we are going to forget the vices by bringing into undue prominence their virtues.

Where a Record Is Needed.

And while we have the sin recorded, what a contribution to the cause of goodness it would be if the struggles to resist the tempter could be chronicled as well? What a history that would be of souls buffeted and tossed by storms, fighting to keep their heads above water or themselves out of the deadly vortex, or off the jagged rocks! How many days and nights of honor were attained before they fell? Surely such records are preserved in the Book of Life. But on earth no note is taken of such, save as now and then some master writer of fiction enters into fellowship with the tragedies and attempts to trace their lineage. They play no part in the reality of history. And even if they did, the tortures of mind, the anguish of soul, the sense of defeat and loss can be better imagined than described. This is a side of goodness of which only scant records can be found.

A good friend was deploring the extravagance of floral displays at funerals. There does seem to be a reason for his plaint. But there is nothing that represents the goodness and the unconscious theology of the world like flowers, and for that reason they will always be in evidence as the spices and ointment were in the long ago to anoint the body for the burying. The flower in the marble hand of the sweet babe speaks to the broken-hearted in a language which satisfies yearning and soothes the grief better than any words that fall from learned lips could ever do. And when we leave a grave covered with flowers, the heart seems to feel that beneath the weight of such perishing beauty the faults of the departed lie buried and will be forgotten, as will every radiant hue in rose woven by the cunning of the sun, and the purity of the lily caught from the whiteness of the snows, when winds have swept them far and wide. And with that perfume we carry the memory of goodness which we will never allow to die. The suggestions of the grave to us henceforth are not in the dark, the cypress, or the tear of grief, but in those things for which the beauty and purity of the flowers stand. The grave as ever is in the garden. In the garden God walked with man, and for long years the spot where sleep the departed has been called God's acre.

The world today believes that human nature is growing toward goodness, though oft with many tendencies to evil, rather than that it is growing toward evil with oft many tendencies to goodness. We are being taught to cleave to that which is good with such persistence that we are being strengthened to shun every form of evil.

The Universe and the Individual Soul

By President O. S. Davis, of Chicago Theological Seminary

Long ago a singer among a reverent people put the problem of the individual and the universe into the form of a pitiless question and a faithful answer.

"When I consider the heavens, the work of thy fingers,
The moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained;
What is man, that thou art mindful of him?
And the son of man, that thou visited him?
For thou hast made him but a little lower than the angels,
And crownest him with glory and honor."

Centuries afterward another singer in a different land put the same question and made answer to it for an age that has grown wise and believes that it stands at the height of civilization. There is a similar affirmation of faith in the song of the Hebrew poet and in the poem of Tennyson.

God and the Universe.

I.

Will my tiny spark of being wholly vanish in your deeps and heights?
Will my day be dark by reason, O ye Heavens, of your boundless nights,
Rush of suns, and roll of systems, and your fiery dash of meteorites?

II.

Spirit, nearing yon dark portal at the limit of thy human state,
Fear not thou the hidden purpose of that Power which alone is great,
Nor the myriad world, His shadow, nor the silent Opener of the gate.

During the interval between the two songs the knowledge that man has of the universe in which he lives has immensely broadened. This, however, has not removed the pressure and the challenge of the question. The universe is too big for the individual. It is too terrible for the soul unless there may be found some sure word of comfort and hope that may come with assurance to the spirit.

Let the challenge come home to us without fear of its consequences!

Science has uncovered the secrets of the universe until it appears such a stupendous fact as the Hebrew singer of the sun and moon never dreamed. Astronomy has expanded his heavens until now their distances, their energies and their terrible splendor overwhelm the modern mind. It is all too vast. The spectroscope and the photographer's plate reveal the existence and the very composition of new stars and discover the whirl of glowing masses that even now seem to be making new suns and systems. Our little world sinks to the glimmering point of a tiny ball in the countless company of splendid stars. It might perish, and what would be the loss among these shining myriads? And a single living person on this puny world, a tiny, frail human creature,—what is he in the midst of a universe like this? To make our perishing earth the center of so much worth, to make a mortal person on that earth of any consequence, upsets all sense of values and proportion. This, at least, is the challenge of modern science to the doctrine of the immortal worth of the individual soul.

Hear the same question from another quarter. History has also been extending our sense of the duration of life and it has been seeking for the causes of great movements in the price of bread and the genesis of civilizations in the productiveness of soils. From geology as well as from history comes a new sense of the duration of the patient centuries. Man at the longest has lived but a few years on the changing earth.

"Looked at in regard to his duration, his years are a handbreadth before these shining ancients of days that have seen his generations fret their little hour and sink into silence."

What warrant have we then for assigning such worth to a human being whose days fly swifter than a weaver's shuttle? The challenge cannot be avoided.

"Lo, all our pomp of yesterday
Is one with Nineveh and Tyre."

The question comes urgent upon us from still another quarter. After all these centuries of experiment and experience, is the condition of modern life, even in its most favorable aspects, one that reflects much credit upon a rational and spiritual humanity or lends any especial confidence to one's faith in the worth of the individual soul? Here are millions of human beings living on the very margin of starvation and ceaseless physical misery. Here are whole races poisoning themselves with alcohol in the vain attempt either to escape by intoxication the clutch of unhappy circumstances or to make their present lot momentarily happier. Here are our cities given over to riot and our industry full of unrest and injustice. If the good God has left it to man to work out the way in which he will live with his brethren on earth, surely man has not acquitted himself with much credit in working out a scheme of things that makes possible the realization of the birthright of immortal souls here. There seems to be little place for the doctrine of immortality or the fact of spiritual values in an order of life that is so illogical and drunken. The question arises inevitably, "Would not personal immortality be the last malediction for a humanity that has found no better way in which to live together than has been discovered thus far?"

Literature is full of the same searching question. The great books are little read these days; the perishing books that are often among the "best sellers" are full of the problem. Human life looks little better than "a side-show on some ridiculous star" according to the picture of its bargains and its baseness as they are revealed in the modern problem novel.

So the old question is pressed home in such a form as this: Somewhere in mid-most ocean just now a wave was heaved to a crest and broke—in a fleece of foam. Finally, unseen by human eyes and unheard by any listener the last bubble burst and disappeared. Like this or any one of the countless companion bubbles of the foamy crest is the life and worth of the individual. Who knew or what difference did the bubble make to the ocean? Its deeps were undisturbed and the tides trembling into a million bays were unchanged.

Full in the face of these questions, with a sublime audacity, the soul has dared to throw its defiant affirmation. It refuses to be left in the dust. It insists that it is dowered with immortal worth and that it will endure when the heavens shall have been folded together as a curtain. It does not attempt to prove this with the certainty of mathematical demonstration. It realizes that such a proof is in the nature of the case impossible; but it does not admit that its contention is without grounds which make it more reasonable than the so-called "facts" of natural science. The splendor of the dauntless affirmation is one of the witnesses to the worth of the spirit that makes it. It is not reasoning in a circle to declare that the worth of the individual soul is attested by the fact that it affirms that it has worth. If it had no deathless destiny it would not be beset by the dream of it. Surely the soul is not mocked at the point of its highest yearnings.

Hence in that picture which Campbell has given of "The Last Man" the truth is put into its due expression. The "piece" used to be in the reading books a generation ago and it is a part of the memory of many a pupil who blended the vision of the day of judgment with June sunshine lying thick on the fields and the heat calling him out to the pool in the woods. The last man stands up in the presence of the last setting sun and defies the physical world with the old boast of the ages:

"Go, tell the night that hides thy face,
Thou saw'st the last of Adam's race,
On earth's sepulchral clod,
The darkening universe defy
To quench his immortality,
Or slake his trust in God!"

And so when the material world has done its worst to the soul of man, the voice of the spirit sounds above the swell of the storm and affirms that the individual triumphs in the dark night of the universe. He who listens may hear it and hearing may take courage for the conflict that must come before the soul can win its heavenly best.

The Second Revolution in China

By David Z. T. Yui

[Editorial Note: The author of this significant article is David Yui, now at the head of the Lecture Department of the Y. M. C. A. in China. He is a M. A. of Harvard University, graduating with high honor as a prize-winner. He was head of the Department of Foreign Affairs of the W. Chang government under the present vice-president of the republic, Li Yuang Chuang. This position he resigned to enter Christian work. Mr. Yui kindly dictated this article, the substance of a stirring address at the Lake Geneva Student Conference.]

One of the most notable events, perhaps the most notable event, thus far in the twentieth century, was the successful revolution in China. Only a short while ago the Chinese people were looked upon as being far from able to undertake any political change. The Manchu government was ruling the country with a strong hand. The Manchu garrisons were quartered at the important centers in the country. Many attempts to overthrow the government met with failure from time to time. The Chinese people seemed to have lost their courage. Nevertheless, plans were systematically formulated and organized to carry out the revolution on a national scale. On the 10th of October, 1911, the trumpet of the revolution was sounded in the city of Wuchang, in Central China. Within three days the triple City of Wuchang, Hankow and Hanyang fell into the hands of the revolutionists. In less than a month nearly the whole of the southern part of China responded to the call and came under the revolutionists' banner. In about three months the course of the revolution was crowned with success. The North and South were united and the Pekin government was organized. Yuan Shihkai was elected first provisional president. It took the American people eight years to win their independence, and it took the French eighty years to put the French Republic on a firm basis. It took the Chinese people a little over three months to overthrow the Manchu dynasty and to build in its place the first republic on the continent of Asia. Comparatively speaking, the Chinese revolution was almost bloodless. The whole achievement will go down in the world's history as one of the most marvelous political changes.

It might seem that the Chinese people should be satisfied with the result of the revolution, but in reality they are far from being satisfied. I am happy to say that they are not satisfied. The revolution simply marks a mere change in form of government. At bottom such a mere change of form does not and can not satisfy any people who seek to build a great republic. The Chinese people are now planning to have a second revolution. This second revolution will far exceed the first revolution in extent, in thoroughness, in intensity, and in duration. Every man and every woman, every boy and every girl will take part. No time, money or effort will be spared to make the second revolution a success. This movement is now gaining ground and is also gathering strength from one end of the country to the other.

The second revolution is what we call in China "The Revolution of the Heart." The Chinese people thoroughly believe that the only permanent basis for a republican form of government is the moral character of the people and so today they are glad to receive any suggestions or advice and are welcoming any organization or power that claims to have the ability to help us build up the moral character. Seeing the good work done by missionaries in China, which are notable examples of the spirit of service and self-sacrifice, the Chinese government as well as the people is convinced that there must be something in the Christian that inspires when it wins men to devote their lives to such work. For this reason their attitude toward the Christian religion is most favorable. Let me give you a few instances which will show you this attitude. Last December the Y. M. C. A. of China held its sixth national convention in Pekin. At the opening session the President of the Republic sent the Vice-minister of Foreign Affairs to represent him at the convention and to extend to the delegates most cordial welcome. In the course of the afternoon President Yuan Shihkai invited all the delegates to a reception in his official residence. In a short speech the president said that the delegates might be compared to centers of wholesome influence and that it was his hope that upon the return to their respective provinces all the delegates would exert that influence upon the society and especially upon the young men with whom they came into contact. In a recent letter addressed to the Scotch Bible Society, General Li Yuan-Huang, vice-president of the Republic wrote to thank that society for the good work that it had done in China and said that it was his hope that the society would not only continue the splendid work but also to extend the same in China. Most recently the vice-president heard of the World Student Christian Federation Conference on Lake Mohonk, and he presented a copy of his photograph to the conference and also sent a written message which conveyed his greetings and compliments. This clearly shows his appreciation of the splendid work that has been done by the federation for the spread of Christian influence among the world's young men. I could multiply such cases almost to no end but time will not permit me to do so.

Friends, the "Sick Man" of the Far East is now recuperating. The "Giant" is fully awakened. China is re-born. The students today no longer squander their intellectual power upon the intricacies of the so-called "eighth legate essay." They are now acquiring all kinds of knowledge that the world is giving. The general mass of China is also awakened. The whole Chinese nation is moving at a tremendous speed. Napoleon said, "When China moves she will move the world." The 400,000,000 people of China whose intellectual power, physical stamina, moral fibre, business honesty, patience and endurance compare most favorably with those of any other people in the world, and whose natural resources are unlimited, are moving today, but whither? It is the privilege and the responsibility of us who profess to be Christians to avail ourselves of the present opportunity in China to help guide her in the right direction. It is absolutely true for me to say that China today looks up to Christendom for guidance and co-operation. On behalf of the Christians in China, I extend to you all a most cordial invitation to lend us a helping hand, and, above all, we desire your prayers for a new China Republic.

Christ and the Universe

By Alice Meynall

[For high elevation of thought and sublimity of utterance this is one of the noblest poems England has produced in many a year. It links the Incarnation to the purpose of a mighty universe. The orbit of its thought is vast; its movement is free and strong; its range is measured by celestial diameters. If England had selected as its poet laureate a woman, that land of literature could have no worthier name than the author of these magnificent lines.]

With the ambiguous earth
His dealings have been told us; these abide;
The signal to a maid, the human birth,
The lesson, and the Young Man crucified.

But not a star of all
The unimaginable stars has heard
How He administered this terrestrial ball;
Our race have kept their Lord's entrusted word.

Of those earth-visiting feet
None knows the secret, cherished, perilous—
The terrible, shame-fast, frightened, whispered, sweet
Heart-shattering secret of His way with us.

No planet knows that this
Our planet, carrying land and wave,
Love and life multiplied, and pain and bliss,
Bears as chief treasure one forsaken grave.

Nor in our little day,
May His devices with the heavens be guessed,
His pilgrimage to thread the Milky Way,
Or His bestowals there be manifest.

But in the eternities
Doubtless we shall compare together, hear
A million alien gospels, in what guise
He walked the Pleiades, the Lyre, the Bear.

Oh, be prepared, my soul!
To read the inconceivable, to scan
The million forms of God those stars unroll
When in our turn we show to them—a Man.

"There is No Unbelief"

There is no unbelief;
Whoever plants a seed beneath the sod
And waits to see it push away the clod—
He trusts in God.

There is no unbelief;
Whoever says, when clouds are in the sky,
"Be patient, heart; light breaketh by and by,"
Trusts the Most High.

There is no unbelief;
Whoever sees, 'neath winter's field of snow,
The silent harvest of the future grow—
God's power must know.

There is no unbelief;
Whoever lies down on his couch to sleep;
Content to lock each sense in slumber deep,
Knows God will keep.

There is no unbelief;
Whoever says, "tomorrow" "the unknown,"
"The Future," trusts that Power alone
He dares disown.

There is no unbelief;
The heart looks on when the eyelids close,
And dares to live when life has only woes,
God's comfort knows.

There is no unbelief;
For thus by day and night unconsciously
The heart lives by the faith the lips deny.
God knoweth why.

This poem has been attributed to Charles Kingsley, who was more or less of a socialist in his day, to Bulwer Lytton, to Mrs. Browning, and to quite a large group of other noted writers. But the poem is from the pen of an American woman, Lizzie York Case, who is still living in Baltimore. She sent out her poem because it represented her own faith. Even men who deny must believe something; and their "heart lives by the faith the lips deny." She has had the mingled satisfaction and sorrow of seeing her poem attributed to at least a dozen of the leading authors of her generation.

The simplest way to settle the question whether the poem should be attributed to Kingsley, Bulwer Lytton, or Mrs. Browning, is to search for it in the published works of these authors. It has been credited to all of them, and to others; but so far as is known to the present writer, no edition of the works of any of these writers contains it.

So far as is known, also, no living author claims it for himself, excepting the real author, Mrs. Lizzie York Case. All the confusion grows, not out of conflicting claims, but out of reckless crediting. It was first published in a daily paper, the Detroit Free Press, and made its way into collections of poems, with no name attached. The present writer first found it in an English collection, where it was marked "Unidentified," and so quoted it, until a literary woman introduced him to the living authoress, in her eastern home.

Mrs. Case is by religious faith a Friend, and has spent a good part of her life in work for the daily press. She was for some time on the staff of the Detroit Free Press, and in that paper twenty-eight years ago printed the poem. Mrs. Case is now living in Baltimore.

The Free Press which first published the poem printed, on August 1, 1905, the author's own statement, a part of which follows:

"This poem of mine, which for twenty-seven years has been accredited to Bulwer Lytton, Charles Kingsley, and Mrs. Browning, not to mention a dozen others, was written by me in a moment of emotional turmoil compounded of resentment against dogmatic intolerance and enthusiasm for a larger, nobler belief.

"It happened this way: One morning about twenty-seven years ago, I was breakfasting with a very zealous young clergyman, whose ironclad orthodoxy permitted of no compromise. He questioned me as to my religious belief. I answered that I had inherited a creed, that I had clung to the faith of my fathers—I was a Quakeress, a Friend.

"'Then,' answered the pious young shepherd of souls, 'you are an unbeliever and you will be damned.'

"'I'm not afraid of that,' I answered, 'for there is no unbelief. The thing is unthinkable. I believe in everything that is good and beautiful and true; in God and man and nature, in love and life and joy.'

"That night I slept fretfully. The young zealot's words haunted and worried me. In hot refutation of his arrogant summary of a belief that did not coincide with his, the verses were born. That is the only way I can explain their being.

"I was living in Detroit at the time and contributing a weekly article to The Free Press. But the next morning instead of preparing my regular stipulation I dashed off the poem that had been framing in my mind all night. The Free Press published it and soon after letters came pouring into me from all over the country thanking me for the verses, and for the consolation that had been induced in many cases by them."

Jefferson's Letter to His Child

The letter was written by Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, to his daughter, Martha, when she was eleven years old. It was dated from Annapolis on November 28, 1873.

After telling his little girl of the sorrow he felt at the separation from her, due to her having been sent to a boarding school, he continued:

"The acquirements which I hope you will make under the tutors I have provided for you will render you more worthy of my love, and if they can not increase it they will prevent its diminution."

He then suggests the length of time to be given to various studies, and continues:

"Take care that you never spell a word wrong. Always before you write a word consider how it is spelled, and if you do not remember it, turn to a dictionary. It produces great praise to a lady to spell well.

"If ever you are about to say anything amiss or to do anything wrong consider beforehand and you will feel something within you which will tell you it is wrong and ought not to be said or done. This is your conscience, and be sure and obey it. Our Maker has given us this faithful internal monitor, and, if you always obey it, you will always be prepared for the end of the world, or for a more certain event, which is death.

"I have placed my happiness on seeing you good and accomplished, and no distress which the world can bring on me would be equal to that of your disappointing my hopes. If you love me, then strive to be good under every situation, and to all living creatures, and to acquire those accomplishments which I have put in your power, and which will go far toward insuring you the warmest love of your affectionate father, Thomas Jefferson."

A. A. Adee on Newspaper War

Everybody in Washington knows "Matt" Tighe, the veteran newspaper man. He is a counterpart of the late Mark Twain in looks and can juggle rhetoric as handily as the late Twain.

"Matt" is favored by working for a paper that permits him to use his imagination when it is necessary to make a good story. Therefore, when the horizon is dotted with fleecy cloudlets they are converted into clouds of war, dark and ominous, by the facile typewriter of Tighe.

A case in point is recited by A. A. Adee, second assistant secretary of state.

"I was about to take my bath one evening," Mr. Adee said, "when I was informed that Mr. Tighe wished to see me. I sent word that it was impossible at that moment for obvious reasons, and asked Mr. Tighe to let we know what he wanted.

"Mr. Tighe did. He merely wanted to know what the chances of war were between the United States and a certain country. There wasn't the slightest danger of war and I sent word to Mr. Tighe that the chances were slim. Next morning Mr. Tighe's paper had glaring headlines saying that the United States was preparing for war."

"I suppose," Mr. Adee added, with a twinkle in his eyes, but a solemn visage, "that if I had actually got into my bath he would have declared war had been begun!"—Chicago News.

Livingstone's Accomplishments

David Livingstone, explorer and missionary, was a man of varied accomplishments. Besides getting himself taught on board ship, and later by Sir Thomas Maclear, to take with great accuracy astronomical observations for fixing latitude and longitude, besides acquainting himself with botany and geology, with patristic literature and Egyptology, Livingstone was an excellent mechanic, a steersman and a mariner. His resourcefulness was at all times remarkable. When he was hard up for fuel on his first steamer journey up the River Shire he landed in the elephant marsh. Here no trees existed and no fuel was obtainable, but his men found many bones of slaughtered elephants. Livingstone at once took the bones on board, burned them in the furnaces of the Ma-robert and so continued his journey.

China is organizing a Department of Agriculture and Forestry, to be conducted by young Chinese men educated in the United States.

The New York City grand jury severely condemns "suggestive, sensational dancing in hotels and restaurants where the sale of liquor is allowed."

The church census of St. Louis gives the total church adherents in the city as 518,000, or 76 per cent of the population.

A Page of Human Interest

CARNEGIE DISCUSSES INVESTMENTS.

Andrew Carnegie tells the following story with great relish. When his father was leaving his native country to settle in America he borrowed £20 from a relative. The family had an uphill battle of the other side of the Atlantic, but, when the tide of prosperity turned with the son, he remembered his father's indebtedness and determined to clear it off with its accumulated interest. He started by remitting the sum of £20, and for several years sent the same amount—a dividend equal to exactly 100 per cent. Returning to Scotland, the Pittsburgh ironmaster met his old relative.

"Well," said Mr. Carnegie, "having paid up a good deal of the interest, I should like now to clear off the principal."

"Ah, ay, Andrew, dinna ye fash yersel' aboot the loan! A'm pairfectly satisfied with the interest."

"Ah, but I'm rich enough now, I think, to clear off the principal!" replied the millionaire.

"Dinna mind the principal, Andrew," said the relative, "it's very weel invested as it is!"

BEECHER'S SARCASM.

Mr. Beecher's witty sarcasms were often called out during some interruptions in his public addresses. Once when he was describing some atrocity in the South he said: "Is there anybody worse than that in Sing Sing?" when, far away in the highest gallery, came a shrill, piping voice, saying, "Yes." The words flashed out instantly from Mr. Beecher: "I give it up; you know!—you've been there." The audience nearly shouted the roof off at his reply.

In some of Mr. Beecher's lectures in England, he was assailed with questions and disturbances almost every other sentence. One of his auditors interrupted his eloquence by crowing precisely like a rooster. Mr. Beecher reached for his watch, saying, as he did so: "What? Morning already? Who would have thought it? But the instincts of the lower animals are infallible." Another man cried out: "We don't sympathize with slavery, but we go for the South because they are the weaker party." The orator replied: "Go then and sympathize with the devil. He was the weakest party also, when he rebelled and was turned out of heaven."—Exchange.

EMERSON'S PUZZLE.

In the first number of the Atlantic Monthly Ralph Waldo Emerson's poem, Brahma, puzzled critics and readers. The first verse is:

"If the red slayer thinks he slays,
Or if the slain think he is slain,
They know not well the subtle ways
I keep, and pass, and turn again."

That winter a relative of Longfellow bought a sleigh, and in a family letter there was a wail over the January thaw. When the letter was answered, Longfellow contributed this verse:

"If the red sleigher thinks he sleighs,
Or if the sleighin' think it is sleighin',
They know not well the subtle ways
Of snow, that comes—and goes again."

Longfellow's parody on Emerson is worth preserving.—Congregationalist.

SENATOR ROOT DISCUSSES TRUSTS.

Senator Root, at a luncheon in Washington, said, apropos of a new move against the trusts:

"I hope that we shan't go after all our big, successful businesses too hastily, too ignorantly. I hope that business success won't be treated like the old man in the story.

"There's a story about a ship. A sailor fell overboard from this ship, and the captain shouted to a green hand:

"'Throw a buoy over!'

"But the sailor wasn't rescued. He drowned. After all hope of rescue was gone, the captain reviewing the efforts that had been made, said to the green hand:

"'Did you throw that buoy over when I told you?'

"'No, sir,' said the green hand. 'I couldn't find a boy, so I threw an old man over.'"—Chicago Record-Herald.

SECRETARY REDFIELD'S WHISKERS.

The public mind would find it difficult to understand the point of view of the Hon. William Cox Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, who went to the photographer's grumbling.

"Why does anybody want another picture of me?" he asked, with that hurry-up-I-haven't-a-minute-to-spare frown.

"Well, Mr. Secretary," said the person who insisted, "you're a member of President Wilson's cabinet, you know!"

"Yes, and I'm busy," said the Secretary of Commerce, as he sat down in the chair always so politely proffered by the photographer and dentist; "why don't you say I'm the fellow in the cabinet with whiskers and let it go at that?"

VICE-PRESIDENT MARSHALL ON FAITH AND WORKS.

In his letter to an officer of the Salvation Army, Vice-President Thomas R. Marshall says some very true and practical things. Among other things he says: "I am convinced that the genuine Gospel of Jesus of Nazareth is the only thing that can eradicate evils in business and political life. And more and more am I convinced that Peter and Paul must be blended in order to make a twentieth century Christian. Faith and works are both required. The measure of the great success comes from the personal touch which it gives its work. It is not that you dispense charity in the old-fashioned sense, but that you dispense love and give the erring and the fallen a knowledge of the fact that they are the children of the selfsame God, and may, by his grace, rise to greater heights. May it be given to all of us to understand that Christianity is not a system of ethics, a code of morals or a list of dogmas, but that it is a vitalizing influence for the individual man."

A ROOSEVELT RACE SUICIDE STORY.

Colonel Roosevelt one evening in Marquette told a group of delighted newspaper correspondents a number of race suicide stories, of which he has an enormous collection.

"If more of us were materially, but not mentally, like the Arkansas backwoodsman, it would be well for the nation," said the colonel.

"Once, while traversing Arkansas, I dismounted at a log cabin and asked if I could have dinner. Yes, they said, I could, and while I waited on the bench before the door, I noticed a baby playing with a loaded revolver.

"'Goodness me!' I said, 'you shouldn't let that young infant play with a loaded revolver. What a terrible risk!'

"'Resk?' said the backwoodsman. 'Aw, I dunno. I got 'bout fo'teen mo' chillun round the place somewhere.'"—Daily Magazine.

SLANDERED LABOR.

Percival Roberts, Jr., one of the heads of the United States Steel Corporation, said at a luncheon at his beautiful country seat near Philadelphia:

"Our corporation has been as sadly misrepresented as was the work of Pat.

"Pat, you know, was a coal miner. He lay on his back on the rough rock and hammered and wrenched at a seam of coal above his head hour after hour. No sinecure, eh?

"But one hot evening when Pat came home there was no supper. He ventured to complain, whereupon Norah said:

"'Shure, it's a foine man to complain y'are! Me slavin' all day like a Turk over the red-hot shtove, an' you on the broad o' your back in the nice, cool mine!'"

A. GRAHAM BELL ON AERONAUTICS.

Alexander Graham Bell, one of the pioneers of flying, said recently in Washington that he was surprised to see aeronautics still at a stage where the aviator has to risk his life in every flight he makes.

"We have not advanced as I expected," continued Mr. Bell. "Indeed, Mrs. Blank's reply to her friend, made ten years ago, is still timely.

"'So your husband is working on a flying machine?' asked Mrs. Blank's friend. 'Don't you think he is wasting his time?'

"'Oh, I don't know," Mrs. Blank replied. 'He's got his life well insured.'"—Daily Magazine.

HENRY WATTERSON TELLS STORY.

Henry Watterson told this story at a recent dinner party:

"One day when I was a city editor of a small newspaper, a fine turkey was left at the office. We all hankered after the bird, the editor finally claimed it, took it home, and had it cooked for dinner. The next day a letter was handed to him, which he opened and read.

"'Mr. Editor: I sent you a turkey yesterday which had been the cause of much dispute among us. To settle a bet, will you please state in to-morrow's issue what the turkey died of?'"—Chicago News.

LYMAN ABBOTT AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Dr. Lyman Abbott, at a luncheon at the Colony Club in New York, was good-humoredly arguing the suffrage question with a prominent suffragette.

"Now, doctor," said the suffragette, "there's one thing you must admit. A woman doesn't grow warped and hidebound so quickly as a man. Her mind keeps younger, fresher."

"Well no wonder," Dr. Abbott retorted. "Look how often she changes it!"—Chicago Record-Herald.

PRESIDENT WILSON ON STATISTICS.

President Wilson, at a dinner in Washington, said of a statistician: "His figures are so precise that one inclines to doubt them. He is like the American sugar planter in Hawaii, who, taking a friend to the edge of a volcano, said, 'That crater, George, is just seventy thousand and four years old.' 'But why the four?' George asked. 'Oh, I've been here four,' was the reply. 'It was seventy thousand when I came.'"

Disciples Table Talk

Springfield, Ill., Hears Business Men Talk.

The High Street Christian Church, Springfield, Ill., is enjoying a series of several Sunday evening addresses by leading business and professional men of the city. The first address was given by John L. Zimmerman, Men's Class leader, on the subject, "What a Men's Class Ought to Mean to the Church." The second by Superintendent Carey Boggess of the Springfield schools on the subject, "The Child's Rights in Our Modern Educational System." H. Russell Clem, pastor of the High Street Christian church spoke on "Why Not Conservation of Society?" W. W. Witmeyer, lawyer, on "Guilty or Not Guilty?" "Why Smith Did Not Go to Church," will be the subject for the address on August 3, by the pastor. The speaker is to be supplied for Sunday evening, August 10, the subject being, "The Man of Galilee and the American Workingman." W. H. Griffith will address the meeting on August 17, on "The Fruit of the Gospel in Our American Institutions." Edgar Morris, editor, will make the address Sunday evening, August 24, on the subject, "The Relation of the Twentieth Century Church and the Press."

Canton, Mo., Retreat Reports.

J. P. Rowlinson, superintendent of the Northeast Missouri Missionary District, writes interestingly of the Retreat, held July 15-18, at Canton, Mo. "A year ago," he says, "fourteen men inaugurated the Retreat idea for Northeast Missouri meeting at Shelbina. This year there were thirty-one present, and as each man left the Retreat an enthusiastic booster, a much larger attendance is expected next year. The evening addresses were given by J. P. Rowlinson, who spoke on "The Pedagagy of Jesus;" Ben L. Smith, who gave his fine lecture on "Alexander Campbell;" and Prof. A. W. Taylor, who spoke on "The Rural Church." The mornings were given to informal conferences on "The Church," "The Preacher," and related themes. Ben L. Smith presented a well written paper on "Where to Place the Emphasis," at the beginning of the conference on the church. Discussions ranged all the way from the ultra conservative variety that insists on more "First Principle" preaching, to the extreme of radicalism, that declared for the revision of the theology of Paul. A very fine spirit pervaded all discussions. Canton University was host, and played the part to perfection. The great new dormitory was the home of the Retreat, and J. P. Martindale and his charming family looked after the wants of the guests. The days were extremely hot, and the big swimming pool in the gymnasium was by all odds the favored spot for the "boys." Some of them were white-headed, but the spirit of "the ole swimmin' hole" was theirs and they were young again. By pooling railroad fares, $2.79 covered the traveling expenses for each member, and meals were served at 25 cents per meal. No charge was made for the use of the dormitory. Officers of the ensuing year are: Ben L. Smith, Moberly, president; W. D. Endres, Kirksville, vice-president; Dean H. B. Robison, Canton, secretary-treasurer.

Laymen in Washington, D. C. Pulpits.

The usefulness of the laymen of to-day is well attested by the presence of seven of them in Washington pulpits, July 20. The plpit of Earle Wilfley, of Vermont Avenue, was occupied by a visiting layman from Illinois. Among other laymen leading the services at other churches were the General Secretary of the Y M. C. A., in Washington; an officer of the Treasury Department; an attorney of Washington; a Missouri Congressman and Madame Mountford, lecturer of the Orient.

Bruce Brown, Lecturer at N. California Assembly.

Campbell Institute Meets in Chicago.

The Campbell Institute met in Chicago, at the Hyde Park Church, last week. Ministers and teachers from various parts of the country were present. For two days the company listened to papers on vital subjects. The following are some of the themes discussed: "The Church and Social Prophylaxis," "Relation of Disciples and Episcopalians in the Matter of Union," "Contemporaneous Literature of the Disciples," "Mysticism and the Modern Mind," "The New Realism," "College Administration," "From Platonism to Pragmatism," "The Function of Criticism." The Institute is composed of about 150 ministers and teachers among the Disciples who find in its fellowship constant inspiration for maintaining those scholarly ideals and habits which in practical life are likely to be neglected. The membership is divided into eight bureaus or departments —Old Testament, New Testament, Sociology, Philosophy, etc.—with a specialist at the head of each department, who keeps in touch with the members in his group, suggesting to them the literature in which they would be especially interested. Contrary to the charge made in some quarters, the Institute is in no sense a secret organization. It is undertaking for the coming year several lines of research into certain conditions among the Disciples of Christ.

The CONQUEST

Flossie Williamson Woodbury, wife of George W. Woodbury, pastor at Rogers, O., and Bellevernon, Pa., died July 16, at her sister's home in Alliance, O. She was born near East Fairfield, June 19, 1886. C. B. Reynolds, who conducted the funeral, writes that Mrs. Woodbury was a noble woman and a true helpmeet to her husband.

The Northern California Convention at Santa Cruz will be followed this year by an assembly lasting two weeks, conducted by Bruce Brown, who will speak each evening.

H. H. Peters, pastor at Paris, Ill., is a newly elected trustee of Eureka College. Mr. Peters also became chairman of the committee on promotional activities.

I McCash, resigning American Christian Misionary Secretary, has accepted the presidency of Spokane University.

Church Extension Offering Begins Sunday, September 7th

THE FOLLOWING SUPPLIES WILL BE SENT FREE FOR DISTRIBUTION AMONG THE MEMBERS OF YOUR CONGREGATION TO EVERY PREACHER OR CORRESPONDENT ORDERING THEM BY CARD.

1. "Hope and Realization." An illustrated leaflet telling what every Disciple of Christ should know about our Church Extension Work.
2. Collection Envelopes; one should be in the hands of every member of the church previous to day of Annual Offering.
3. Pastoral letters to be ordered only by the pastors.

THE CHURCH EXTENSION OFFERING IS THE LAST OF THE ANNUAL OFFERINGS DURING THIS MISSIONARY YEAR. IT SHOULD BE THE JOY OF EVERY CHURCH TO HELP, BECAUSE—

1. The Board can answer now but one-third of the appeals because of lack of funds.
2. Forty per cent of new churches organized must be helped to build by Church Extension loans.
3. Every preacher knows that he can do no creditable work without proper equipment.
4. Only thirteen out of 1,621 churches aided by Church Extension Loans have failed, which speaks well for the vitality of our Missions.

In ordering supplies of literature and for information, address

Greetings from Zurich

Greetings to the Bible Schools from the World's Sunday-school Convention now in session at Zurich, Switzerland.

How I wish I could bring to all our schools the vision of the wide,wide world as it is being brought to us in this great convention. Delegations, representations and communions are showing us how the Sunday-school is making triumphant advance the wide world around. There are 2,415 delegates registered, 1,254 coming from North America. Appeals are being made and answered here. Bulgaria, now in state of war, made an appeal for aid which was promptly given by the convention. India three years ago appealed for a Sunday-school secretary—a check came from Scotland today that makes the secretary possible.

But it is to America that the whole world looks for aid and example in Sunday-school activities. Never have I realized more fully the great responsibility resting upon the churches of the United States and Canada. And among these hosts of the home land, we may look with pride upon what we as a people are doing in the Sunday-school cause. Having nothing to teach but the Bible and nothing to do but to teach that Bible, we ought to be satisfied with nothing less than first place in the Sunday-school work of the world.

It is hoped that every school will respond liberally in its offering to American Missions, from which offering this work is supported. At the Toronto Convention in October we must plan wisely and well for the effective enlargement of all our Bible School work throughout the home land and in all the world.

Robt. M. Hopkins,
Bible School Secretary.

International Convention

TORONTO'S WELCOME.

The Local Committee at Toronto hereby extends a cordial invitation to all Disciples of Christ in all the states, who can possibly come, to attend the convention, meeting in our city from 30th Sept. to 6th Oct. next. We need hardly tell you that these conventions have been in other years seasons of great spiritual uplift and helpfulness to those who have attended, and we feel that we can assure you, that the first International Convention of our people to be held in Canada, will be as helpful and as full of spiritual uplift as any of those held in other years.

We have heard that in some of the text books in some of the schools of the United States, Canada has been described as "A cold barren country lying to the North of the United States." We will not take time now to contradict the first part of this statement, but we ask you to come to Toronto and judge for yourselves.

Our committee have been at work for some time arranging and preparing for you when you arrive and we can assure you a warm welcome and ample accommodation. We are anxious to know as soon as possible how many are coming, that proper accommodation may be provided for all. C. O. Reynard, 16 Harbord St., Toronto, Ontario, is the chairman of our Entertainment Committee. He will be glad to know that you are coming, either by direct communication or through whoever may have charge of this matter for your state or your church. Provision is being made to meet all trains and boats so that you may have as little trouble as possible in getting to convention hall, where the Entertainment Committee will meet you and direct you to a respectable and comfortable rooming house or hotel. We are glad to tell you that our Street Railway Company provide free transportation to all visiting delegates.

J. D. Higgins, President.
H. F. Dawes, Secretary.
Local Committee.

"Tell It Out"

W. T. Moore and others are right about a "Publicity Bureau." We need it. We ought to have it. When our party was returning from the Portland Convention through Canadian towns, reporters again and again chided us for not sending their papers news daily about the Convention at Portland. Each reporter would invariably say, "Why we would have published half a column or a column of your proceedings daily, if we had had it by telegram or mail."

What an opportunity there is at Toronto to let Canada, as well as the States, know of what we are doing. I know of no one so well fitted to do the work as E. E. Elliott, of Kansas City, Mo. I believe I know one generous rich man there who will furnish the stenographers and typewriters necessary for such an important move. A word from the President of the Convention will secure an efficient man to do the work this year, and for years to come. And if such a word can be given soon, Brother Elliott can "get on the job" and secure the names of dailies that will publish matter, besides what he can give the "Associated Press." Let others say—"I am for it."

James Small.

Wanted! Ten Thousand Dollars

This amount is wanted and very greatly needed by the motherless, fatherless, homeless little ones; by the aged, feeble, indigent brothers and sisters, and by the helpless, destitute sick placed under the care of the National Benevolent Association by a great brotherhood of Disciples who are seeking to restore the practice as well as the teaching of the early church.

Brethren, the National Benevolent Association has accepted willingly and joyously the great task you have laid upon our shoulders. We trust that you will lay greater and yet greater tasks upon us through the years. We want ever to minister, and in increasing measure; but, like the good bishop in Les Miserables, we must go among those who have means when our hands are empty, that we may then go with filled hands among those who have not. We come to you now, friends, in the name of these our Lord's "little ones" who have not, and in His name who said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," to ask that you will place in our hands the means without which we cannot serve these many who fill our eleven institutions. If you fail us we shall be compelled to borrow money for the bare necessities, for surely we cannot turn these helpless ones out.

We believe you will not fail us and we ask that ten thousand of you will each send (won't you please send today) at least one dollar for our bread and butter fund. We asked for an Easter offering of $35,000 because we knew we should need at least that much. The brethren have responded to date with approximately $25,000. We must have an additional $10,000 before the close of the missionary year or there will be suffering among our eleven families for want of that proper care for which the churches hold us responsible.

Brethren, do not let these little ones suffer and do not let the church be brought into reproach. Send at least a dollar saying you will be one of the ten thousand to make a supplemental Easter offering. We will publish in the Christian Philanthropist the names of all who so respond. Send your dollar today saying it is toward the Easter offering.

Facts About Church Extension

The statistics of religious bodies in the cities of the United States show that the Disciples of Christ have only 3.8 per cent of their membership in the cities and 4.7 per cent of our buildings in the cites. We have, therefore, been a village people. We must not do less in the smaller towns but we should equip ourselves with money to do more in cities. We must do more work in the city which means that we must be making Church Extension loans of $5,000, $10,000 and $15.000 to help build the right kind of city churches that will command the attention of the people. If we do not put up buildings that co nmend themselves architectually, and usefully; that look well in the midst of other good buildings, such as School Buildings, Hospitals and Libraries and church buildings of other religious bodies, we will stay behind in the procession with our plea for Christian Union.

The average loan 23 years ago, was $300. The average loan last year was $2,600, which means we are helping to build churches suited to graded Sunday-school work and all up-to-date church work. We are also helping the smaller fields as well. Please remember that it is mostly the business side of Church Extension that takes well with the people. Here is a point. Last year our board helped 90 churches with loans aggregating $239,825. Those churches raised on the field to help themselves build, nearly $700,000. This added to the amount we loaned shows that there was church property called into existence last year by our loans, aggregating nearly a million dollars. Within five years practically all of this $239,825 will be back to duplicate the same work.

The Name Loan Fund idea is interesting. A Name Fund is now $5,000 payable $500 a year for ten years. General Drake started $1,000 to work the first year of our existence, 25 years ago. He paid in the rest of his fund at the rate of $500 a year in eight years. You will notice that to October 1st last year, his fund by returning and going out again and again, has done the work of $38,028, building 79 churches and earning $5 258 of interest. Since that statement was made, his fund has built two more churches showing to the credit of that fund 81 churches built.

Including state, district and city boards, together with the American Society, there are 127 home missionary societies in the United States organizing churches and about 40 per cent of these new churches call upon our Board for help to build. 290 churches applied for help in 1911 and we helped only 75 for lack of funds. In 1912 263 churches applied for help and we helped only 90.

The following loans were paid in June:

Big Cabin, Okla. (Walker Cowherd Fund)	$500.00
Marshfield, Mo. (S. S. Fund)	$1,500.00
Roan, Pa. (General Fund)	3,000.00
Roanoke, Va. (th Ave. N. E. Colored) Doeler Fund	600.00
Great Falls, Mont. (Gen. Fund)	2,500.00
Tillamook, Ore. (Gen. Fund)	4,000.00
Yacoma, Wash. McKinley Park Ch. (K. C. Mo. Ind. Bd.)	1,000.00
Kiefer, Okla. (St. Louis, Mo. Union Ave. Fund)	300.00
Ashdown, Ark. (Annuity Fund)	1,200.00
Indianola, Miss. (S. A. Holman Fund	300.00
Total	$14,900.00

Total amount in Church Extension Fund July 1, $1,043,075.85.

Will the preachers please order supplies of literature promptly? Collection envelopes are sent free, also "Hope and Realization" for distribution among the congregation. Let us make a good start this year toward the second million recommended by the Louisville Convention. Order supplies from G. W. Muckley, New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Drake University--A School of Ideals

Liberal Arts—Bible—Law—Education
Music—Dramatic Art—Painting and Drawing
Home Economics—Physical Education

Memorial Hall—College of the Bible.

Drake University is an institution of higher learning devoted to the best in education. It believes in cultivating the religious nature in man as well as the intellectual and physical. It is standard in every department, and is so recognized by every standardizing agency in this country. No short courses leading nowhere are offered. The faculty is composed of thoroughly trained Christian men and women, who, because of their attainments, command the respect of educators everywhere. The equipment in every department is adequate. No matter how valuable your time, you can afford to spend it in Drake University. It is a school that gives value received. There is no pretense—no exaggeration.

The College of the Bible meets the approval of the Disciples of Christ. It is true to the principles of the fathers of the religious movement we would further. This college is sending out an educated ministry to bless the churches. The department of Religious Education is one of the greatest training schools for Sunday-school and other religious workers to be found in this country. The rural church problem receives attention here.

We want Two Hundred new ministerial students to enter next September. We will assist each one in many ways. Scholarships, loan funds, and opportunities that the student appreciates will be available so that he may remain in the college until he is thoroughly prepared for his world task. Last year nearly 1,600 students attended Drake University. This number included 121 ministerial students. We ask 300 to come next year.

The College of Liberal Arts is superior in every respect. Seven hundred and forty-two enrolled last year in this department.

The College of Law enrolls more than One Hundred each year, and is as well situated as any in the country.

The Conservatory of Music is acknowledged to be the peer of any in this country. The teachers are artists of national reputation. Enrollment last year, Five Hundred Twenty-six.

Write for catalogues and particulars concerning any of the departments herein enumerated.

ARE YOU THINKING OF GOING TO SCHOOL?

Try a Bible College in combination with a great State University. Together we have an equipment worth $3,750,000, and an annual income of $760,000. Do you realize what that means? It insures both equipment and talent. The quantity and quality of work is not surpassed. It is seldom equalled. Over 260 teachers are at your service. Salaries are paid which command the best talent. Yet, tuition is nothing for Missourians, and is only $20 per year for students from elsewhere.

Moreover, the spiritual atmosphere both in schools and in town is of the best. A deep religious spirit results each year in students dedicating themselves to the ministry or to the work of foreign missions.

The Great Commission

He called them to be followers. He sent them forth to be leaders. The time between the call and the commission was very short. It was only three years since He himself began to preach. It was only a year and a half since they began their constant following of Him. We wake now and then with astonishment and consider how much can happen in a little while and how the whole aspect of life is changed by the incidents of a few short weeks. He sent them into all the world; He himself had seen but little of the world. He made a journey to Egypt when He was a baby, but never traveled so far afterward.

It was doubly strange that he should have done that in view of his own rejection. The Indian chief, Blackhawk, answered the white missionaries with astonishment and indignation when they told him that they had come to preach a Christ who appeared to the white man and was crucified by them. "Why," asked the Indian, "should the white man tell us of a Christ whom they crucified? We would not have done so if so good a prophet had come to us. We would have honored him, but if we had crucified him we never would go about the world telling it."

It is remarkable that Jesus, having himself been rejected, expected His disciples to secure an acceptance which He himself had not been able to establish. It is doubly remarkable that He expected the world to believe what the Jews rejected. They stood on the Mount of Olives looking over toward Jerusalem; they could see the Damascus gate through which He had staggered under the weight of His cross; they could look down on the summit of Golgotha where He suffered and died. They could almost see the door of Joseph's tomb over which they stood when Jesus told His disciples that all power was given unto Him in heaven and on earth. Nothing is more remarkable than the faith of Jesus in His own mission, unless it be the fact that that faith appeared most triumphant in view of the very experiences which might have seemed to destroy it.

The world was very large. Those Galilee fishermen had very little to encourage them to explore it. Not much of worldly joy had come to them as the result of the exploits out from the villages of the Sea of Galilee. Why should they go into all the world? The Lake of Gennesaret was large enough for their tiny boats and the markets of Capernaum and Bethsaida were ample for the disposal of the fish they caught. Why should they go anywhere but back to their fishing and let the world take care of itself?

But they knew the Lord had sent them, and in their hearts they felt the mighty impulse that would not let them go back. Their old, past life had somehow become impossible; whether they obeyed the present call of duty or not, they could not go back again and find things just as they had been.

They went into all the world. We do not have to complete the story of their journeys, but we know they were scattered abroad and wherever they went they told the story of Jesus. Some of them went because they had to go, the spirit of persecution drove them out. Some of them went because they wanted to go. Some of them went because of other business which invited them, but whatever they did and wherever they went they told the world about Jesus.

The world heard and listened. Before the end of that century, there were little churches established all over the Roman Empire. There were saints in Caesar's household. The prisoners of the cross preached in bonds, but the word of God was not bound and the truth spread over sea and land. They still are going into all the world. The world is very wide. For the first time in history we know how wide it is; we have measured it. We know not merely the breadth of its oceans and the area of its continents, but we know how many are its languages; we know the number and nature of its religions; we know its hostilities and prejudices; we know the inertia and the vindictiveness and the reactionary character of backward peoples. We have taken up what Kipling calls "The White Man's Burden."

Ten thousand men believe in foreign missions now who did not so believe ten years ago. They have seen a new Turkey born in a night, born in the bonds of revolution; they have seen a new China casting off the triumphs of ignorance and oppression and struggling with blind power into the dazzling and perilous conditions of a republic. Men who never believed in foreign missions before have suddenly awakened to the importance of having trained leaders against the hour when these backward people shall suddenly rise to claim the inheritance of the enlightened and find themselves unprepared for it. But these are not the only reasons why the Gospel of Christ needs to be taught to all the nations. The deepest needs of human life are its spiritual needs. The most compelling obligations are those wherein we answer the command of God and the cry of the human soul.

The First Commandment With Promise

The commandment to children to honor their parents is based upon the assumption that parents are worthy of honor. To be worthy of honor one must make an honest, courageous fight for character. One who lacks the power to control his temper, who habitually yields to his appetite for strong drink, or who always quits work when he finds work difficult and play inviting, will hardly win the honor which he covets from his children.

But something more than love of right and definite notions of right is needed that parents may teach children to respect them. Many of us remember that much of our happiness in early life came from being associated with older persons whom we now know not to have been less able and industrious than others from whom we derived very little happiness directly. The explanation is that the former retained the imagination of childhood and knew what pleased children while to the latter a child was an abbreviated adult. We remember how often good men and women were harsh and brutal to us. We were indignant at their injustice. We have since learned that they meant well and that they wronged us because they were ignorant.

The church and the community induce children to respect experience when they provide for the needs of the children. By the service it renders the church commands reverence. Are there misunderstood, neglected children within the field of the church? The Sunday-school becomes a glorious institution to these children if if sends to them some one with an understanding mind and a heart of sympathy. Are there bad boys in town and do they revile age and dignity? The policeman's club will not cure them of their badness. The chances are that they do not know of any good citizen who can play with them—show them how to enjoy life. How shall we teach the boys to honor the flag? Let the flag be carried by men who know and appreciate boy life.

How shall we honor our parents? Shall we tell them of their services to us? Shall we make presents to them? Shall we mark the anniversaries of their birth and their marriage with festivities? Yes, all these things we should do provided our parents appreciate them. And when they are gone, we should honor their resting place. But these are not the most important ways in which children honor their parents. We honor parents most when we are not thinking of the duty we owe to them but are mastered by the passion for truth and right. If they exercised their right to think and followed their sense of right even when it led them to oppose customs held in honor, it may be that we shall have to depart from their ways in order to be imitators of their faith and integrity.

"A fool never learns; the average man learns from his own experience; the wise man learns from the experience of others." Parents are supposed to have a wider and richer experience than their children, and they usually have. They know that one who spends more money than he earns will come to grief. The necessity of guarding the health is very clear to them. They have learned that one who looks for happiness in this world will look in vain unless he is able and willing to do well some part of the world's work. This experience of the parents is one of the best inheritances of youth. To reject it is to reject life. If a substance has been found to be a poison, only the fool will wish to eat it in order to discover for himself what it will do for him.

"Father has such queer notions about the way I ought to dress," said a young girl who was exerting herself with desperation to follow the most outlandish fashions. One of our novelists puts into the mouth of a young woman the question, "Isn't it strange that fathers should be on the wrong side of every question?" The notion that wisdom was born with him is apt to get into the head of any young fellow. The cure of such folly is experience with the world. Let the young man who knows it all have a few rounds with the world and let him be relieved of all protecting pads so that he will strike the ground hard. Conceit takes its departure after the world has thrown a man down, stepped on him, rolled him in the dust, and shown him how helpless he is when he discards the wisdom of experience. When we have to take the full consequences of our foolishness, we soon acquire a wholesome respect for the man who can tell us how to avoid trouble. The good customs of the home will then cease to be treated as obstructions in the highway of self-expression and the advice of a wise father or mother will not be received with contempt. [Midweek service, Aug. 13. Eph. 6:2; Ex. 10:12.]

In Explanation

During the past few months the task of organizing the Disciples Publication Society and securing capital with which to finance it has, in the main, fallen to the lot of the editors of The Christian Century. With the foundation work of the Society now approaching completion, it is expected that Mr. Morrison and Dr. Willett will resume direct editorial charge of The Christian Century by September 1, with an enlarged paper and greatly enriched pages.

Enrichment by Grief

It may be that somewhere, in this daily path of yours, a great sorrow is lurking, a sorrow that will blot, for a season, the sun from the heavens, and will lie upon your heart like a great load. What are you going to do with it when it comes? Are you going to be crushed by it, to be embittered and hardened by it, to let it cast a baleful shadow over your own life and the lives of all who come near you? If you meet it as fate, that is what it will do for you; your life will be blasted. But that is not what it ought to do for you. It ought to bring you the largest, the richest, the most precious of all the gains of life. For this it is appointed; if you use it as it ought to be used, this will be its fruit. True and deep, is the poet's insight when he sings:

Count each affliction, whether light or grave,
God's messenger sent down to thee; do thou
With courtesy receive him; rise and bow,
And, ere his shadow pass thy threshold, crave
Permission first his heavenly feet to lave;
Then lay before him all thou hast. Allow
No cloud of passion to usurp thy brow
Or mar thy hospitality; no wave
Of mortal tumult to obliterate
Thy soul's marmoreal calmness. Grief should be Like joy, majestic, equable, sedate,
Confirming, cleansing, raising, making free;
Strong to consume small troubles; to commend
Great thoughts, grave thoughts, thoughts lasting to the end.

Such is the ministry of sorrow; such are the great and beautiful gifts always in her hands to those who receive her as God's messenger. And if, when your trouble comes to you, instead of raging against it, in complaints and deplorings, which, to say the best, are futile, you will but stop and ask how you best may use the opportunity that has come to you; how you may keep your load from crushing others; how you may find surcease from your own sorrow in bearing the burdens of others; how the purifying influence of this suffering may make you gentler, kindlier, more hopeful, more sympathetic—then the scripture will be fulfilled in you which says that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and you will come to see that your great sorrow was your soul's great opportunity. Surely this has been the experience of multitudes in all the ages who have found their lives enriched and ennobled by their friends.—Washington Gladden.

A Personal Word

I wish to say a personal word to the readers of The Christian Century concerning the Bethany System of Sunday-school literature now at last completed. For the past four years it has been my function, as representative of the Disciples, to edit the graded lesson series in co-operation with the Sunday-school editors of the Presbyterian, Congregational and Methodist denominations.

The series is practically complete with this year. I have read manuscripts or proofs of some 120 publications. The series is the most comprehensive and adequate graded lesson system that has ever been produced. It is, too, a remarkable demonstration of the new spirit of unity among the churches. I have observed with satisfaction the disposition of my brethren of the other communions to make concessions in the interest of unity, and have been impressed as never before with the catholic position of the Disciples in being compelled to ask for so few such concessions.

Including the graded lessons the Disciples Publication Society has now completed a comprehensive system of Sunday-school literature. On returning home after a two months' trip in the interest of the new Society I am surprised and delighted at the good things accomplished in my absence. I find international uniform literature for adult classes and the home department; teacher training courses (the first standard course in preparation and the advanced standard course now ready); special texts for young peoples' and adult classes; and five weekly papers—"The Mayflower," for primary pupils, (published by the Pilgrim Press), "The Boys' World" and "The Girls' Companion (David C. Cook's popular publications), "The Junior Weekly," for boys and girls and "The Conquest" for adult and young people's classes. The two last named are new publications produced by the Disciples' Publication Society and edited by Mr. Thomas Curtis Clark. The first three mentioned have been selected, after looking the whole field over, as the very best things published. The Society intends to sell them to our schools until it finds or can produce something better.

"The Conquest" is, without doubt—if my judgment is of any value—destined to be the leading paper in its field. It is full of meat. I have just examined the proof pages of the first number and am writing this note under the enthusiasm of what I found. It is a paper with vitality and outlook. It has broken from the tradition that a Sunday-school weekly must be pale and nerveless. I think people will come to Sunday-school just to get their "Conquest" when other motives are not sufficient.

Equally attractive and original is "The Junior Weekly" for Junior boys and girls, with the same editor as "The Conquest."

Mr. Clark is well-known among the Disciples of Christ. He received his training for his present task in the Christian Publishing Company, of St. Louis, under Dr. J. H. Garrison, where for five years he worked in the Sunday-school department. His father, Rev. Thomas J. Clark, held two notable pastorates before his present charge at Albion, Ill., one at Vincennes, Ind., extending over twenty years, the other at Bloomington, Ind., covering a period of fourteen years. The son's remarkable record in the leadership of the adult classes in First Church, St. Louis, reveals him as a Sunday-school man in practice as well as in theory. He knows what a Sunday-school periodical ought to be, and is happy in the freedom now accorded him to work out his ideals. He has insight into young life, and builds his papers upon his personal knowledge of what Sunday-school youths and adults want, rather than upon some set conventions governing this type of literature.

I am pleased to say this word of introduction on behalf of Mr. Clark, and to commend the organizing and editorial talent which his efforts of the past several months in our office have displayed. With my work as editor of the graded lessons practically done, my own active connection with the Sunday-school department of this house will soon cease and my undivided effort will be given to the Christian Century. I wish at this time to suggest to all our readers who have any interest in Sunday-school work that they write to the Disciples Publication Society for the new Bulletin of Sunday-school supplies and examine it with an eye to introducing into their schools the Bethany System, including graded lessons, uniform lessons and weekly periodicals.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

Beer and Fish

Owing to a failure to pay the tax, says a recent newspaper dispatch, 3,081 barrels of beer of a defunct brewery company were poured out into the Mendota, Ill., river, resulting in the death of thousands of fish and detriment to farmers' stock along the river. The farmers are said to be up in arms and threaten dire vengeance on the city for allowing the beer to be poured into the river. Some people take more pains with their hogs than they do with their boys. They allow moral poison to be brewed for human beings to drink. It brings business to the community. But when their cattle are injured by the same stuff poured into the river, it touches them in their most sensitive spot and they have an acute attack of purse-stringitis. If beer does this to fish, what will it do to men?

Governor Cox in a recent address to the students of Ohio Northern University at Ada predicted a speedy suffrage victory in Ohio.

Canada has refused to vote $35,000,000, or any other sum, for the construction of dreadnaughts for the British navy.

A Page for Interdenominational Acquaintance

"Devoted to the Conversion of America"

The editor of this department has before him a Roman Catholic magazine entitled "The Missionary." It is a well-printed, dignified periodical of forty-three pages, exclusive of the advertising sections. It is published monthly at the Apostolic Mission House, Washington, D. C. The Paulist fathers are fathering it. It is the official organ of the official church propaganda. The Paulist fathers are experts in the art of making proselytes. They "know how." If you don't believe it, here is their own advertisement for it: "The Apostolic Mission House, situated on the grounds of the Catholic University, is a normal school for preachers and convert makers." The August number of "The Missionary" carries out the Paulist idea of convert making, with the legend, "Devoted to the Conversion of America" on the front page cover.

Two things, at the outset, may be conceded as undeniable: first, the Paulist fathers have a right to make as many "converts" as they honestly can; second, America certainly needs a "conversion" of some sort. But, here is where we Protestants come in. Roman Catholics loudly object to our sending missionaries to so-called Roman Catholic countries on the ground that the people in those countries are already baptized Christians, and yet at the same time these same people maintain missionaries in this land of baptized Christians with the avowed intention of "making converts." We see no menace in the Paulist fathers working as they do in this country, especially when we know that some of the Paulist fathers are today in New York working as pastors of Protestant churches. The convert maker, by an irony of fate, occasionally has become a convert himself, and so we are not losing any sleep over our zealous brethren of the Apostolic Mission House. But we beg leave to advise the Roman Catholic Church to play the game of convert-making fair, according to rules. If we do not object to their convert-making propaganda in this land of baptized Christians, neither should they, as they incessantly do, when we go to their lands with the helping hand of Christian uplift. What is good for the goose is good for the gander.

In meantime, let us set our own selves to the task of "converting" America. The Paulist fathers, so far as we are able to ascertain, have no monopoly on the business. Heaven knows that this land needs conversion, a conversion from materialism into spirituality, from commercialism into Christliness, from rattle-brained provincialism to Christian universalism, from gold to God, from the mania of pleasure to the pains of the cross. Will not the Paulist fathers engage themselves in a task something like this? If they do, we shall be the first to applaud and wish them Godspeed.

Clerico-Militarism.

While America is leading the world in peace-ideas, the Roman Catholics of America are revealing themselves as militarists of the most pronounced type. The "military mass" has become a feature in the life of that church, as may be seen from the following account in the Western Watchman of July 3:

Cleveland, Ohio, June 29.—One hundred thousand men and women, the largest gathering ever assembled in Cleveland at a religious service, attended the first open-air military mass in the history of Ohio Catholicism this morning in Rockefeller Park.

The mass was celebrated by Right Rev. John P. Farrelly, Bishop of Cleveland.

The big crowd, composed of Catholics and non-Catholics, stood in a huge semi-circle, banked thousands deep before the altar.

Preceding the mass was a parade of 10,000 uniformed members of the Knights of St. John and other Catholic military organizations.

At 10:20 o'clock a salute of thirteen guns of Battery A, located on the upper boulevard of Rockefeller Park, announced the arrival of the vanguard of the parade. Facing the altar and at the left of the audience were especially constructed stands for the united choir of 200 voices.

Inspired by the enthusiasm and eager anticipation of his audience, Bishop Farrelly extended his informal address scheduled to occupy ten minutes' time to half an hour. "My heart is seething with emotion as I contemplate this immense gathering," said Bishop Farrelly. "It represents in every sense of the word the true manhood and womanhood of Catholic societies in Cleveland. It is a spectacle which charms the eye."

It is not enough for the Roman Catholic Church in Cleveland to have a "military mass," but the idea is somewhat rubbed in by a salute of thirteen guns of Battery A of the Ohio National Guard. Ohio has no moral or constitutional right whatever to fire thirteen guns off in salutation to any church whatever. If Americans stand for anything at all, it is for a complete separation between church and state. But here is an instance when a state has fired off a salute of thirteen guns in honor of the Roman Catholic Church, and thereby encouraged the very thing that the best sentiment of the land opposes: militarism in a cassock.

The Emperor of Japan Honors Dr. Greene

Nearly forty-four years ago Rev. D. C. Greene and his wife landed in Japan. Since that time Dr. Greene has taken a prominent part in preaching, in teaching, in committee work and in Bible translation. He has endeared himself not only to the members of his own mission, but to foreigners and Japanese in all departments of life. In later days especially he has exerted his influence to promote good feeling between the land of his birth and that of his adoption. In recognition of this His Majesty, the Emperor of Japan, was pleased to confer upon him the third Order of the Rising Sun. A banquet was given to the doctor in honor of the decoration by his many friends on the evening of June 17 in the beautiful Uyeno Park of Tokio. About seventy-five guests were present, including representatives of the nobility, educational and business men, missionaries and other Christian leaders.

Four congratulatory addresses were given, and a long letter from Count Okuma was read. The addresses paid a fitting tribute to Dr. Greene as representing the highest type of the American Christian gentleman. Especial reference was made to his impartial views on subjects involving delicate treatment. What probably pleased him more than anything else was the glowing tribute paid to his children, all born in Japan and now in different parts of the world using their influence to cement the ties of friendship between East and West. The doctor's reply was characteristic, disclaiming any merit on his part, insisting upon the value of seeing the good in all men, and thanking the speakers for the kind references to his children.

One could write a brief history of modern Japan from the group gathered about the tables in the banquet hall. Baron Shibusana could remember Perry and tell of the march of political events from that time to the present; Kikuchi could tell of great educational change; Ukita and Ebina could paint a picture of Christianity's struggles and triumphs; and the younger men present could contrast their own modern ideas with those of their fathers who lived in the palmy days of feudalism. Dr. Greene's share in the tremendous changes of forty years makes him worthy indeed of the honor that has come to him.—The Congregationalist, Boston.

What the Preachers Get

If the figures of Mr. Everett T. Tomlinson in the August number of the World's Work are correct, there is no danger of our preachers ever getting into the "money trust." Mr. Tomlinson gives the Census Bureau figures as per the following, showing the average salaries of ministers outside the large cities:

Southern Baptist Convention (White)	$ 334
Disciples	526
United Brethren	547
Methodist Episcopal (South)	681
Northern Baptist Convention (White)	683
Presbyterian Church in U. S. (South)	857
Congregational	880
Reformed Church in America	923
Presbyterian Church in U. S. (North)	977
Methodist Episcopal (North)	741
Lutheran	744
Universalists	987
Protestant Episcopal	994
Unitarian	1,221

The leaders of other religious organizations in the United States are paid on an average as follows:

Greek Orthodox Church	$720
Russian Orthodox Church	731
Buddhist	840
Jewish Congregations	841

Mr. Tomlinson's keen remarks about church property and church debts, are also worthy of reproduction as follows:

"In the United States there are 192,795 church edifices, providing a seating capacity for 58,536,830 people. The total value of church property is $1,257,575,876. The highest average of membership per organization is found in Rhode Island, where the figures are 522. On the other hand, Oklahoma has an average membership per organization of only 53, followed in order by Florida, 66; Arkansas, 69; and West Virginia, 75. An average membership of less than 100 is reported by twelve states; of 100 or more, and less than 200, in 23 states; of 200 or more, and less than 300, 7 states; and 300 or more, 7 states. The average number per organization is 157. The average value of church property is $6,756, and the debt is $3,214. The average encumbrance upon church property varies from $12,400 in New York, $10,983 in the District of Columbia, and $8,608 in Massachusetts, to $960 in Kansas, where the average membership is 92; to $1,013 in Florida, where the average membership is 66; and to $483 in Alabama, which has an average membership of 93.

"A careful study of the data presented shows that there are 192,795 church edifices with an average of 157 members per organization, and that the debt of the average body is nearly 50 per cent of the value of the church property. This implies a heavy tax on the membership even before its legitimate work is begun. With a membership of 157, it is estimated that at least two-thirds of the members are women. This leaves 52 male members, of whom doubtless a large proportion are boys too young to be of much financial assistance. If only one-third is deducted for non-resident members, there are left approximately twenty to thirty men upon whom must fall the chief burden of support of 'the average' church. What such a tax would be if raised for other than church purposes is apparent."

Baptists Elect New General Secretary

Baptists of the whole country are rejoicing over the outcome of the Northern Baptist Convention at Detroit, of their efforts to secure Rev. Dr. Emory W. Hunt to be general secretary of the Baptist Foreign Mission Society. He had just accepted the pastorate of Emanuel Church, Brooklyn, one of the largest in the denomination, but that congregation released him in a message that produced in the Detroit Convention great enthusiasm. He was at one time pastor of Clarendon Street Church, Boston, and later president of Denison University, Ohio. Baptists have not yet reached the goal of $3,000,000 for benevolences of all kinds, but they have increased their gifts and an educational canvass is being vigorously prosecuted. Some religious bodies have doubled, even quadrupled, their benevolent incomes during the past few years, and Baptists declare they are not to fail by having their aim too low.

A Bishop at 96

Of late, this department has noted a preacher at 100 years of age getting an honorary college degree, and another preacher at work in his 94th year. And now, we present Bishop Thomas Bowman of the Methodist church celebrating his 96th anniversary. Bishop Bowman was the chaplain of the United States senate in the administration of Abraham Lincoln. When he was born, George Washington was the only president that was dead and buried. He entered the Baltimore Conference in 1839, gave 30 years to the educational interests of his church, and 24 years to the active labors of the episcopacy. The patriarchal bishop is still a familiar figure on the streets of Orange, N. J., where he resides with his daughter, Mrs. B. D. Caldwell, who gave him a birthday dinner on July 15.

What the Editor's Scissors Show

During his summer in Great Britain, Dr. Jowett has been preaching to congregations that overflowed the meeting places. At Manchester people began to assemble two hours before the hour for service. Dr. C. W. Gordon ("Ralph Connor") also is finding British audiences gratifyingly responsive.

Officers of the Second Presbyterian Church, Chicago, who had hoped to obtain Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, the Congregational preacher of Brooklyn, as a successor to Dr. John Balcom Shaw, have been notified by Dr. Cadman that he prefers to stay in the East. In declining the call he says, 'I cannot conceive a greater necessity, a greater opportunity or a more hearty and loyal response than this beloved Brooklyn and New York City presents today."

The death of Rev. George D. Matthews, D. D., general secretary of the Alliance of the Reformed Churches Throughout the World Holding the Presbyterian System, occured July 5. Dr. Matthews was 85 years old and was seriously weakened physically by his fidelity in the performance of his duties as secretary at the tenth council of the alliance, held at Aberdeen, Scotland, June 18 to 26. After the close of the council he went from Aberdeen to Edinburgh, was taken seriously ill on July 2 and passed away July 5. He was buried on July 9 in the churchyard of South Leith Parish Church in a family grave.

The New York Presbytery has taken title to the Labor Temple property in Second avenue, New York, paying $200,000 to Greenwich Church in West Thirteenth street, Dr. George Hoadley, pastor. This church will use the money as endowment. It came to it through consolidation of the Fourteenth Street Church with the old Thirteenth Street Church, the name of both being then changed to the "Greenwich Church." The Church Extension Committee of Presbytery will manage the work, the Home Mission Board, heretofore in charge, dropping out. A Sunday morning service will be maintained, Rev. Jonathan C. Day remaining in charge. This action indicates a decision on the part of the Presbytery that the experiment of a labor temple in New York, and in that location, has proven successful. It was started by Dr. Charles Stelzle, now retired from it and from the Home Mission Board, to demonstrate methods by which church and labor interests might work together and help both.

From Near and Far

Mrs. Ella Flagg Young has resumed her plans for the Chicago public schools interrupted by her recent resignation. Fortified with the knowledge that she has the support and good-will of the mayor, the school board and the public, she has entered into the work with renewed zest. Especial stress is to be laid upon the study of sex hygiene, the development of the child under the Montessori system and the extension of manual training and domestic science to a greater degree of practicality. Mrs. Young has taught in the public schools of Chicago for forty-seven years, and has been superintendent of schools in that city since 1909. When seventeen years of age, she began to teach in the first grade in 1862. She was the first woman to be placed in charge of the school system of a great city, and the first to be elected president of the National Educational Association. Her salary as superintendent is $10,000 a year. The malign influence of politics in the schools led to the resignation of Mrs. Young in the crowning period of her usefulness. Great rejoicing is evident on the part of the good citizens of Chicago, over the continuance of Mrs. Young in office. A vote of 14 to 1 showed the faith of the Board of Education in Mrs. Young's ability.

Discussing the plans of the Illinois vice commission Lieutenant Governor Barrett O'Hara said investigation work would be resumed in September. "We will give our attention to the question of wages in Illinois industries," said Mr. O'Hara. "Then we intend to study the effect of the segregation of vice. Another plan is to ascertain the owners of every piece of property in Illinois which is devoted to immoral purposes. We shall give publicity to the ownership disclosed. The New York investigating body reported that the department stores were not paying enough wages to their employes, but that there was no connection between low wages and vice. This report is regarded in all well-informed quarters in New York as a white-wash."

The will of Mrs. Anna B. Milliken, widow of James Milliken, who founded Milliken university in Decatur, Ill., was made public last week. It creates an art museum out of the large Milliken mansion. The trustees are given wide range in carrying out the will's conditions. A corporation may be formed to carry on the educational and charitable projects for which Mrs. Milliken provided by turning over all her personal and real property. The Milliken estate is worth about $1,600,000.

The adjourned session of The Hague Opium Conference has just been held. All the governments addressed except Turkey and Peru have agreed to join in the effort to put an end to the manufacture and public sale of the habit-forming drugs, such as opium, cocaine, and the like. Turkey has not yet joined the compact because she has a large poppy culture and thinks she cannot afford to lose it. Peru likewise thinks she cannot afford to lose the profits from growing the cocoa from which cocaine is prepared.

A rich Londoner recently left a large sum in trust to enable poor people to get legal help. He says that he particularly wishes his trustees "not to hesitate to take up cases for the poor against the rich or titled people or public companies or their usurers, and more especially cases arising out of street or motor accidents which cause personal injury to poor people or damage to their property and test cases or appeals, even if involving considerable expenditure."

With the apparent double objective of eliminating the possibility of money stringency in connection with the movement of the crops this year and of affording to the country a powerful object lesson as to the value of the government as an agency in the banking business, Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo proposes to turn into the channels of trade from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 now lying in the treasury vaults.

Iowa recently passed a law giving counties the right to tax themselves for public hospitals. This was the result of the work of a young country doctor who protested that there was no reason for cities having hospitals that would not equally apply to the rural districts. Several counties will immediately provide themselves with hospitals. Kansas and Michigan have passed similar laws.

That newspapers have a right to decline advertising when they deem it objectionable even if it is submitted to them under a yearly contract is the effect of a decision handed down in the District court at St. Paul, Minn. The case came up when a local department store was sued by a local paper to recover money due under a yearly contract.

The Chilean minister of foreign affairs at Washington has suggested to his country that Chilean youths after receiving their diplomas hereafter shall be sent to the United States to complete their education along practical and technical lines. Moving pictures are being used by the Chicago and Northwestern Railway to warn the public against the danger of trespassing on railroad tracks. In every city and town on its right of way films are furnished free by the company to moving picture theater owners for the purpose of demonstrating the hazard incident to walking on the right of way of a railroad.

Sunday School Hosts Assemble

Report of Notable Convention at Zurich, Switzerland

By Ira Maurice Price

Switzerland is a little country. It contains only a little over 15,000 square miles of territory—less than one third the size of the state of Illinois. But it is unique. Its area is mostly rugged and rough, with chains of mountains, many of which glitter and shine with their perpetual crowns of snow and ice. Its peoples are a composite or rather conglomerate. The north half—the Rhine valley—including the four large cities, Zurich, Basel, Berne and Luzern, are Swiss-German, that is, the people speak the German language. The Rhone valley, with Geneva as its chief city, speaks French. Southern Switzerland, including the Italian borders, speaks Italian, and the southeastern frontier—the Engadine—employs a language all its own—the Romansch—a corruption of the old Roman used there in past ages.

This little country is a republic with its capital at Berne. It needs no standing army, as the powers of Europe have pledged its neutrality, and hence its safety from all external political complications. Its people can, therefore, devote themselves entirely to the pursuits of peace, and they do.

Zurich.

Zurich is one of the largest of the six prominent cities of Switzerland. It is located at the north end of a beautiful sheet of water—Lake Zurich—nearly twenty miles long and about one mile wide, curving toward the southeast so as to form nearly one-eighth of the arc of a circle. The River Limmat, one of the affluents of the Rhine, flows out of this lake through the city. The choice city has a history coming down from Roman times, and has passed through many a fierce struggle. In the fourteenth century, however, it became a free city and is today the pride of Switzerland. Its population reaches about 175,000. It is 98 per cent Protestant, and is the home of several of the most vigorous denominations. It is the center of the Methodist Episcopal work in Europe, there being six churches and a resident bishop of that body. The Baptist church is also strong and vigorous.

The pride of Zurich points to Zwingli, the reformer, as its earliest great saint. Twelve years of service in the Grossmuenster Church gave him a residence that entitles Zurich to count him as its own. This, too, was the home of Pestalozzi, the great kindergartner and teacher of children. To both of these men Zurich has erected noble statues—Zwingli's near a church, and Pestalozzi's in a beautiful park before a public-school building.

The World's Sunday-school Association.

The fifth World's Sunday-school Convention was held in Rome in 1907. At that time there was organized the World's Sunday-school Association, officered by British and American delegates interested in world-wide Sunday-school promotion. The sixth convention met in Washington, D. C., in 1910, where plans expanded and interest extended to the farthest lands of the globe. The World's Association has for its purpose Sunday-school promotion to the uttermost parts of the earth. It works through existing agencies so far as possible and makes grants of money and sends secretaries to lands and peoples where the doors are open and where its help is welcomed.

The Seventh Convention Assembling.

For more than a year plans have been in progress for the seventh convention. Steamships were chartered and delegates appointed many months ago, to meet in this beautiful city. On the days of July 7-10 more than 1,300 American delegates reached this center for the convention (July 8-15), and nearly as many more from more than fifty foreign countries. More than 2,500 delegates from outside had registered by July 12. Of these over 200 were missionaries from every prominent land on the globe.

The Program and Place.

The program was a stupendous creation. It covered eight days, provided for forty-seven separate sessions, as many as six sometimes being in operation simultaneously, with about 250 participants, from fifty different nations of the world. In almost every case, the speakers came without expense to the World's Association, and many of them spoke ten minutes or less. The prevailing language used was English in the great morning and evening gatherings, though some addresses were made in German and French. English addresses were interpreted into German, and French into English. But afternoon sessions were either wholly in English, French or German without an interpreter.

The main place of meeting was one of the best I ever saw—a building designed for a music hall (Tonhalle). It had fixed seats for 1,800 people, but with chairs accommodated over 2,000 persons. There hung on the walls of three sides of the room the shields of about sixty-four countries; exactly over the platform hung an inflated globe lighted from the inside, about twelve feet in diameter, and directly over it an illuminated red cross. In front of the great organ was the flag of Switzerland, and hanging on the right the stars and stripes, and on the left the union jack.

Reports of Commissions.

Only the briefest reference can be made to features of the convention. The liveliest interest was attached to reports from foreign fields. These were really under the auspices of six commissions: (1) Continental Europe; (2) South Africa; (3) India; (4) the Orient (comprising Hawaii, Japan, Korea and China); (5) Latin America; (6) Mohammedan lands. These commissions are composed in most cases of men who are on the fields, who understand fully the situation, and can speak with authority. Large numbers of other foreign missionaries also contributed many inspiring words to interest aroused by the reports of the commissions.

The two reports which markedly stirred the convention were those from "Mohammedan lands" and "the Orient." On the situation in Mohammedan lands we had such speakers as Bishop J. C. Hartzell, of Africa, Dr. S. M. Zwemer, of Cairo, Egypt, and Dr. J. P. McNaughton, of Turkey—all informed at first-hand on the critical movements in the Turkish Empire. No published reports or statements have ever presented such a picture of Turkey's present humiliation and ready concession to the requests and claims of Christian missionaries for freedom of speech and liberty of action.

Large popular interest had been taken in the tour of the Orient planned and carried out by Mr. H. J. Heinz, of Pittsburgh. Twenty-nine Sunday-school people embarked at San Francisco, Mar. 1, to make a study of Sunday-school conditions in Hawaii, Japan, Korea and China. Results of the four months' tour were presented with addresses, and a stereopticon exhibit of meetings held and scenes on the tour. Mr. Heinz and Mr. Frank L. Brown, and Rev. W. G. Landes, of Pennsylvania, were the principal figures in the presentation.

Reports

from the individual missionaries would be extremely interesting. Lack of space will admit only a mention. In the Philippines where a few years ago there was not a single child in Sunday-school, there are now 36,000, meeting every Sunday, under competent teachers, to study the Bible. In Korea there are now 200,000 in Sunday-school. Their policy is, the whole church in the Sunday-school. In India, in China and Japan the work is expanding in great proportions because of the coöperation of the World's Sunday-school Association. But all the addresses given at the convention will be published in full in English in the proceedings to be sold at $1, and in a condensed form in German and in French, to be sold at one franc per copy. I venture to say that with the possible exception of the Edinburgh Convention none ever held has brought out such a fund of valuable information for the use of Christian workers as this seventh World's Sunday-school Convention.

What of the Future?

The chief officers for the next triennium (1913-1916) are: President, Sir Robert Laidlaw, of London, England; chairman of the executive committee, Mr. H. J. Heinz, of Pittsburgh, United States; treasurer, Mr. F. A. Wells, of Chicago. The election of general secretaries is left to the executive committee, but it is expected that the two men upon whom the constructing of the present program devolved, will be their own successors, Mr. Marion Lawrance, of Chicago, and Mr. Carey Bonner, of London.

Upon a most urgent invitation from the Sunday-school union and government officials of Japan, the convention unanimously and enthusiastically voted to hold the eighth World's Sunday-school Convention in Tokyo in 1916.

As a token of the convention's sturdy belief in the efficiency of the work done, there was subscribed in one evening the sum of $110,000 toward the maintenance and expansion of the work for the next three years. Mr. Hartshorn, of Boston, whose superb work for the association in the past is well known, subscribed $45,000; and Mr. Heinz, of Pittsburgh, $12,000. There were also many other givers of influence and power in the counsels of the association. The whole-world idea, the union of Sunday-school work and its vigorous expansion in all lands seemed to dominate all the actions of the convention.

Zurich, July 15, 1913.

A resolution unanimously indorsing woman suffrage was adopted recently by the Ohio Christian Endeavor Society.

Chicago is to have ten women police. They will be assigned to parks and bathing beaches.

Los Angeles Entertains Endeavorers

"Increase" and "Efficiency," Keynotes of Great Convention

July 9-14, 1913

Los Angeles furnished an ideal setting for the convention. The weather, although considered unusually hot for Los Angeles, was, with the cool nights, a refreshing contrast to the intense heat in the middle and eastern states.

No hall in the city could accommodate the crowds expected, so the large-visioned committee put a canvas roof over Fiesta Park, making two auditoriums accommodating nearly 20,000 people. One was used as headquarters for the states and the other for the great mass meeting. In addition simultaneous meetings were held in the Temple Auditorium, and a score of churches.

Francis E. Clark.

In spite of the ample provision made, overflow meetings were necessary to accommodate the tens of thousands who sought opportunity to gain the inspiration of the great meetings, and the second day of the convention the supply of programs and badges was exhausted.

Features.

The street parade was a new feature and as the marching thousands of happy young people with music and song passed by, they made a profound impression on the tens of thousands of spectators who crowded the sidewalks.

The committee under the leadership of Mr. Leonard Merrill provided for every need, and the immense crowds were handled as easily and the meetings were as orderly as in an ordinary sized convention. The spirit of devotion and enthusiasm was contagious. The denominational rallies were more largely attended and successful than in any recent convention.

A Varied Program.

Every phase of religious activity was considered in practical conferences or inspirational addresses.

Pres. Henry Churchill King, of Oberlin College, one of our clearest and best balanced thinkers, led the great throng that met him each morning at 6:30 into the real meaning of "Life's Values." Dr. John Balcom Shaw conducted a most helpful series of conferences on "The Use of the Bible for Personal Growth and Service."

Dr. A. L. Phillips opened up the vast field of missions at home and abroad, and challenged the church of the future to plan adequately for the task committed to it. Dr. Charles M. Sheldon had three sessions with the pastors and older leaders to discuss the application of the "Old Gospel to New World Conditions." Social purity work for men was most effectively presented by Rev. E. A. King, and for women by Mrs. J. S. Norvell.

Practical conferences on every phase of Christian Endeavor work were conducted by General Secretary William Shaw, Field Secretary Karl Lehmann and a score of Christian Endeavor expert workers. Enormous crowds attended the four noon-day meetings in the Temple Auditorium, when vital questions relating to our civic, social and religious conditions were discussed by Dr. Ira Landrith, Hon. J. A. MacDonald, Dr. John Balcom Shaw and "Billy" Sunday.

The appeal of social service, the place of the Sabbath in present-day civilization, and the spiritual dynamic necessary to all permanent moral reform were handled in an inspiring way.

Rev. "Billy" Sunday conducted seven great evangelistic services. This much-criticised, but popular evangelist won the hearts of those who were able to get into the great auditorium. Hundreds were converted and thousands of Christians were quickened and inspired to more consistent living and larger service. Street meetings in many languages to reach the cosmopolitan population were held every day with most encouraging results.

Increase and Efficiency.

The past four years have been years of steady increase and efficiency. President Clark linked these words together as the watchwords for the coming years and suggested the establishment of Christian Endeavor Week as a stock-taking time, a time to review the past, emphasize the present and lay plans for a larger future. The suggestion was adopted, and definite plans and suggestions will be prepared by the United Society.

General Secretary Shaw, in presenting his encouraging report showing the practical efficiency of the societies, adopted the novel plan of illustrating the various lines of work by stereopticon pictures, showing the Endeavorers at work, and something of the actual results accomplished.

Carefully gathered statistics show that from 80 to 99 per cent of the Sunday-school teachers and officers and church workers come from the active membership of the Christian Endeavor societies. A long and illuminating list of lines of service actually carried on by the societies was given. The reports of Mr. A. J. Shartle, manager, and Mr. H. N. Lathrop, treasurer, showed that the business and finances were in fine condition.

A Recruiting Ground.

A new feature of the convention was the "Decision Service," conducted by Dr. L. A. McAfee at the close of the principal sessions. Hundreds of choice young men and women made a definite covenant to endeavor to so shape their life plans as to give themselves to the ministry, missions or some other form of religious service.

Temperance and Christian citizenship were strongly emphasized and under the leadership of Mr. Daniel A. Poling, a program of education and agitation, aiming at the annihilation of the liquor business, and "A Saloonless Nation by 1920," was adopted and will be vigorously pushed. This campaign will unite and utilize all existing temperance organizations on a nation-wide program, each working it out along its own particular line.

Beecher's Humor

The following characteristic story of Mr. Beecher I heard from a college classmate, now dead, who was a Presbyterian pastor in Indianapolis and was present when the incident occurred: Mr. Beecher was pastor of a Presbyterian church in Indianapolis when called to Brooklyn. His people there were very fond of him and he of them. Whenever possible he would stop off, as he was passing through the city on his lecture tours, and spend a day with his old friends. In this way he saw them about once a year for many years.

During the latter years of his life he had not been able to do this and thirteen years passed without his seeing them. But in the very last year of his life he was able to spend a day in the city. One of his old parishioners met him at the station, took him to his home and during the day they drove about the city and called upon the few who were left. That evening the ministers of the city had a meeting to treat of some questions of local interest and Mr. Beecher was taken to the meeting. When he arrived they were already in session, but as the distinguished visitor appeared in the doorway, all arose out of respect to him. As they stood, the chairman addressed a few words of welcome and among other things he said, "Doubtless you find few of your old friends here in Indianapolis, after so many years of absence, but we who are here welcome you just as warmly."

The experiences of the day and the cordial greeting deeply touched the old man, and he replied, all still standing. He closed with these words: "Your chairman has said that I have found few of my old friends here in the city. It is true. I found only Mr. ———. Mr. ——— and Mr. ——— (naming four or five of the old men of the city.) But this afternoon we drove out to Cedar Hill (the cemetery) and I found them. They are all there —sleeping just as peacefully as they used to do under my sermons."—J. M. Kyle, in Congregationalist.

—A good thing to do when you pray is to ask God to bless somebody you don't like.

All over the world, so long as religion consisted of dead institutions, or dead institutions pretended to be religion; so long as priests walked up and down the earth claiming supernal power, and professing to wield it; so long as men fought for abstractions, and called abstract doctrines religion, or held them up as indispensable to religion—so long there could be no unity; the sticks lay dead in the old fire-place, or on the altar; but just as soon as the concurrent feelings of mankind begin jointly to look upon religion as love to God and love to man—just as soon as the common feeling is goodwill—the sticks will begin to burn; and the moment they begin to burn, nothing in God's universe can stop their coming together; and this feeling is that which is forging unity.

—Beecher.

"The Inside of the Cup"

A Review of Winston Churchill's Recent Religious Novel

Rev. Wm. T. McElveen, Ph. D., Evanston

Mr. Winston Churchill's new novel is as the title suggests a religious novel. It is a bulky volume of over five hundred pages. It is a very informing book. It deals with many of the problems of the hour. It discusses ecclesiastical, doctrinal, social and industrial questions. It is as the author says "the product of many years of study, reflection and experience." Mr. Churchill says he does not "pose as a theologian," yet many theological questions are debated in his book. It is the story of the mental and spiritual transformation of a clergyman. This clergyman, John Hodder, is an extreme Anglican. He writes the word church with a capital, and insists that the church has not only moral, but mental authority over men. After his conversion he described his former self as a "narrow, complacent, fashionable priest." The book tells of his many awakenings, and of his finally becoming a broad-minded, spiritual prophet. John Hodder intended to be a lawyer. But on the Sunday afternoon he is to discuss his future with a prominent New York lawyer, he attends a church service at which he feels that God has called him to the ministry. After three years' study at a High Church Seminary at which he is taught that the church is the "sole custodian of spiritual truth," he becomes the pastor of a country church. There he is a success. There "his religion" worked. Then he is called to St. John's church in a prosperous Middle West city. It is a downtown church. It is a beautiful edifice in a community which was once fashionable, but which is now morally as well as materially down at the heel. Dalton street, which is just around the corner from the church, is the catch basin for the human rubbish of the city. There vice is shameless and defiant.

A Handicapped Church.

St. John's is run by a moneyed clique. The chief of this clique is Eldon Parr, a financier. He had come to the city a poor boy. He had worked, saved and fought and made money. Much of his money he had made illegitimately. Religion to him was not life, it was a chore that he performed on Sunday. He was an arbitrary man who regarded himself as "the creator and the custodian of American prosperity." He gave money judiciously and generously to every charity. He was "the benefactor of an adulatory public." He was the leading vestryman of St. John's, and the most prominent layman in the diocese. Financially he had made several of his fellow vestrymen. But in doing this, he financially ruined thousands of others. One of these vestrymen is Nelson Langmaid, who was a past grand master in the art of advising financiers how to do dishonest things legally. His most notable achievement was making the thieving Consolidated Tractions Company a "law proof possibility." Another of his fellow vestrymen is Mr. Ferguson, the proprietor of a department store that pays its saleswomen starvation wages.

Some Riddles.

Mrs. Goodrich, one of his parishioners, has some doubts. He tells her that faith is like an egg. "It must be kept whole; if its shell is chipped, it is spoiled." He describes independent thinking as "mental anarchy." He urges her to accept what the church teaches simply because the church teaches it. Mrs. Constable urges him to read books that discuss the economic side of Christianity, but he refuses. She begs him to officiate at the wedding of her daughter, who had been divorced, and suggests that "two very excellent people may demoralize each other if they are ill-mated." Again he refuses. He dines with and learns something about Eldon Parr. Preston Parr, the son, is away from home because his father had been too domineering with him. When he had insisted upon marrying a poor girl, his father had bought her off. Alison Parr, the daughter, was an individualist. She wanted to make something of herself. Her father never understood her. They quarreled frequently. Finally she left him and studied in New York and Paris, and became a very successful landscape gardener.

During his second year at St. John's, John Hodder worked assiduously. He comes to think that perhaps an institutional annex to his church may help him in ministering to the community. Eldon Parr promises to build an up-to-date plant. Mr. Ferguson promises assistance. McCrae, the curate, regards the institutional feature as a compromise. He believes it will minister to the children, but that it will not remove the source of the evil. At a dinner party John Hodder learns how Eldon Parr and Tom Beatty, the city boss, who had made his pile, were associates in many a vile enterprise. He meets Alison Parr. She objects to his giving the church all authority. She tells him that Christianity is "incendiary," and that the "idea of Brotherhood is nitro-glycerine." It will burn up all the dross and consume all the evil. She insists that doling out charity is not carrying out the principles of Christianity. She makes him see that some of his beliefs are not in accordance with the teachings of Jesus. He experiences a personal awakening. He realizes that his church is "paralyzed and chained." He tells his assistant he is going away for the summer. His train starts at five o'clock. At three o'clock he goes in his church and hears Mrs. Garvin praying for her boy Dickey who is seriously ill. He takes Mrs. Garvin home. He finds Mr. Garvin crazed by the loss of his money, and bitter against the church. He discovers that Eldon Parr's scheme to create the Consolidated Tractions Company has financially ruined Garvin. He goes next door to request a woman of the street to cease playing and singing that the sick boy may sleep. She tells him how many of the girls who formerly worked in Ferguson's store are now living "the easiest way." He learns that this girl is Kate Marcy, the young woman whom Preston Parr desired to marry. He comes to know Mr. Bentley, a former member of St. John's church. Mr. Bentley had lost the larger part of his fortune in one of Eldon Parr's thieving schemes, and had invested the rest of it in a kind of social settlement. So interested does Hodder become in the Garvins, Kate Marcy, and Mr. Bentley's ameliorating schemes that he forgets about his train. Instead of going away he stays in the city all summer. In the morning he studies the books he had previously hated, and in the afternoon he does social work with Mr. Bentley. He frequently meets Alison Parr. He does much to modify her individualism, and she does much to spiritualize his religion. During the summer he learns much; he is born again. Intellectually he comes to what he calls "the extreme Protestant position." He no longer believes in "the external and imposed authority of the church." The core of his new faith is Paul's idea of redemption by faith. Spiritually he is a new man. He tells Alison Parr "the convictions I formerly held, I have lost." He tells her too of the joy he finds in his new faith. He decides to stay in the church, and work for its reformation.

Friends and Enemies.

Mr. Engel, the librarian, assures Hodder that this is a reading age, and that many people are reading books on vital religion. Hodder informs McCrea of his change of belief, and is astonished to find that the little curate has been hoping and praying that the change would come. He tells Mrs. Goodrich that he has changed his mind about many things, and she and her husband become his zealous supporters. He has a frank talk with Eldon Parr. He tells him of Garvin, of Kate Marcy, and of his suspicions that the Consolidated Tractions was not organized in good faith. Eldon Parr replies, "business is war; if a man does not exterminate his rivals, they will exterminate him. In other days churches were built and endowed with the spoils of war. Today churches accept the support and gifts of business men." Hodder can create no sense of guilt in Eldon Parr. The following Sunday he preaches a sermon on the text "Except a man be born again." After insisting that religion is spiritual, and not ceremonial, he frankly tells the people of his change of belief. He urges that reform begin in the House of God. The church is divided. Some protest, others commend. The vestry meets. Eldon Parr is aroused, relentless. His hirelings urge that Hodder resign. And when Hodder declines to resign, Parr withdraws his support from the church.

Alison Parr urges Hodder to be loyal to all the truth he knows. Mr. Bentley comes back to the church. Bedloe Hubbell, the leader of the Municipal Reform League, becomes an active worker in the church. Many curious people, some poor people, attend the church services, and St. John's enters upon its larger and more democratic mission.

Retribution.

Kate Marcy, who is lost for a few days, returns to Mr. Bentley's settlement, and in the cab in which she returns is found the dead body of Preston Parr. Hodder goes to tell Eldon Parr of his son's death. He meets Alison who informs her father, and Parr comes to Bentley's settlement to see the dead body of his son. He orders Kate Marcy away, but Alison reminds him "he belonged to her, not to us, and we must take her home with us." Kate Marcy refuses to live with Eldon Parr, and goes out into the darkness.

On the evening previous to Hodder's visit to the Bishop, Alison Parr puts her hand in that of John Hodder, and they become engaged. He makes Christianity intelligible and acceptable to her, and she makes him broader and more human. After the funeral Parr sends for Hodder. He announces that if Alison marries Hodder, he will disinherit her. When Hodder informs him that that fact will not change their plans, Parr tries to bribe Hodder. He promises "to settle on Alison a sufficient sum of money that will enable them to live in comfort the rest of their lives" if Hodder will be "sensible and resign from St. John's." This Hodder refuses to do. Parr then tells them of his plan to retire from business, and to spend the rest of his life in giving away his money. Hodder tells him that the greatest wealth is to know God, and the greatest joy is to co-operate with Christ in the extension of His Kingdom. But the financier won't repent, and Alison and Hodder go to Mr. Bentley's to prepare for their wedding.

Chaffing a Persian Brigand

Rev. Frederick G. Coan, nephew of the famous Dr. Titus Coan (the great missionary who Christianized the Hawaiian Islands), is spending this year at home on furlough from his devoted work in Persia. The addresses which he has been making among the churches are very interestingly flavored with the spice of adventure, says an exchange. Most dramatic of all his stories is his experience with a highwayman on a remote mountain road as he was returning from one of his itinerating tours. The tale loses a great deal of its thrill inevitably when repeated apart from the personality of Dr. Coan, but it is a good story even in cold type.

The road down which Dr. Coan was riding on the day of the incident was barely wide enough for the wary feet of his mule. It would have been impossible either to pass another traveler or to turn around on the narrow shelf of rock along which the animal had to pick its way. So there was nothing to do but stop when a brawny mountaineer stood out in the pathway from behind a bend in the road. The Persian, an evil specimen, advanced on the missionary with gleaming knife upraised in his hand. The sight was not a reassuring one certainly, but Dr. Coan, determining to make the best of the situation, smiled broadly at the fellow and asked gently:

"What are you going to do?"

The reply was gruff and unmistakably serious enough: "I am going to kill you."

Dr. Coan continued to smile.

"What are you grinning at? This is no laughing matter," growled the brigand, coming close.

Dr. Coan knew it wasn't, but he couldn't think of anything else to do that would be any more appropriate.

"Why do you want to kill me, anyhow? I never harmed you."

"No, I know you didn't, but I don't want you traveling along this road," was the surly answer.

The missionary was the personification of politeness.

"I didn't know you would have any objection," he murmured soothingly. "I am sure that if you will show me any other road to go on, I should be most happy to go that way. Shall we go back and look for another raed?"

"Don't Talk to the Motorman"

"Non parlate al manovratore" is placarded over the [Florentine] motorman's head. But fortunately this interdiction of speech, while it may keep others silent, does not seem to apply to the manovratore in the least. So he talks to you, to himself, to the donkey-carts and oxen-drivers of the country road; to the bicyclers and busmen of the city streets and the dust-covered pedestrians of the side paths. And rarely does his talk miss point; there is always in it a touch of humor or wit, of impudence or mordant advice. It is a whole philosophy in interjection and passing comment; an exercise of the Tuscan heritage come down from the master wits of the Renaissance. It is the transmitted poetry and epigrams of the days of Lorenzo.

As we are ready to start, a bus blocks our way. Imprecations hurl up and down between the perched bus-driver and the tram platform. The busman reviles the lowly position of the motorman. "But you must be a much worse sort than I," replies our man of the electric current, "for they put you up there alone, away from your passengers. We tram men associate with people, we."—Max Vernon, in In and Out of Florence.

ROSE TRUMBULL IN THE INDEPENDENT.

"O mother, see the mill lights in the darkness glow!"
"I see but candles for my dead
At foot and head."

"Nay, see how wrought by childish hands, world-fabrics grow!"
"I see my babes, decrepit, bowed—
They weave a shroud."

"Yet see their golden wage: the purse of wealth is deep."
"The tide of barter at its flood Gives bread for blood!"

"O mother, with thy visions dark, dost thou not weep?"
"For slaughtered babes upon such biers
There are no tears."

Cash Prizes to Writers

The American Sunday School Union offers $2,000 in three prizes for three books as follows: 1. One thousand dollars to the author who presents the best original work upon "Christian Unity: Jesus Christ's Idea of It; How and Why It Should Be Realized Today." 2. Six hundred dollars for the best original work, and $400 for the next best original work, to be written upon the topic, "Amusements: How can They Be Made to Promote the Highest Well-Being of Society."

The society desires works of a practical, instructive and popular character, convenient in size, having about 40,000 to about 70,000 words in each book. Further information may be obtained from the American Sunday School Union, 1816 Chestnut street, Philadelphia.

The Boys' Department workers of the Young Men's Christian Association estimate that there are in this country eight million boys in the field they would occupy.

Crime statistics show that young men and unmarried men furnish the great majority of our criminals.

A Page of Human Interest

SENATOR CLAPP ON ROOSEVELT.

Senator Clapp, at a dinner in Washington, chuckled over the appearance before his committee of Colonel Roosevelt.

"The colonel," he said, "certainly got back at everybody. He reminded me of the Irishman.

"A friend of mine, traveling in Ireland, stopped for a drink of milk at a white cottage with a thatched roof, and, as he sipped his refreshment, he noted, on a center table under a glass dome, a brick with a faded red rose upon the top of it.

"'Why do you cherish in this way,' my friend said to his host, 'that common brick and that dead rose?'

"'Shure, sir,' was the reply, 'there's certain memories attachin' to them. Do ye see this big dent in my head? Well, it was made by that brick.'

"'But the rose?' said my friend.

"His host smiled quietly.

"'The rose,' he explained, 'is off the grave of the man that threw the brick.'"—New York Tribune.

WHY JOE JEFFERSON WAS AWAKENED.

Joe Jefferson once played a one-night engagement as "Rip Van Winkle" in a small Indiana town. In the hotel at which he stopped was an Irish porter, who, from the serious interest he took in the house, might have been the proprietor. At six o'clock the next morning Mr. Jefferson was awakened by a violent thumping on his door. He had left no "call" order, but his sleep was spoiled, so he arose and soon appeared before the clerk indignantly demanding to know why he had been called.

The Irishman was summoned. "Mike, there was no call for Mr. Jefferson," said the clerk. "Why did you disturb him?"

Taking the clerk by the coat the Hibernian led him to one side and said, in a whisper: "He were shnoring loike a horse, sor, and Oi'd heerd the b'ys say as how he were onct afther shlaping for twinty years, so Oi sez to mesilf: 'Moike, it's a cooming on to him ag'in, and it's yer duty to git him right out o' yer hourse.'"

FOREPAUGH'S PARROT.

"Old Adam Forepaugh," said a friend of the veteran showman, "once had a big white parrot that had learned to say: 'One at a time, gentlemen—one at a time—don't crush.'

"The bird had, of course, acquired this sentence from the ticket-taker of the show. Well, one day the parrot got lost in the country, and Mr. Forepaugh leaped into his buggy and started out post-haste to hunt for it.

"People here and there who had seen the parrot directed him in his quest, and finally, as he was driving by a cornfield, he was overjoyed to hear a familiar voice.

"He got out and entered the field, and found the parrot in the middle of a flock of crows that had pecked him till he was almost featherless. As the crows bit and nipped away, the parrot, lying on his side, repeated over and over: 'One at a time, gentlemen—one at a time—don't crush.'"

WHY HE WAS A SOCIALIST.

Upton Sinclair tells this story about a school address he once made.

"It was a school of little boys," said Mr. Sinclair, "and I opened my address by laying a five-dollar bill upon the table.

"'I am going to talk to you boys about Socialism,' I said, 'and when I finish the boy who gives me the best reason for turning Socialist will get this five-dollar bill.'

"Then I spoke for some twenty minutes. The boys were all converted at the end. I began to question them.

"'You are a Socialist?' I said to the boy nearest me.

"'Yes, sir,' he replied.

"'And why are you a Socialist?' I asked.

"He pointed to the five-dollar bill. 'Because I need the money, he said."

A STORY OF FREDERICK THE GREAT.

Many are the stories told of the wit and humor of King Frederick the Great of Prussia. Thus, a Protestant pastor of Potsdam went out to an adjacent village on a certain Sunday morning to preach. Suddenly a rabbit ran across his path. The holy man, having no other weapon, hurled his Bible at the venturesome intruder. It must have been a book of some size, for it killed the rabbit, whom the minister bore away in triumph as his lawful prize. The game warden thought otherwise, and brought charge [illegible] preacher. The latter refused to pay the [illegible]ly the matter was brought to the king [illegible]derick issued a decree that [illegible] kill with his Bible

ALFRED NOYES ON POETRY.

Alfred Noyes, the British poet, though usually very successful in marketing his wares, suffered a slump on toward the end of his American visit, and naturally became low-spirited in consequence.

"Everything seems to be going wrong," he sighed one evening at the Franklin Inn in Philadelphia. "I'll have to change my luck somehow or other."

He laughed grimly and resumed:

"I asked the maid at my lodgings this morning what had become of the paper that I'd left lying on my desk.

"'O, sir,' said she, 'I thought it was waste paper, and I threw it in the waste paper basket.'

"'No,' said I, 'it wasn't waste paper. I hadn't written anything on it yet.'"—Daily Magazine.

FRANK R. STOCKTON TELLS EXPERIENCE.

When Frank Stockton started out with his Rudder Grange experiences he undertook to keep chickens. One old motherly Plymouth Rock brought out a brood late in the fall, and Stockton gave her a good deal of attention. He named each of the chicks after some literary friend, among the rest Mary Mapes Dodge. Mrs. Dodge was visiting the farm some time later, and, happening to think of her namesake, she said: "By the way, Frank, how does little Mary Mapes Dodge get along?"

"The funny thing about little Mary Mapes Dodge," said he, "is she turns out to be Thomas Bailey Aldrich."—Everybody's Magazine.

RUSKIN'S COFFEE.

It would seem as if Ruskin were willing to carry his idea of perfection in detail, even into cooking. Mrs. Alec Tweedie tells a story of him in this connection in her book of reminiscences.

On the first night of his first visit in Ruskin's home, Ruskin asked my father whether he liked tea or coffee before he got up.

"A cup of tea," he replied.

"Why don't you choose coffee?"

"Well, to tell the truth, I have lived so much abroad that I don't fancy English coffee, it is generally so badly made."

WHY IT'S A DRUG.

William Jennings Bryan, at one of his famous grape juice dinners in Washington, gave a young French diplomat some good advice on temperance.

"Ah," said Mr. Bryan, "if all the people I've advised on temperance had only followed my lead there'd be a good many less beer saloons."

He paused, then added:

"But advice has always been a drug on the market. The enormous supply has killed the demand."

THE LUCKY ARCHITECT.

Secrtary Bryan was listening, with an inscrutable smile, to the praises of a financial magnate that a senator was singing at a dinner.

"He's the architect of his own fortune, too," said the senator; "entirely the architect of his own fortune."

"Well," said Secretary Bryan, "it's a lucky thing for him that the building inspector didn't come round while the operation was going on."

ONLY ONE CHANGE.

A man who had bought one of John H. Twachtman's landscapes wished his opinion on the hanging of the picture. Mr. Twachtman expressed his approval of the background, the height at which the canvas was hung and the light. "Indeed," he said, "there is only one change to make." "What is that?" inquired his host, solicitously. "Why," said the artist, "I should hang it the other side up. I always have."—Everybody's Magazine.

DREAMS OF YOUTH.

Booth Tarkington, at a dinner in Indianapolis, talked about the dreams of youth.

"If the average man," he said, "could achieve at 50 or 60 what at 18 he promised himself to reach before he was 25 you couldn't go out of the house without falling over Croesuses and Shakespeares, Michael Angelos and Beethovens."

THE REBUKED PESSIMIST.

Helen Keller, blind and deaf, is a great optimist and her optimism finds vent in many poetical phrases.

Miss Keller, at a tea in Boston, took to task a novelist who had become pessimistic because his last book had fallen flat.

"You say we have outgrown our illusions," she remarked, "but is not that the greatest illusion of all?"

SENATOR HANNA'S BIG WISH.

Senator Hanna was once asked if he ever cherished a wish for something in addition to his present achievements. The questioner wished to decoy him into an expression of political ambition. But he replied, looking along the dinner table at which they were seated: "Yes, I have one wish. I wish that I might eat what I please, and compel some Democrat to digest it."—Exchange.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

Conference of Foreign Missionaries

There was an elect gathering at the College of Missions in Indianapolis for three days in the latter part of July. It was a conference of the missionaries of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, some of them at home on furlough, others newly appointed on the eve of departure for the far off fields. The faculty of the College of Missions and all the officers of the two societies were present, with the exception of the beloved F. M. Rains, who was kept away by sickness. In addition to these, some of the home workers of the Woman's Board were in attendance, and many friends from Indianapolis and places near by. The purpose of the conference, as stated on the program, was, "for the discussion and study of themes relating to the work of the missionaries and the societies, and for mutual fellowship and acquaintance."

The Missionaries.

The ends of the earth were met in Graham Chapel, when the conference opened on the morning of Tuesday, July 22. India, China, Tibet, Japan, the Philippine Islands, Liberia and the Belgian Congo in Africa, Cuba and Mexico were represented by about forty missionaries, ten of these going out for the third time. India led in numbers; fifteen men and women were present from stations at Bilaspur, Mahoba, Kulpahar, Maudha, Damoh, Harda, Mungeli, and two of the new missionaries were going to the language school at Lucknow. In this group were a young bride and groom, just beginning their missionary pilgrimage, and Miss Mary Kingsbury, who was one of that heroic band of pioneers who went to India in 1882—first fruits of the Disciples of Christ for foreign missions. She has been in India for thirty-one years, and hopes to be there many more; all of her long period of service has been spent at Bilaspur, almost entirely in orphanage work. No tongue can tell what transformations of life and character have been wrought by this modest, gentle woman.

Always sitting beside her, was Mrs. Bertha F. Lohr, who has served in India for twenty-six years, much of that long period of time conducting the successful schools at Bilaspur; she is now in charge of the mission at Kulpahar, where there are seventy women, and twenty or thirty babies; it is an industrial colony, and every one, even the little group of blind women, has her daily tasks to perform. The station has fifteen acres of land where the women raise many things, besides doing their household tasks, and the exquisite needlework in which they excel. They are paid a small wage for their day's labor, and from this they supply their food and clothing as soon as they are able. There is a mission shop on the compound where all they need can be bought at reasonable rates. Thirty of the women are now entirely self-supporting, and all are encouraged and stimulated to earn their own living.

Another of the India veterans is Miss Mattie Burgess, of Mahoba, who has been on the field for twenty years; these three quiet women were the seniors in service of those assembled at the conference; neither of them was on the program, but their very presence, and the knowledge of their good works were far more eloquent than words. All of them are mothers of many daughters, rescued from heathenism, who rise and call them blessed. It was an inspiration and a benediction to meet them, and have fellowship with them.

The group from the Congo in Africa opened our hearts anew to the wonders being wrought there. There was only one representative from China—Justin Brown, of Luchowfu, where the Christian Woman's Board of Missions will soon open its new girls' school. The presence of Mr. and Mrs. James C. Ogden, and their two little children, brought afresh to mind their thrilling escape from far Tibet. Mr. Ogden was not well enough to tell again the wonderful story that has touched so many hearts, but the presence of the brave little family added much to the interest of the conference.

The Program.

The program was of unbroken excellence; the papers and addresses were on vital subjects, and were most carefully prepared, and the remark was often made that the proceedings were as enjoyable and edifying as those of our national conventions. Every one there was either a missionary, or an enthusiastic believer in missions—there was nothing to distract or wean away, and that created an atmosphere as helpful as the program itself.

Our ministers and college men gave most generously from their rich stores of spiritual experience; all of the Bible studies were thoughtful and stimulating. Professor Alva W. Taylor came from Columbia, Missouri, to speak on his great theme, "The Social Side of Missions." F. W. Burnham came from Springfield, Illinois, to give his paper on "The Holy Spirit in Missions." President C. T. Paul gave an incomparable address on the congenial topic, "The Intellectual Life of the Missionary," and Dr. H. C. Hurd, and Professor J. McGavran, of the faculty of the College of Missions, gave valuable papers. President McLean read an illuminating paper on "The Attitude of the Missionary," and the two secretaries of the foreign society gave notable addresses; the president and secretaries of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions made helpful contributions to the exercises.

The addresses of the missionaries were, as usual, the high water mark of the conference. To the regret of all, Dr. J. C. Garritt, who was to have spoken on "The Situation in China," was prevented from coming, but the addresses of Bruce L. Kershner, of Manila, on "The Philippine Islands in Their Relation to the Orient," and of Herbert Smith, of Lotumbe, on "The Work of a Mission Station in Africa," warmed all hearts to the needs of those distant lands.

But nothing more eloquent or touching was said, than when each of the volunteers told in a sentence why he was going as a missionary, and each of those on furlough told why he was returning to his field. The words and statements were brief and simple, but they sounded the depths of meaning and reached heights of aspiration in the Christian life.

The vesper service on the last evening of the conference, when tender and cheering words were spoken to the new missionaries, so soon to sail to their far fields, was full of feeling. They were to go to Japan, the Philippines, India, Africa and Cuba. Many remembered Lewis Hurt, who had already sailed for Liberia, to join his college friend, Emory Ross, and Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, who were unable to be present, but would soon start on their long journey to the Congo.

Blessed are such conferences—not only because so many choice things are said, but because such deep things are felt. The memory of the fellowship of those three days will linger like the fragrance of unseen flowers, long after the missionaries have gone to their far countries, and will help to bridge the seas that flow between them and us.

For the Quiet Hour

Certainly, in our own little sphere it is not the most active people to whom we owe the most. Among the common people whom we know, it is not necessarily those who are busiest, not those who, meteorlike, are ever on the rush after some visible change and work—it is the lives, like the stars, which simply pour down on us the calm light of their bright and faithful being, up to which we look and out of which we gather the deepest calm and courage. It seems to me that there is reassurance here for many of us who seem to have no chance for active usefulness. We can do nothing for our fellow-men. But still it is good to know that we can be something for them; to know (and this we may know surely), that no man or woman of the humblest sort can really be strong, gentle, pure, and good, without somebody being helped and comforted by the very existence of that goodness.—Phillips Brooks.

Saints are not born into sainthood. When we are born again of the Spirit of God, converted to a new life, the process of sainthood has only begun. Read the lives of the saints and see by what long years of vigils and fastings they became perfect. Souls are grown, not made. If we nurture the soul on holy choices, sweet sympathies, and kindly deeds, by and by fruit will appear.—Selected.

"The temper of the mind in which we meet the hundred and one tiny circumstances of every hour determines our happiness or unhappiness far more than does the detail of what those circumstances are. We can not choose the circumstances, but we can choose the temper."—Lucy H. M. Soulsby.

"Even the humblest person, who sets before his fellows an example of industry, sobriety and upright honesty of purpose in life, has a present as well as a future influence upon the well-being of his country."—Samuel Smiles.

Disciples Table Talk

S. G. Inman writes interestingly from Mexico: "Last Sunday was a good day for us. While wounded soldiers were being brought in from the battlefield south of us, rumors were flying thick that soon the Federals would attack our town. Families were moving across the international line for safety. A bigger crowd than any public assembly had numbered since our city became the general headquarters for the Constitutionalist forces, had met in our building for Sunday-school—three hundred and fifty-four. It was a high pressure day, the close of a red and blue contest. There are some very fine families represented here, who will be faithful to our work. Some while ago, when our town was practically depopulated, our Sunday-school was left with a baker's dozen, but as the refugees from the south began to come in, we decided to make a great effort to get ahold of them, and the result was our school of 354 last Sunday. We are in a campaign of visitation, training teachers, etc., to organize and hold this mixture of people, not over 15 per cent of whom have ever been in a Sunday-school before."

The following postcard message is just received: Christian Mission, 1854 Azcarraga, Manila, P. I., June 23, 1913. Seven baptisms in Manilla and six in the Tagalog provinces the past month. The Central Sunday-school has an average attendance of 120. Teacher training class has an attendance of 25. Small Sunday-schools are conducted by students at Pasay, Mandaluyong, Tondo and Sulo, points in or near the city. Bible class and service for Americans, Sunday-school and service for Ilocanos, Sunday-school and service for Tagalogs, and service for students in English are the Lord's day program at the Mission House. English services are held every Sunday at the general prison across the street from the Mission House. Evangelistic meetings are held at some fifteen points in the city every week. Two beds in hospital endowed by Masons. —L. Wolfe, Dr. W. N. Lemmon and J. B. Daugherty.

F. B. Thomas, Danville, Ill., writes that he spoke to 2,000 people at the Coliseum in that city, in the union meeting of the six down town churches. Mr. Thomas closed his supply ministry at First Church, Danville, July 29. During this spring and summer period more money has been raised for missions than ever before in the work of the church. A debt of $1,300 has been raised. During August Mr. Thomas is holding a tent meeting at Jefferson, Tex.; in September, at Marshall, Ill. He has some free time during December.

C. R. Stauffer writes that the Norwood, O., church has recently celebrated the first anniversary of the beginning of his pastorate in this field. During the year 162 persons have been added to the membership, an increase of 50 per cent. Work has been resumed on the $30,000 Sunday-school plant which it is expected will be ready for occupancy Jan. 1. This is only the first section of the complete building.

Central Church, Rockford, Ill., W. B. Clemmer, pastor, has voted to let the contract for the second stage of work on their new building. The corner stone will be laid in August. The congregation is now meeting in the court house. The pastor of this church spoke to his old home church at Lanark, Ill., July 6.

James Ware, who had to undergo a severe surgical operation, is returning to China. He sailed from Vancouver on the Empress of Japan July 30, in company with Dr. A. L. Shelton, who is on his way to Tibet by way of China.

A. F. Hensey, Bolenge, Congo, Africa, reports that there have been 450 baptisms at Bolenge this year. The church membership now numbers about 1,405. This is the largest church we have on any mission field.

E. W. Elliott reports that at Tampa, Fla., fifteen additions have been made to the church during the past two months, seven by confession of faith. Mr. Elliott will vacation during August on the beach.

J. C. Ogden, of Tibet, who has been at Battle Creek Sanitarium for special treatment, is much improved and it is believed he will soon be able to return to his chosen field.

Dr. Lemmon, Manila, states that there were 413 patients treated during the month of May. There were 31 surgical operations. Besides, he visited six outside towns.

F. W. Burnham, of Springfield, O., spoke to the conference of missionaries at the College of Missions, Indianapolis, July 24, on "The Holy Spirit in Missions."

J. B. Daugherty, Manila, P. I., states that a monthly in the Tagalog language is being published. Its name is Ang Daan Ng Kapayappan.

The 1914 Louisiana Convention will be held at Shreveport. R. L. Porter, of Cheneyville, is the newly elected president of the state organization.

First Church, Springfield, F. W. Burnham, pastor, is planning to celebrate the eightieth anniversary of its founding early in October.

The building of First Church, Denison, Texas, was burned recently, entailing a loss of $20,000.

Neal McCollum, retired evangelist of the Disciples, died recently at his home in Tacoma, Wash.

Mount Ayr, Ia., congregation will soon build a $15,000 home.

EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Coldbrook, Ill. — Sheplett, pastor; Fife Brothers, evangelists; 53; continuing.

Bedford, Okla., Harvey and Winters, evangelists. Church organized.

Munfordville, Ky., L. S. Drash, of Evansville, preaching; 18; closed.

La Monte, Mo., C. V. Pearce, pastor; Brooks and Bailey, evangelists.

HOME MISSION ITEMS.

Conventions in the northwestern states and the provinces of Canada, just closed, show uniform improvement over those held in the same regions two years ago. With one exception, the attendance in each was larger and in all the reports were gratifying and gave hope of future enlargement. A noticeable and encouraging feature of each convention was the personnel of the several boards, and the business-like way in which they transacted their business. Why should not the Lord's work call into service our best business men?

B. L. Ray has just closed a short meeting at Yellow Grass, Saska. Twelve strong men confessed faith in Christ the last Lord's Day evening meeting. Such interests justify continuance.

J. B. Lockhart's evangelistic work at Everton and Baldwin, Ark., shows gratifying results.

C. F. Swander reports for the Oregon Evangelist fourteen accessions through their labors in the month of June.

M. B. Ryan, superintendent of missions in Alberta, will minister to the Calgary Church, while evangelistic services are given to the establishment of the church in Edmonton.

A. E. Young reports eighteen accessions to the churches under his direction in West Washington. I.N. McCash.

DEATH OF CAPTAIN MAJOR.

This Board has heard with sincere sorrow of the death of Captain Joe Major. In his death Eureka College has lost a steadfast friend and liberal supporter. As a member of this Board for more than a score of years, he contributed liberally of his counsel and of his means for the welfare of the college. He was a loyal and worthy son of Ben Major, who was the leader in the founding of the institution.

The Board hereby tenders its profound sympathy to Mrs. Major and her children, in their loss of husband and father; to the Church of Christ, in its loss of a useful member; to the whole community, in its loss of an enterprising and patriotic citizen.

The Board directs that a copy of this appreciation be furnished to Mrs. Major, and that it be published in the local papers and in the religious periodicals of the Churches of Christ.

COMMITTEE:
W. F. Shaw,
R. A. Ward,
M. L. Harper.

A REQUEST TO STATE SECRETARIES.

I recently sent to each state board a letter and two sections from the forthcoming report of the Budget Committee together with a blank form for certain information which the committee desires. I have thus far received only a few replies and most of them are such as lead me to believe that my letter was not understood. Hence I am taking this method of asking the state secretaries to reread my letter and then do the following things:

Meeting of the board. Some of the secretaries have already filled in the blank without consulting their boards. The committee wants the state boards to furnish the financial estimates.

Second, have the state board signify whether or not it will act as the Apportionment Committee in its state, if the report is adopted by the Toronto convention.

These are the two things I asked to have done in my letter, and I am calling attention to them now because our committee cannot include state missions in the general missionary budget which it will recommend to the convention unless these two things are attended to. If state secretaries will do exactly what I requested them to do in my letter, they will save me a lot of needless correspondence and will greatly help the Budget committee in its work. All replies covering the two requests should be in my hands not later than Sept. 15, in order that the United State Mission budget may be included in the printed report of the Budget Committee.

Liberty, Mo. Graham Frank, Chairman.

The Good Sense of Church Extension

1. A suitable church building is one of the first requisites of the permanency, the prosperity and the efficiency of a congregation. Its hands are tied without it. With it a poor little mission gets church members.

2. Therefore, church extension is an essential adjunct to the work of Home Missions and City Evangelization. Including state boards, there are 127 home societies organizing churches and 40 per cent of them come to church extension for help to build.

3. We have lost our gains in former years because the church builder did not start promptly on the track of the evangelist and the home missionary. The Southern Methodist church lost 60 per cent of their converts for lack of church buildings early in their history. They have raised over $3,000,000 for church extension. Our losses were equally heavy before our church extension fund was started.

4. Mission churches cannot borrow from secular funds. The church extension fund is a financial friend of the mission church that cannot borrow elsewhere. For the poor, struggling mission it is the church extension fund or nothing. In 1911 and 1912 there were 551 such churches appealing for help and we could aid but 165. We certainly need a second million soon.

5. Not as a beggar asking alms, but as a servant of the Lord's vineyard, seeking only what is due it, does the church extension fund come. In the name of Christ it holds out its hand. It comes with an appeal that commends itself to the good sense of all. It appeals in the name of our uncounted homeless brethren. The board is assured the call will not strike unheeding ears.

The new receipts to July 25th amount to $60,242.44. If we can get $40,000 during August and September, we shall reach a $100,000 for church extension for the first time. That will be a fine start on the second million recommended by the Louisville convention. This goal is worth trying for. Let all of us pull together and it can be done.

Drake University is an institution of higher learning devoted to the best in education. It believes in cultivating the religious nature in man as well as the intellectual and physical. It is standard in every department, and is so recognized by every standardizing agency in this country. No short courses leading nowhere are offered. The faculty is composed of thoroughly trained Christian men and women, who, because of their attainments, command the respect of educators everywhere. The equipment in every department is adequate. No matter how valuable your time, you can afford to spend it in Drake University. It is a school that gives value received. There is no pretense—no exaggeration.

The College of the Bible meets the approval of the Disciples of Christ. It is true to the principles of the fathers of the religious movement we would further. This college is sending out an educated ministry to bless the churches. The department of Religious Education is one of the greatest training schools for Sunday-school and other religious workers to be found in this country. The rural church problem receives attention here.

We want Two Hundred new ministerial students to enter next September. We will assist each one in many ways. Scholarships, loan funds, and opportunities that the student appreciates will be available so that he may remain in the college until he is thoroughly prepared for his world task. Last year nearly 1,600 students attended Drake University. This number included 121 ministerial students. We ask 300 to come next year.

The College of Liberal Arts is superior in every respect. Seven hundred and forty-two enrolled last year in this department.

The College of Law enrolls more than One Hundred each year, and is as well situated as any in the country.

The Conservatory of Music is acknowledged to be the peer of any in this country. The teachers are artists of national reputation. Enrollment last year, Five Hundred Twenty-six.

Write for catalogues and particulars concerning any of the departments herein enumerated.

EDITED BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

It Grips and Holds

The Conquest is an attractive paper. Gripping serials and short stories have a place in each issue.

The Conquest is an up-to-date paper. The articles used are not moss-grown. A striking feature of the paper is the illustrated Modern Science page.

The Conquest is a useful paper, in the work of the church. Its "Conquest Bible Class" is unsurpassed. Its Christian Endeavor and Prayer Meeting columns are vital and suggestive.

The Conquest is a newsy paper. Its news is not merely small talk of Sunday-school attendance, contests, etc., but real news that builds up and helps.

Like all publications of the Bethany System, The Conquest is produced NOT FOR PROFITS, BUT FOR CHARACTER BUILDING

Gentlemen:

I wish to become a subscriber to your new paper for young people and adults, "The Conquest," and am enclosing one dollar in payment for one year's subscription.

JAMES T. MILLER.

WE wish to thank Mr. Miller for his subscription, but have written him that he sent 25c too much for his single subscription which is only 75c., and when the Altoona school subscribes for "The Conquest" at school rates, it will cost them only 50c per year in advance.

Church Extension Offering Begins Sunday, September 7th

THE FOLLOWING SUPPLIES WILL BE SENT FREE FOR DISTRIBUTION AMONG THE MEMBERS OF YOUR CONGREGATION TO EVERY PREACHER OR CORRESPONDENT ORDERING THEM BY CARD.

1. "Hope and Realization." An illustrated leaflet telling what every Disciple of Christ should know about our Church Extension Work.
2. Collection Envelopes; one should be in the hands of every member of the church previous to day of Annual Offering.
3. Pastoral letters to be ordered only by the pastors.

THE CHURCH EXTENSION OFFERING IS THE LAST OF THE ANNUAL OFFERINGS DURING THIS MISSIONARY YEAR. IT SHOULD BE THE JOY OF EVERY CHURCH TO HELP, BECAUSE—

1. The Board can answer now but one-third of the appeals because of lack of funds.
2. Forty per cent of new churches organized must be helped to build by Church Extension loans.
3. Every preacher knows that he can do no creditable work without proper equipment.
4. Only thirteen out of 1,621 churches aided by Church Extension Loans have failed, which speaks well for the vitality of our Missions.

ARE YOU THINKING OF GOING TO SCHOOL?

Try a Bible College in combination with a great State University. Together we have an equipment worth $3,750,000, and an annual income of $760,000. Do you realize what that means? It insures both equipment and talent. The quantity and quality of work is not surpassed. It is seldom equalled. Over 260 teachers are at your service. Salaries are paid which command the best talent. Yet, tuition is nothing for Missourians, and is only $20 per year for students from elsewhere.

Moreover, the spiritual atmosphere both in schools and in town is of the best. A deep religious spirit results each year in students dedicating themselves to the ministry or to the work of foreign missions.

Burn Your Own Smoke

Smoke is an unmitigated nuisance. More than eighty per cent of the energy of coal goes up in smoke. By so much is the power of all modern mechanism dependent on fuel diminished. We shall learn to save our coal about the time we have no coal to save. We shall discover ways of extracting not ten or twenty but sixty or eighty per cent of the energy from coal. Industry will be revolutionized, and then we shall discover that our coal is gone. And four-fifths of it, yes, probably nine-tenths of it, will have gone up the chimney. Wasted? Yes, and worse. It poisons the air, blackens lace curtains and lung tissue and all marketable things and all human skins within its far reach. The trail of the serpent of soot is over all our modern life. If only we could turn this black, poisonous waste into energy, what a smear it would wipe off the face of civilization at the same time it lifts a crushing burden from its back. Hasten the progress of the smoke consumer. Let civilization burn its smoke!

But do not wait the slow processes of civilization. You have smoke of your own. Burn it.

You came down this morning with a headache. And you began at once to say, "I had a perfectly miserable night. I don't believe I slept two hours all night. I heard the clock strike time after time, and I feel miserable!"

God forgive you for beginning the day with that kind of a desecration! How dare you pollute the sunshine with your backaches! Burn your own smoke! Face the morning with courage! And do not put on your face any look of the martyr. Do not go about with such a look of injured innocence that every one shall know you are suffering and wonder what is the matter. Put on your smoke consumer, and turn it all into light and good cheer.

Perhaps you are a minister, and you have your trials. You have read a pessimistic book, and you are tempted to preach a depressing sermon. Don't. You have been looking over the edge into some deep metaphysical abyss and you are tempted to preach a philosophical sermon, showing doubtfully that probably God is good, but wondering how it can be so. Don't preach it. You are feeling the hardships of the ministry and are thinking of complaining. Keep it to yourself. Burn your own smoke.

The world has grime and soot enough as it is. It is hard enough for the sun to make its way through. There is little enough of the energy of life going into the production of power. Put on a smoke consumer, brother.

Look out, and see how the world is brightening already! Wear a flower in your buttonhole and a smile on your face. It is a pretty good world, brother. Face it bravely. Burn your smoke.

Half of life's heroism is in the bold facing of danger or adversity. This is the half the world recognizes and rewards. But there is another half, quite as important, and just as heroic. It is in the calm meeting of the inevitable and making the best of it.

The world hardly knows this to be heroism. It listens for the sound of the bugle, and watches for the man in the front of the battle. But he may not be the real hero. Somewhere in the line a man, wounded, sore, and bleeding beneath his armor, stands in his inconspicuous place, lest if he should fall or fly it might weaken the courage of his comrades; and because he stands, though all the time nearly fainting, the hard-pressed line holds. Yet so sore was the battle that had he given way, and by so much diminished the faith and fortitude of the wavering men on his right and left, the whole line had given way. And no one knew he was a hero, but only that he was one of many who did his duty.

Of this kind of heroism the world has none too much, but it has more of it than it knows. Time will not reveal how much.

The business man, whose profits are shrinking, and who knows not how he is to meet his next payment, but who puts on a brave front, and keeps going till the crisis is tided over, he has this kind of courage of which we are speaking. The physician, whose patient is at the point of death, and he himself almost exhausted, but who remembers that while there is life there is hope, and who hopes his patient back to health, he has it. Fatherhood and motherhood are full of it.

The whole far-flung battle line of life is alive with heroes and heroines of this character, who conquer their own spirits first, and then conquer fate.

You know some of them.

Are you one of them?

They constitute the army of the world's smoke consumers.

They do more than consume smoke.

They brighten the skies so that men can see the sun.

Brother, burn your own smoke.

The Call of the Ungathered Harvest

"The true test of the present is the future," says Professor M'Gifert. "Not to be true to its own past, which means orthodoxy, but to be true to its opportunities—this is Christianity's business as it is the business of every religion and of every institution now and always." "Not whether we agree with the fathers, but whether we so live that the world we hand on to our children, the world whose creators in large measure we are, is the better for our living."

The missionary looks to the future. Men have called him fool, fanatic, and he has heard with a certain indifference their mockery because he was thinking of the future and not of the past or the present. He studies the past that he may know his present and that he may have the prophet's vision of the world that ought to be. His question about what the past puts into his hands is, "Of what value is this in giving men the right kind of faith?" He is the last man to carry about useless tools.

The first thing to be done toward reaping the neglected fields is the preparation of ourselves to understand the world's need and the religion which we profess. The Lord may use and he does use the weak and the foolish to do some of his work but he gets better results when his agents are intelligent and well grounded in the faith. When he bids us look upon the fields that they are white already unto the harvest, he is not asking us to view them through sectarian eyes. He asks us that we consider human needs. It is not a question of whether our particular religious group is able to make a good showing at its annual convention but whether it is doing something that ought to be done. The world gives its praise to those who keep close to the beaten path. It is the business of the Christian to teach the world what new things can be done to the advantage of all men.

Much of the wealth of the world is in the hands of unbelievers. I do not refer to the wealth of Hindu princes or of Mohammedan autocrats but to that of men in Christian lands. Nor do I have in mind the rich alone. Men of great wealth and men of little wealth, members of churches and men outside the churches, have often very primitive notions of wealth. They use the methods of savage warfare in their pursuit of wealth and in their enjoyments of their possessions they show as little restraint as the savage does when he has secured a large supply of venison. Their ostentation, too, is suggestive of the uncivilized human's ways. There are many of us, rich and poor, who have yet to learn that a man is more than his possessions.

Christianity is not in full control of the educated world. There are substantial grounds for the assertion that never in the history of Christianity has there been greater loyalty to Christian ideals than that which is displayed by young men and young women now in our educational institutions. In state schools and in church schools will be found this loyalty. But the missionary church seeks to benefit all the students. It therefore provides for the spiritual needs of students wherever they are. If they go to the state schools, it does not tearfully discuss the heterodoxy of these schools; it endeavors to exhibit to the student the best thought of Christianity and its highest ideals. If it has schools of its own, it compels respect for itself and for its faith by supporting its schools worthily. It does not invite its young people to accept inferior educational privileges in the supposed interest of faith.

Old enmities are put out of the way by the missionary. The Jew and the Samaritan were hostile to each other. Jesus belonged to the side of the Jews. But he was ready to help even the outcast Samaritan. Pride of race that makes us careful and guarded in our thought, words and actions, lest we fall below a very high standard of living, is admirable; pride of race that is expressed in hatred of other races is contemptible. The difficulties in the way of cultivating universal benevolence have been very great; in spite of them many great souls have arisen to proclaim in word and deed the doctrine of human brotherhood. Commerce, education, travel, have opened the way for the teaching of the fundamental truths of Christianity. The harvest is white. It is time to say everywhere and to repeat with emphasis that the inhabitants of this earth are to work together for the good of all, that peace and good will, not strife and enmity, are to be cultivated, that what hurts one race hurts all races. [Midweek Service, Aug. 20, John 4; Acts 16:9.]

In Explanation

During the past few months the task of organizing the Disciples Publication Society and securing capital with which to finance it has, in the main, fallen to the lot of the editors of The Christian Century. With the foundation work of the Society now approaching completion, it is expected that Mr. Morrison and Dr. Willett will resume direct editorial charge of The Christian Century by September 1, with an enlarged paper and greatly enriched pages.

The Dance of Death

Some years ago we read a rather lurid pamphlet by an evangelist on the dangers of dancing entitled "From the Ball-room to Hell." Neither the title nor the subject-matter of that production is responsible for the heading of this editorial, but rather two or three significant sentences in an article in the Independent, not by a professional evangelist, but by a university professor. In discussing "A Danger in American Education," which he defines in general as early sophistication, harmful in college and nothing short of disastrous in high school, Prof. M. V. O'Shea, of the University of Wisconsin, refers to the question of high-school dances.

Perhaps the most startling statement is the following: "No people have ever long endured among whom the ball-room, and the relations which it develops, occupied an important place during the period of early youth. Speaking generally, when an adolescent catches the dancing fever, and it runs its course, his mental evolution ceases betimes." If the writer is correct, from the point of view of mental development at least the high school dance may easily become "the dance of death." The inevitable result, continues Professor O'Shea, is "to stifle interest in the less exciting situations presented in science or history or language; but the mastery of these latter is absolutely essential for the welfare alike of the individual and of society."

From every section of our country have come loud complaints from teachers with regard to the evil results of the general introduction into our high schools of fraternities and sororities, athletic teams, "proms" and balls. The existence of these societies in the high school greatly aggravates the dancing malady, and it is well known that pupils who frequent the ball-room are incapable of effective work at school. But it is not simply a question of the invasion of extraneous interests which seriously threaten the legitimate work of the secondary school. It is a situation which presents not only a grave educational, but a grave moral issue.

The moral texture of thousands of boys and girls is involved. "Students of human development," Professor O'Shea affirms, "are universally agreed that when the relations between the sexes which the ball-room encourages become prominent early in adolescence the result will not be beneficial to either mind or body." The writer further points out that one of the great problems in dealing with youth is to keep attention off from sex relations of the sort indicated as fully as possible until the pubertal changes are completed. This is plain language which Professor O'Shea uses. It deserves most serious consideration coming from such a source. University professors do not normally dwell in an atmosphere of exaggeration nor are they accustomed to employ the rhetoric of the pulpit in their condemnation of current evils. There is no discounting, therefore, when a writer of this character refers to the "degenerating influences which threaten the secondary school," and speaks of this problem as the most serious one to be found in our American education. Corroborating Professor O'Shea's point of view is the statement of an eminent European student of nervous degeneracy who had said to him some time before the writing of the article that in his judgment American life was overstimulated in its influence upon the young, and that if we did not discover some way to keep the lives of our children simpler we would come to grief sooner or later.

Moreover, it should be remembered that these strictures concerning high school dances were written before the so-called "animal" dances came into general popular favor. There is little evidence of anything more than sporadic attempts on the part of authorities and parents to put a stop to dances that can hardly fail, in either young or old, to be other than degrading, and that are well named animal dances, arousing as they do little else. The situation is disquieting, if not alarming. Looking at the facts without prejudice, "the dance of death" is hardly an exaggeration, from the point of view not only of mental, but of moral deterioration. If parents are blind to the danger signals, it is not because they are not numerous.

The College Kindergarten

The time has long since passed when men looked with a sort of awe upon the college woman, rather fearful of her knowledge and altogether fearful of her air of superiority. The gay girl of today in cap and gown inspires many feelings but none of them borders upon awe or fear. The day is also passing when she may be feared because of a lack in domestic accomplishments. "I doubt whether a day of my life goes by without my applying directly in the domestic life of the household something I learned during my college education." It was a young married woman who spoke. No doubt her remark could be truthfully made by hundreds of college graduates in the country. The idea that college unfits a woman for a home-maker, that too much intellectual culture destroys her enthusiasm for practical and domestic life is not nearly so prevalent as it was a short time ago; and the next few years will prove it altogether invalid. A knowledge of the child and a course in child-training are now considered a part of every girl's education, and Wellesley College is to have a kindergarten school located on the college grounds and maintained jointly by the college and the town of Wellesley. "The object of the college in establishing this addition to its curriculum is to induce college graduates to bring their trained capacities to bear upon the problems of subprimary education, and to develop that branch of education along the most approved and scientific lines."

The work of Madame Montessori and the equally interesting experiments of Doctor Fernald at Waverly will be thoroughly studied in both the theory and practice of these new courses. A beautiful building is already under way, with school rooms all facing south, and open fires around which the children will sit while stories are being read or told. The building is constructed of hollow terra cotta tiles, which contain a double air space, making the building warm in winter and cool in summer. These tiles are scored on the outside and plastered. The heating and ventilation of the building are laid out in the most modern manner. Even the basement modeling room will be carefully ventilated, together with the wardrobe and toilet-rooms.

Shall Vopicka Represent Us?

The Anti-Saloon League of Illinois has inaugurated a nation-wide agitation against the appointment of Mr. Charles Vopicka, of Chicago, who is being strongly endorsed for appointment as minister to the Balkan States, notwithstanding he is the president of a large brewing company. "It would seem inconsistent," according to Rev. E. C. Dinwiddie, legislative secretary of the league at Washington, "that Secretary Bryan, after all his valiant championship of the temperance cause, should even inferentially give countenance to the liquor traffic by approving such an appointment." In the event of this movement against Vopicka being successful, an interesting contrast will be furnished between the strength of the temperance sentiment in this country and in England, where a successful brewer is often elevated from the beer-age to the peerage. Senator Lewis, who evidently favors Mr. Vopicka's candidacy, makes the assertion that he does not drink his own beer, nor liquors of any kind, nor does he even allow them in his house. The senator also claims that Mr. Vopicka recently assisted the temperance people in keeping the saloons at a certain distance from churches and schools. What a public-spirited citizen! He will not let his own children have razors to play with, nor his neighbors' children, but he gets his living—and a good one, too—by manufacturing razors and distributing them to the children of the poor. What if they occasionally cut their throats? Never mind! That is a tribute to the good quality of steel and workmanship in his razors. Besides, his own children and his neighbors' children are safe. What splendid public spirit!

Asia and the World's Sunday Schools

Of all the continents on the face of the globe, think of Asia in a three-year period gaining 8,113 Sunday-schools and an enrollment gain of 316,818. It must have made the delegates to the World's Sunday-school Convention at Zurich in July sit up and take notice. The statistical reports for the triennial period are equally encouraging throughout.

The number of Sunday-schools is given for the world as 297,866, a gain of 11,864 over 1910; the total enrollment is 28,701,489, a gain of 690,295 over 1910. Sixty-three nations or dependencies have not reported schools or members. This fact is owing, in part, to the failure of the responsible parties to make returns, and, in part, to the fact that they have no schools or pupils. Full reports would probably make the enrollment 29,000,000 in round numbers.

The percentages of enrollment to population contain some surprises; all those are here given that rise to ten per cent or above. Samoan Islands, 29.1; Marshall Islands, 26.5; Great Britain, 21.2; Fiji Islands, 18.33; Newfoundland, 17.8; United States, 16.6. Samos, 16.44; Labrador, 15; Montserrat, 14.6; Antiqua, 13.8; Porto Rico, 12.7; Canada, 12; Jamaica, 11.2; Ellice Islands, 10.2. Great Britain has nine of these, and the United States, two. The dependencies of the United States not named above show: Alaska, 3.8; Hawaii, 6.31; Philippines, .02.

Of the larger territorial divisions, North America has 15.3; Oceanica, 10; West Indies, 2.7; Europe, 2.3; Africa, 3; South America, .1; Maylasia, .1. The percentage of Europe is kept down because the Lutheran church has not adopted the Sunday-school and because no account is taken of the Roman Catholic church, as the parochial school is not a Sunday-school. We regret to note that the comparison of the statistics with those of Washington, 1910, are not as inspiring as those of 1910 compared with Rome, 1907. There was a gain in the triennium of 1907-1910, of 30,456 schools and 2,973,358 in enrollment. There have been gains in North America, Central America, West Indies, Europe, Asia; while there have been losses in South America, Maylasia and Oceanica. The figures for Africa were those of 1910, later reports not being available.

The gains for the United States were given as 3,826 for schools, and 931,016 for total enrollment. The gain of schools in Great Britain was given as 790, and for enrollment as 175,603. This shows a much larger proportionate gain for the United States than for Great Britain. But the most remarkable thing the figures show is a gain in Asia of 8,113 schools, and 316,818 in enrollment.

Army Chaplains Beseech Congress

With approval, we gladly insert the following editorial, in The Presbyterian Banner (Pittsburgh) of July 31:

Some of the army chaplains who feel they have not received sufficient consideration from the War Department have appealed direct to Congress with some prospect of success. A board of chaplains was detailed to formulate plans for their work two or three years ago, it being desired to afford them all the facilities needed to make their labors more effective. A detailed plan was worked out and submitted to the War Department. It called, among other things, for large tents with seating accommodations and the purchase of paraphernalia for illustrated lectures, moving picture entertainments, talking machine concerts, and so on. The cost of this entire equipment was estimated at $85,000. Since then nothing has been done, and some of the chaplains feel they have been patient almost beyond reason. The War Department is not disposed to do anything in that direction, because it is difficult to obtain appropriations for regular army needs, and any appropriation of this character would operate to reduce to that extent the fund allotted for the army. The chaplains, however, have received assurances from members of Congress that the next appropriation bill will contain items to provide them with some of the facilities for conducting their work for the benefit of the enlisted men. It is stated that in some instances the chaplains lack the ordinary facilities for holding religious services with proper protection from inclement weather.

First International Gideon Convention

The Gideons are Christian commercial travelers who have become organized into a most remarkable society, principally known for their phenomenal distribution of Bibles in hotel rooms. On July 24 the Gideons opened their first international convention in the Metropolitan Methodist Church of Toronto, Canada. Though the Gideon movement is only six years old, yet every part of the United States and Canada was well represented. About 15,000 sample case men are in the organization. According to the July number of The Gideon, the national organ of the society, there have been no less than 201,621 Bibles placed in as many rooms of hotels scattered throughout the United States and Canada. The Gideons deserve encouragement and support throughout the churches.

The Soul of a Chambermaid

While we are writing about the Gideons, let us look into the soul of a chambermaid who was reached by a Bible in the Cochran Hotel, Washington, D. C. The Bible with its familiar Gideon bookplate attracted the chambermaid, and her letter to the Gideons, as published in the national organ is about as eloquent a letter as we have ever seen. It calls attention, unconsciously, to a large class of the spiritually neglected—the hotel chambermaid. Indeed, it may surprise some that these poor hotel drudges have any spiritual nature at all, but the following letter reveals a deep spiritual nature that surely is worth cultivating:

"Some of the Gideon books were placed at the Cochran Hotel, Washington, D. C., and here I want to tell that whenever I have a vacant room with one of these books in it, how much I like to sit down for a few minutes and read a chapter or a psalm, and how much better I feel afterwards. I also hear some of the other maids tell the same, while they wait for the guests to come out of their rooms in the mornings.

"I here enclose a little offering, which I hope will do a little good, to keep the blessed truth moving onward, which the world so sadly needs. As I know we all need some encouragement sometimes, it makes me think the Gideons may also need a bit of that same appreciation. In all sincerity, A Maid at the Cochran Hotel."

Dr. Ainslie on the "Message"

A new book on the message of the Disciples of Christ is timely just now when the religious world is thinking its way wistfully toward the ideal of Christian unity. Few of our leaders who might attempt a restatement of this message could arouse more anticipation than Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore.

Doctor Ainslie is chairamn of the Disciples Commission on Christian Unity and as a servant of the church he has been active in bringing about friendly conferences with similar commissions of other religious bodies. He has made many friends among his brethren who wear denominational names and has cultivated in himself a catholic and kindly spirit toward all communions. One is not surprised therefore to find in these three lectures delivered to the Yale Divinity School and now published in this volume an atmosphere of gentleness and tolerance, a deploring of debate and the repeated affirmation that ultimate Christian unity is to come by way of increase of Christian brotherliness and tolerance rather than by doctrinal agreement.

Of the three lectures the last two deal respectively with the origin of the Disciples and the history of the Disciples. Doctor Ainslie has organized his material admirably for a statement of the historical facts to an audience that perhaps was quite unfamiliar with these facts. To the Disciples themselves there is nothing particularly new or fresh in this restatement. The author admits that with Alexander Campbell "the movement unconsciously began shifting from its original basis [the explicit desire for Christian unity] to the restoration of primitive Christianity," but he follows this clue no farther.

The first lecture is entitled "The Message of the Disciples." This message, says Doctor Ainslie, is not "the message of the men who lived a hundred years ago nor of the men who lived in the last decade," for, he continues, "it must be borne in mind that our widening experiences change the horizon of our belief."

From such opening words one is led to expect an original and constructive treatment of the Disciples' work. But Doctor Ainslie neither surprises his readers with new material nor a fresh interpretation of the old material.

The essential message of the Disciples is put into nine propositions which are not strikingly unlike the conventional statement to which we have long been accustomed. These propositions deal with the following:

1. The sin of sectarian divisions.
2. Christ the basis of union.
3. Theology supplanted by the Scriptures.
4. The preeminence of New Testament over Old.
5. Faith, repentance, confession and baptism the order of the plan of salvation.
6. Baptism performed by immersion.
7. Scriptural names.
8. Weekly observance of Lord's Supper.
9. The right of private interpretation of these facts and others.

Our condensation of Doctor Ainslie's nine propositions does not do full justice to them but it will suggest the trend of his thought. That the Disciples have, as a matter of history, stood generally for the things thus enumerated will not be disputed. But in setting up such a catalogue as their essential "message" Doctor Ainslie seems to us to have fallen for short of the task he assigned himself.

The propositions are not in any sense co-ordinate. There is no common principle running through them. The order of the "steps" in the so-called "plan of salvation" is certainly not to be mentioned in the same class with the sin of sectarianism (proposition 1) or the sufficiency of Christ (proposition 2). Proposition 3 is probably not even true.

However, there are certain expressions in the book which are not customary among Disciples and which suggest that the author has in his own mind broken away from some traditional conceptions. For example, he says that Alexander Campbell was "rebaptized" at the time of his immersion by the Baptist preacher. He answers with a decided "no" the inquiry whether the Disciples require those whom they baptize to join their church, and adds, "frequently it is best that they should not, for they can perhaps do more good in their own communions." He plainly declares that pedo-baptists are "none the less Christians" because they differ with him on immersion. As to the broadening of the practice of Christian unity by their own churches he notes that a few Disciples' congregations "here and there" "receive the unimmersed," and adds that "the number will increase."

But these are mere fragments, casual and incidental. Their implications have not been worked out in the book's thesis. But they do indicate the book's atmosphere. Whether or not Doctor Ainslie's statement of the "message" would persuade thoughtful men of today to stand with the Disciples it can certainly be said that it will alienate and hurt no one. This means a good deal. For of those books that wound and divide in stating "our plea" we have long since had a plenty.

There is one thing we hope this gifted preacher will do for his brethren, and that soon. Instead of walking in that old groove called the "consensus of opinion among us," under the illusion that it leads to anything worth while, we wish Doctor Ainslie would ask his own soul what the Disciples mean to him, to him only, and write down his answer.

That would be luminous. It would be interpretative. It would have power.

And it would make converts.

The Ministry Waning?

By a Minister.

Once I lived in a remote settlement of the West, for a while—just a while, for I got out as soon as I could! Well, the year I was there I came to the conclusion that Mark Twain, Rudyard Kipling and other popular writers, had quit writing. I said to myself that they had played out—there was no further demand for their work, and they had fallen into neglect.

One day I got hold of a batch of big papers and magazines, and I saw articles and poems from the authors mentioned in plenty! Then I began to study. I had gone into the West where I was not in touch with much besides the weekly paper and some books and magazines I had had on hand for a good while. I was isolated. The trouble was that I had gone where I could not see what was doing in the literary world. I imagined that, since I had gone into obscurity, nothing whatever "was doing."

Now, that experience can be applied to a good many things. For instance, it can be applied to the declarations that "the church is not doing much good these days" and "the ministry is losing influence."

Which reminds me of an occurrence in Philadelphia recently. A banquet was given by the New England Society of Pennsylvania in honor of the Pilgrims. The society's president in a speech said that the influence of the ministry was waning. Then Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, of Brooklyn, an invited guest, made this reply and refutation:

"I wonder, men, if it is true that the ministry is waning. I wonder if that is not a 'bluff' that the layman is putting up to cover his own iniquity. There never was a time in which the ministry was better educated than today. I admit that the salaries are waning today, when you men make the cost of living so high by your nefarious financial and commercial schemes. No, men, the trouble with the churches today is not the ministers. There is no finer lot of men, men who lead more sacrificial lives in America today; and many of them might have had bank accounts as flush as your own if, when they had the chance to make the choice, they had chosen commercialism rather than the church of Jesus Christ. Why, men, you think the church is waning principally because you have quit. Some of you have not been to church in the morning for six months on account of this beautiful automobile weather, and then somebody tells you the audiences are small, and you shake your heads and say, 'The ministry is waning.' You go on back to church and pay up your back pew-rent and you will find the ministry is just as strong as ever."

From Near and Far

Four biplanes mounted by French army pilots recently made a successful flight over the desert of Sahara. The trip, covering about 500 miles distance, was made above the desert region where any kind of aid is impossible. Starting out from the military aeroplane post which was recently established at Biskra on the edge of the desert and in the Algerian region, the party proceeded with the object of making the flight to Touggourt, a military station lying in one of the oases, and this was done very easily by the whole party. Then the return trip was made without any incidents, showing the value of the aeroplane in making communication over desert country. The French army possesses a number of military posts in the regions of Algeria and Morocco.

At the farewell banquet which closed the international woman suffrage congress at Budapest, the Countess Teleki, in behalf of the Hungarians gave an address in Hungarian, German, French, English and Italian, says the Woman's Journal. Mrs. Frederick Nathan gave the speech of thanks on behalf of the United States in French, English and German, ending with "Hurrah" and "Votes for Women!" in Hungarian. Mrs. Nathan was made one of the official interpreters at the congress, and did a great deal of translating from English into French and vice versa. The French delegates were so pleased with her translations that they nominated her as one of the candidates to serve on the international board.

Settlement of the strike of maintenance men and girl operators of the Southwestern Telegraph and Telephone company (Bell lines), has been announced. The strike has been in effect seven weeks. The strike resulted from the discharge of thirty-two operators. It was claimed they had been discharged because of union activity. The same was claimed in the case of maintenance men. The terms of settlement provide: That no discrimination will be made by the company against those having union cards, and that the eight hour day will be placed in effect as previously planned by the company.

Emperor William, of Germany, who is well known to be very abstemious in all things, thinks that German university students drink too much. A sentence proving this was used by him while receiving the students' homage during his jubilee week. His majesty on this occasion said: "I expect you to reduce your consumption of alcohol to a marked degree." The emperor issued a similar warning to the naval cadets of the empire in a speech which he made at Murwick some time ago and he has several times declared that more athletics and less beer would improve the student physique.

That American schools may profit through the experience of foreign experts in education and school organization, the bureau of education has issued a statement setting forth the advances in modern educational methods in foreign countries. The treatise pays especial attention to the subject of vocational training. The vocational schools in Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Norway and other European countries are described, and their systems, the bureau declares, "should aid materially in solving the vocational problem in the United States."

It is rare that the dependent orphan children of Chicago have an outing. To bring a day of real joy into their lives, an organization is being incorporated, to be known as the Orphan's Automobile Day Association of Chicago, for the purpose of giving every little orphan boy and girl in the Chicago institutions an annual complete automobile holiday, which will include a ride about the parks of the city and a stop under the trees for a picnic lunch. Six hundred automobiles already have been donated for the entire day, Thursday, August 14.

Protection against floods and the drainage of a vast area in southwestern Illinois, opposite the city of St. Louis, is the subject of the East Side levee and sanitary district, which is working out an elaborate plan for the betterment of conditions in that territory. The estimated cost of the work provided for in the present plans is $6,500,000. The area which will be benefited by the improvement extends about thirty miles along the Mississippi River and is bounded on the east by a chain of bluffs. It contains 150 square miles.

Governor Hodges of Kansas, accepted an invitation from Goyernor Major to go to Jefferson City Aug. 20 and 21 and both governors will put on overalls and each will have charge of a traction engine in the work for better roads. "The Kansas governor will be glad to come if you have a pair of overalls that will fit and if you will let him work," Governor Hodges replied to an invitation from Governor Major. "We'll have the overalls," Governor Major replied.

Following his threat that if necessary he would declare martial law at Oregon City, Ore., to prevent the proposed Sunday performances of a traveling wild west show, Governor West invaded that city August 5, at the head of five penitentiary guards. After a conference between the governor, a delegation of preachers, the show's manager and several attorneys, the manager agreed not to show. The governor and ministers agreed to attend the circus Monday and show officials promised to be present at the night services in the churches.

At the recent Balkan peace conference, M. Majoresco, president of the conference, read a note from the United States government urging that a stipulation be inserted in the treaty securing civil and religious liberty to the populations inhabiting territory which may be ceded or annexed. He remarked that such liberty was the law in every country participating in the conference and the delegation heads agreed such a special clause would be superfluous.

Progressives of five states—Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan and Indiana—will take part in a celebration at Riverview Park, Chicago, on August 30. The occasion will be known as "Progressive day." Progressive leaders in downstate counties in Illinois and the party managers in the four other states expect to send several thousand delegates to the gathering. Theodore Roosevelt will be the chief attraction if he can reach the city on that date.

Plans have been accepted and contracts are being let for a new contagious hospital to be built in Evanston, Ill., by James A. Patten to cost $100,000. Mr. Patten made his offer to the Evanston Hospital Association some time ago to build such a hospital if $100,000 were subscribed by citizens of the town as an endowment fund. This fund has now been completed and work on the erection of the building will be started soon.

The organization of a Catholic Women's League that proposes to counteract the tendencies of the women's movement, including their demand for the use of the ballot, marked one of the sessions of the German Roman Catholic central verein, which held its convention at Buffalo. Branches of the league will be formed in all parts of the country, it is asserted by Mrs. Joseph Frey, the honorary president.

Senator Stone and a committee of officers of the Lake to the Gulf Deep Waterways Association of St. Louis, have invited President Wilson to attend and address the association's convention at Peoria, Ill., during the week of Oct. 12, and also to be the association's guest on a river trip from St. Louis to Peoria. The President said he would consider the invitation.

Robert Mather of New York, who is eighty-three years old, has just performed two remarkable walking feats. In one day he walked six miles, from Forest Hill Hotel to the base of Mount Agassiz, in Bethlehem, climbed the mountain, and after his descent walked about seven miles to the base of Mount Lafayette and climbed that.

Secretary of the Navy Daniels has postponed work on the proposed extension of the navy yard at Port Royal, S. C., until illicit liquor selling in the immediate vicinity is stopped, for he does not propose to have the government send workmen where they will be demoralized by contact with lawlessness.

The new minister to China recently named by President Wilson is Dr. Paul S. Reinsch, professor of political economy in the University of Wisconsin. It was for this position that the President vainly endeavored to persuade John R. Mott that he should give up his Y. M. C. A. work.

Democrats of Texas plan to raise $50,000 by popular subscription for the benefit of Secretary of State W. J. Bryan. The money will be paid over to him on the contingency that he agrees to abandon the lecture platform and devote his entire time to the State Department.

Both Chicago and Philadelphia have decided to increase the number of fresh-air schools, as a result of the test of the open-window school recently concluded in Philadelphia, in which it was shown that children were healthier in the low temperature rooms.

The United States Bureau of Education announces that of the sixty-five prisons in the United States and Canada reporting such schools to them, forty-four maintain classes in which both academic and trade subjects are taught.

Through the Oriental Kaleidoscope

American Ideas of Education in the Orient

By Charles Richmond Henderson

THE proper persons to give a judgment on this subject are Professors Burton and Chamberlin, of the University of Chicago, for they made a long and special investigation of the entire educational problem. This article is simply a memorandum of certain impressions from recent contact with educational centers in India, China, and Japan, and does not claim completeness.

The General Situation.

The young men of these countries are just now in a friendly attitude to our representatives of education. The friction with Japan is real and is a temporary disturbing factor, but we hope it will pass away. The dominant educational influences in India are naturally British, but political unrest subtracts somewhat from that influence, and America is well represented there. In China sympathy of students for our teachers has steadily risen for several years and is now at its flood tide. The establishment of the "Indemnity College" near Peking is the most tangible manifestation of this bond. In the colleges are formed the leaders of China for the next generation; and as China seems destined by its numbers, wealth, unity, ability, energy, and love of knowledge to be the dominant nation in the Far East, our opportunity there is one of the most significant facts in our history.

It will be a blessing to mankind in all the future if our nation understands the crisis and goes to meet the oriental need in a cordial, frank and honest spirit of reciprocity. China aspires to be a republic and instinctively its reading men turn their eyes to those who are best acquainted with the history, experience and institutions of the greatest of all republics. In India and Japan there is a large number of students who vaguely dream of free civil government in which all the people have a voice; and if China succeeds republics will become fashionable.

The Hand Outstretched from the Long Sleeve.

So far as fundamental laws of psychology and educational method are concerned, there is nothing, and ought to be nothing, peculiarly American; for science is human and not provincial; it has no barriers of race or nation. But when we come to questions of temperament, emphasis, spirit, America has many peculiarities, some of them good. We cannot claim to be as thorough as the Germans, and our graduates have not the scholarly finish of the Oxford and Cambridge men. We are hasty and often superficial, although we are improving in accuracy, mastery and comprehension. The special quality which fits our fellows from Princeton, Harvard, Purdue, Yale, Wisconsin and other universities for a moral conquest of China is that they are "good mixers." They are in no case coarse or vulgar; but they are home folks, democratic, and can shake hands with a Chinese student who will break his ancient custom even on a frosty day to push his hand out of his long protecting sleeve to touch the palm of one of our young athletes and scholars. I do not think there is a particle of patronizing feeling of condescension in our men in Peking, Tientsin, Nanking, Canton and Shanghai. They manifestly admire and respect the fine qualities of the Chinese, while they are by no means blind to their defects.

The practical education which fits men for securing a living outside clerical and political offices is better for Indian youth than that form which is unduly dominated by Oxford and Cambridge. In fairness it should be said that many British officials are earnestly trying to widen and diversify the methods of instruction.

The devotee of social science, both theoretical and practical, rejoices to see the influence of his favorite studies in the Far East, in the local studies of the coolies and beggars, and in attention to improvements in social legislation and administration.

Our teachers in Chinese colleges have to work with a strange language; and the Chinese struggle in the fog to seize modern ideas about science through the medium of English, German or French. Until the Chinese have built up a scientific nomenclature of their own and made it exact they will be at considerable disadvantage; but with our help they are slowly manufacturing and sharpening the tools of scientific thinking and independent investigation.

Religious Teachers.

There is a young American graduate from one of our American colleges who goes about China lecturing on the gyroscope, the aëroplane, the microscope and other mechanical contrivances. He can draw a crowd of curious and bright lads and men in any city of China. He did this in Peking and collected crowds who were then invited to the great evangelistic meetings of Dr. Mott and Mr. Eddy. The Y. M. C. A. leaders are generally college graduates who get into government colleges as well as Christian institutions and influence the young men. In their halls are gathered classes in the Bible, in methods of social service, in other subjects which supplement the regular curriculum and furnish points of contact for missionary endeavor.

In one government school there is a teacher from Virginia who dresses like the Chinese, sleeps on a board, eats their food, and gets near to their heart. He is paid to teach the English language, but he is a born leader and the boys of the school follow his example and his suggestions of usefulness with admiration and affection.

In one great province our missionaries practically nominate the instructors chosen in the government college. This cannot, in the nature of the case, continue many years, because the national spirit is strong and rising, and such dependence will not be necessary; but now it is a golden opportunity.

An Unfinished Task.

If our Christian work of education is to retain the position of leadership alongside the great universities which China is building up with the wealth of the nation at their foundation, we must be careful to select competent teachers and investigators. America is in competition with Europe in this field, and if we send weak men, with meager facilities of library and apparatus, we cannot long retain respect. Sectarian divisions have in the past jeopardized the strength of our forces in a way which most of our missionaries know to be exceedingly dangerous. In the future this division in education, if continued, will become still more fatal to efficiency and respect. Perhaps weakness of resources and educational thoroughness is not the worst aspect; for sectarian divisions raise doubts. The Lord prayed that we all might be one, that the world might believe. It is difficult to believe contradictory witnesses. In some places, as at Nanking, our Christian colleges are combining and the effect is delightful. One of the happiest communities I ever saw was that at this ancient capital of China, when the representatives of several home denominations wrought together so well that you could not see the seam where the old flag was sewed together. This figure of good omen is borrowed from McCutcheon's cartoon of our national flag at Gettysburg, where two veterans, one of the blue and one of the gray, hold it up smiling to notice that the rent in the stars and stripes can no longer be discovered.

Church Efficiency

Some of the Problems of the Modern Church Discussed

By Shailer Mathews

Notwithstanding the difficulties in determining any absolute standard of efficiency, it is possible to determine in a general way what are the agencies of efficiency. These are three: the individual members of a church; properly organized classes, clubs, societies and brotherhoods, and a church organized as a whole. The particular function of each of these agencies cannot be standardized precisely as in the case of industrial operations, but none the less it is possible to see that such functions actually exist.

Shailer Mathews, President Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America.

If the church member ever passes beyond a complacent assurance of his own salvation, he at once must see that the very heart of Christian life is activity. Religion in his case must come to mean less a source of comfort and more an inspiration for adventure in social service, and, if need be, sacrifice. But if a church is not an abstraction, neither is it a mob of well-intentioned anarchists. The very genius of Christianity is co-operative. The smaller groupings within a church are partly spontaneous and partly determined by leadership. Many churches find there is an immense amount of waste in their internal organization. Young people's societies duplicate the work of the Sunday-school; boys' clubs that of Boy Scouts; men's brotherhoods that of official boards; women's societies that of committees on general benevolence. Duplication in itself is not necessarily an evil, but duplication that does not promote efficiency—and this is its common outcome—is waste.

While it may not be possible to eliminate waste altogether, it is one aspect of that supernal common sense of which Mr. Emerson speaks to see that each organization within a church should work within definite fields for a definite unduplicated purpose. And this, while by no means excluding the arousing enthusiasm by so-called inspirational methods, certainly lays stress on calm, businesslike planning rather than on paper programs and mass meetings. More than one splendid organization has collapsed from an overplus of inspiration and a deficiency of sharply defined function.

When we pass to the church itself as a working unit the difficulty is both simplified and increased. For, on the one hand, the function of a church is more general than that of its component members and auxiliary organizations, and on the other hand it is more specific. It is more general because it must work for an end in view that is worldwide, and it is more specific in that it cannot as a whole undertake such a variety of tasks as can its various component parts.

If the churches, after they have determined to give attention to operation, rather than superficial activity, were to question themselves as to just what is to be the aim of this operation, and then proceed to organize with the deliberate attempt to increase its efficiency, the results would perhaps be slower in coming but they would also be slower in going.

It follows that to bring about an elimination of waste and to establish larger co-ordination of the agencies of church work there must be a far more systematic division between the department of management and the department of workers in the church than now exists. The ordinary church organization is not well adapted to more than conventional activity. The management lies generally in the hands of a single paid superintendent, so to speak, the pastor; a Sunday-school superintendent who is often without any special training for his work, and a board of deacons chosen because of supposed spiritual sympathies, but often quite as conservative as spiritual.

It would seem no very difficult matter for every church to undertake the organization of what might be called its management staff. It makes little difference under what name this staff exists, provided that it undertakes to plan the tasks for the various agencies, individual and collective, of the church.

Efficiency thus becomes specialized in view of special functions. Instead of relying upon recurrent periods of agitation called revivals, such management would undertake, first, the study of the conditions under which the church is surrounded; second, the adoption of a program of specialized church activity, and, third, the selection and adjustment of various members of the church to the accomplishment of the specific tasks involved in the general plan of management.

The pastor would naturally belong to the board of management. Whether or not other paid assistants would so belong might be a fair question to be answered according to circumstances. The most desirable plan would seem to be that the paid assistants to the pastor would serve, as it were, as functional foremen for the purpose of outlining and directing the specific phases of the church work as determined by the management committee.

Thus one such assistant might have charge of relief work, another of work for boys and girls, another of religious education, another of the church canvass. Even if one paid assistant should have charge of more than one such activity of the church in the same proportion as the plan of management becomes specialized should these paid assistants become specialists.

There is decided need of the increase of such paid assistants in large churches, but no church need wait until it is financially able to engage such vocational workers. There are always men and women who can be persuaded to serve as volunteers, and their earnestness can soon be disciplined into efficiency.

The curriculum of theological seminaries as a class is one which prepares men to minister to congregations in little towns which perpetuate the social life of several generations ago. It rests upon the assumption that the minister is a preacher who must give his message. He must therefore study the Bible in its original languages, he must make sermons, he must have a system of theology, and he must know something about the historical development of the church. He is given some advice as to how church affairs should be conducted, but except in the fortunate cases of a few seminaries, where the matter is taken more seriously, he is given only a smattering of sociology and psychology and all but no practical training in his actual vocation.

Personally, I am a revolutionist in the matter. I am convinced that the fundamental conception of the minister's education must be changed from that of a man with a message to that of a leader of a social group with a definitely religious and moral function. I would, of course, have preachers know the fundamentals of Christianity; and I would certainly have them trained to be preachers of the Word.

But I would also have them trained to be chairmen of committees of management with the capacity to study situations and adjust churches to situations rather than to preach good sermons. In other words I should train ministers to be practitioners rather than lecturers upon spiritual therapeutics. I would train them to be leaders of men rather than exhorters of men. I would have the seminary send them out trained in efficiency rather than informed in orthodoxy.

Robert Bridges

After several weeks of uncertainty as to whether the office of poet laureate would die with Alfred Austin, Premier Asquith recently announced the choice by the king of Dr. Robert Bridges to fill that position. Thus has the king followed the example of his grandmother in appointing a little known poet and passing by a number of men who have won their way to popular esteem by poetry that reaches the popular heart. It was no kindness to Alfred Austin to appoint him poet laureate, and whether it will be a kindness to Robert Bridges remains to be seen. Queen Victoria and her stolid husband were generally conceded to have possessed in matters of art "the most execrable taste of any royal house in Europe," and there is some reason to fear that they transmitted it to their offspring. It is the appointment, and not the poetry of the man appointed, that is in questionable taste. Robert Bridges has written some really good things; though what he has written that deserves this honor, few people in America, or in England, will be able to guess. Robert Bridges was born in the Isle of Thanet, at the mouth of the Thames, on October 24, 1844. He was educated at Eton and Oxford and studied medicine at St. Bartholomew's, London. His practice was confined almost entirely to public hospitals. He retired from the practice of medicine in 1882 and since that time has devoted himself to literature. He has written poems and plays, which are published in five volumes, but outside of a small circle his work attracted little attention.

The Encyclopedia Britannica, referring to the writing of Dr. Bridges, says: "As a poet Robert Bridges stands rather apart from the current of modern English verse, but his work has a great influence in a select circle by its restraint, purity, precision and delicacy, yet strength of expression; and it embodies a distinct theory of prosody. He maintained that English prosody depended on the number of 'stresses' in a line, not on the number of syllables, and that poetry should follow the rules of natural speech."

Fighting Vice in Atlanta

A Brief Account of the Men and Religion Campaign Against Commercialized Vice in Atlanta, Georgia

By John J. Egan, Chairman of the Committee

This movement came as a result of the union of the churches following the Men and Religion campaign. A committee appointed, consisting of laymen and ministers, began an investigation of the city, and became convinced that the first evil that should be attacked was that of protected vice. A careful investigation of the conditions was made and submitted by this committee at a luncheon attended by practically all the ministers of the Protestant evangelical churches of the city. It was the unanimous vote of the meeting that the committee launch a campaign against protected vice. Our newspapers did not co-operate with us and it became necessary to contract for display advertising in all of our three daily papers. The first advertisement was published June 25. July 15 the ministers of our city were again called together by this committee and another report was made to them. At its conclusion Bulletin No. 6 was signed by practically every Protestant evangelical minister in the city, "As Ministers of God, we cannot and will not be silent so long as this partnership between the city and vice continues."

What has been done in Atlanta can be done in any city where the churches of Jesus Christ will unite and the ministers will raise their voices persistently against this evil. The churches of Jesus Christ have the power to remove the sin of protected vice in any city whenever the churches will unite in their attack against it. Until they do this, upon their heads must continue to rest the blood of every young girl bought and sold in these houses of bondage; and this blood, precious in God's sight, will be required at the hands of the Churches of Jesus Christ, their ministers and members, who have the power to end protected vice and exercise it not.

Other cities all over the country are following Atlanta's example. Asheville, N. C., Athens, Ga., Philadelphia, Penn., Little Rock, Ark., and Birmingham, Ala., are among the very recent recruits.

The work has been permanent in Atlanta, moral conditions are better here than they have been since Atlanta became a metropolitan city; the police force, which had to devote a large part of its energies to regulating these houses of prostitution can now devote itself unreservedly to the enforcement of the law against immorality wherever practiced.

Our Police Commission, City Council and three daily newspapers are supporting the chief in his policy of law enforcement.

The experience in Atlanta illustrates that the backbone and strength of commercialized vice is the money profit there is in it. Forty-four houses with 265 inmates, took in more than $700,000 per year. Seven of these houses rented for $43,074 per annum when rented for immoral purposes, and would not bring 25 per cent of that rent for legitimate purposes. The men and women who were getting these profits were naturally anxious to continue this "easy money" income. The advertisements show in part the schemes they resorted to to discredit the reformers and reform movement.

The campaign in Atlanta cost about $6,500 for advertising and about an equal amount for other expenses, including investigation and the temporary care of the women. The advertisements were written by one of the leaders of the movement, Mr. Marion M. Jackson, a prominent attorney, President of the local Y. M. C. A., and vice chairman of the Executive Committee of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, whose generous donation of time and talent has been greatly used of God.

The spirit of Christianity which actuated the protest against vice resulted in many conversions among the women and girls, notably a notorious keeper for years of one of the largest houses of prostitution in the city. This woman was so moved by the spirit of Christ as to give all her savings—$2,500—to found a permanent rescue home, which, through the co-operation of the churches has been established. Through this home and other channels, more than two hundred girls and women have been thus far helped.

In this connection, we call attention to the fact that the "White Slave" is not only the girl who is forced into vice through brutality, but also the girl who is enticed into it through the influences of older people who are constantly making money off of her mistakes. The girl of fifteen or sixteen who is, for economic or other reasons, denied the protection and guidance of a good home and is surrounded by men and women who entice her into unwise or immoral conduct by constantly filling her mind with evil suggestions, evil examples, untrue stories about the consequences, and untrue allurements regarding the pleasure and profit of drinking and evil conduct—such girls are just as much the victims of white slavery as are the girls who are forced into vice by brutality. Such girls are just as helpless, and the "Slavers" make just as much and even more money off of them. Consequently, it would seem that when more than 60 per cent of the girls found in the houses of vice are under twenty years of age, many of these girls must have been the victims of the "cleverness of wickedness" or the greed of criminals rather than of their own inclination.

Considering the improvement in conditions in Atlanta, it is interesting to note that Des Moines, Iowa, was successful in closing its vice district, and thereby actually reducing vice, and to the surprise of both the friends and enemies of the movement, also reducing crime of all kinds at the same time. Seattle, Wash., a year or so later, also accomplished splendid results, although in Seattle they had to remove from office the mayor of the city and elect a new mayor before the citizens could have the law enforced. This campaign cost $16,000.

It is sometimes suggested that to close the houses of prostitution and drive out the inmates, is cruelty to the women. To this, there are several answers. One is that nothing could be worse for the women than for them to continue the life they are in. There is nothing more cruel than the treatment received by women in the life of vice. They are constantly diseased, frequently beaten by their so-called lovers or keepers, and often drunk and sick. The life they live and the associates they have, encourage drug habits, such as the use of cocaine and all other insidious habit forming drugs, as well as liquors of all kinds. Their money is taken away from them by grafters and criminals, and by the keepers who sell them cheap goods at high prices. They are often abused by drunken companions or customers, and in short it is hardly possible to conceive of a worse life. The women and girls are kept in it because they are told by the people who make money off of them that they are outcasts and that nobody else will have anything to do with them. If the house is closed, it not infrequently happens that some of the inmates give up the life and return home or return to honest work when they find that there is a chance for it. It also happens that some of them marry while others drift to other cities to continue in the life of vice until they die, often under forty, many under twenty-five years of age.

The Joy of the Well-fought Field

Every soldier knows what this means. There is nothing sweeter than the sense of victory in a worthy cause if there remains no sting of revengeful rejoicing over the foe. The good soldier is the man who enjoys one of the great rewards that can come to anyone in this life. If we can be sure of the reality and richness of the joy of the well-fought field we shall be able to nerve ourselves for the conflict when otherwise we might faint. To realize that the victory is at every moment possible and to enter into the joy of conquest adds something to the energy of the warrior and he keeps his feet when otherwise he might go down before the foe. The joy is all the keener because we know that we have earned it. It was not ours by virture of any trick but the triumph came through the hard contest and the steady stress of battle. The well-fought field is the place of fair-play and he who rejoices in its attainment experiences happiness indeed.

A committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America recently interviewed President Wilson, the secretary of war and the secretary of the navy, urging immediate attention to the matter. There are now only 67 army chaplains for over 95,000 men, and 21 chaplains in the navy to care for about 53,000 officers and men.

The 1914 International Sunday School Convention will be held in Tokyo in response to invitations presented at the recent conference at Zurich. It is reported that $110,000 was raised during one forenoon at Zurich toward the $175,000 needed to enlarge the work during the next three years. H. J. Heinz, of Pittsburg, head of a party of Sunday-school experts who toured the East previous to the convention, reported on Sunday-school progress in Hawaii, Japan, China, Korea and the Philippines. There were 2,500 registered delegates in attendance representing over fifty countries.

The missionaries of the New York Bible Society at Ellis Island distributed during the year over 109,000 volumes of scripture among the immigrants. These volumes were in more than thirty languages. This is the largest distribution of scriptures ever made among the immigrants. The society aims to make it possible for every immigrant who desires to receive a copy of the scriptures without note or comment in his own language. The Bible Society reports that for the fiscal year of the government, ending June 30, 836,473 immigrants landed at Ellis Island.

Some Beecher Sayings

"Never gauge the duration of your sleep by the time any one else sleeps. Some men will tell that John Wesley had only so much sleep, and Napoleon so much. But when the Lord made you, as a general thing he did not make Napoleons."

"Blessed is the man who can throw the light and radiance of his imagination, of his wit and humor, all through his life."

"When I want to know more about the doctrine of depravity, I study you; and I have abundant illustration on every side."

"Ministers are not called to preach for the sake of the salvation of sermons."

"Money is like powder—it has no power until it is sent off."

"A thousand sermons can't put down heresy as fast as a hundred hymns."

"The Lord's garment is large enough to cover all sects and to leave room for nations to camp under it besides."

"There are men who own a thousand acres of land in their soul—and have a quarter of an acre of it under cultivation."

"'Among Romans one must do as Romans do'—a maxim which only needs a little extension to make it read: 'Among devils one must do as devils do.'"

"Am I persecuted by evil men's tongues? Let them wag. The serpents vibrate their tongues in the wilderness, but they do not trouble any one who is not in the wilderness. Stand aloof from all these misconceptions of men. Stand higher."

"To go through life without humor is like being in a wagon without springs."

"A young man of a clean mouth, unsmeared by sour beer or intoxicating drink and unsmoked by tobacco, feels uneasy till he can get the nasty smell on him, in his hair, through and through his skin and his whole composition; then he begins to think he's a gentleman."

A Lively Composition

William H. Maxwell, the superintendent of New York's public schools, quoted with no little zest at a recent dinner a composition based on a moving picture play that had been written by a boy of ten.

The composition was very long and very delightful. The best paragraph ran:

"The villun curled his mustarsh, and seezing the pure vurgin shreeks ha ha be mine or deaths blud is on my head this dagger stabs thee to thy utermost sole ha ha vengunze vengunze. But the good hero kurses and says O hevins hevins stur won step and thy ded body lies at my door. lay won arm on the vurgins korpse and it was better if you was drowned with a millstone. Avarnt avarnt from this sweet korpses presunz."

Expensive Words

Conan Doyle is said to have received $1 a word for some of his writings. Theodore Roosevelt was reported to have been paid at the same rate for the story of his African hunting expedition. But the man who condensed a long and complicated railroad warning into six short words received $1,000 a word for his work. The original sign began "Beware of the Engine and Cars," and continued with about five minutes' worth of wordy injunctions. Successful damage suits were brought on the ground that the long winded signs were not clear warnings. A lawyer was engaged to write a short one. For the famous "Railroad Crossing—Stop, Look and Listen," which has become a classic in the realm of railroad operation, he received $6,000. The directors considered the amount well spent.—Congregationalist.

Not Yet in Sympathy

Ambassador Page, discussing the labor question one day at Garden City, said to a reporter:

"The labor question, like the question of capital, will be settled when labor and capital come to understand one another, when, as it were, they learn to speak the same language.

"Bring them together now and they are apt to get on like the French girl and the American girl who met after a correspondence course in one another's tongues.

"'Well, how did you get on?' her mother asked the American girl after this conference.

"'Oh, fine!' was the reply. "Mademoiselle understood every word she said, and I understood every word I said.'"

Emerson's Drollness

Daniel C. French, the sculptor who was commissioned to make the bust of Ralph Waldo Emerson, which is now in memorial hall, Harvard University, tells this story:

At one of the sittings Mr. Emerson rose suddenly and walked over to where the sculptor was working. He looked long and earnestly at the bust, and then, with an inimitably droll expression, he said:

"The trouble is the more it resembles me the worse it looks."

WE can sing away our cares easier than we can reason them away. The birds are the earliest to sing in the morning; the birds are more without care than anything else I know of. Sing in the evening. Singing is the last thing that robins do. When they have done their daily work, when they have flown their last flight, and picked up their last morsel of food, and cleaned their bills on a napkin of a bough, then on a top twig they sing one song of praise. I know they sleep sweeter for it. Oh that we might sing evening and morning, and let song touch song all the way through! Oh that we could put songs under our burden! Oh that we could extract the sense of sorrow by song! Then sad things would not poison so much. Sing in the house—teach your children to sing. When troubles come, go at them with song. When griefs arise, sing them down. Lift the voice of praise against cares. Praise God by singing; that will lift you above trials of every sort. Attempt it. They sing in heaven, and among God's people on earth song is the appropriate language of Christian feeling.—Beecher.

ABOUT TORONTO.

Toronto is an ideal convention city. Many large religious convocations are held there each year. Massey Hall is one of the most ideal auditoriums on the American continent. Its acoustics are perfect. It has numerous committee rooms and other accessories, and a massive pipe organ.

Toronto is within easy reach. It is less than seventy miles from Buffalo and 150 miles from Cleveland, and by railroad it is exactly 229 miles from Detroit. Toronto as men travel is only eighteen hours from Cincinnati, which is the same distance as is Kansas City, Atlanta, Washington and Richmond. It is not so far away as Des Moines, Omaha, St. Paul, Minneapolis or New Orleans, at which places our Conventions have assembled. The accompanying cut is one of the entrance to University College grounds, Toronto.

A Page of Human Interest

J. G. CANNON ON MARK TWAIN AS LOBBYIST.

"One of the frankest lobbyists I ever met in Washington was Mark Twain. He came to the capitol to lobby for the copyright bill and he frankly told everybody why he came. He had a selfish interest in that bill and he admitted it. He did not pretend to any other interest than that of a selfish one for himself and his family in a literary property they possessed. He came to the speaker and in his humorous way suggested that he ought to have a vote of thanks from Congress because he had kept away so long and bothered it so little. He knew that people who have received the thanks of Congress are entitled to the privileges of the floor. He wanted that privilege so he could lobby for his bill there on the floor where legislation is enacted. I could not give him access to the floor, nor could I submit a motion to the House granting him that privilege; but I gave him my private room in the capitol, where he could meet the members of the House and lobby with them individually and collectively.

"Under the proposed reform laws to regulate the lobby Mark Twain would have had to take out a license and appear only before the Committee on Patents, which had jurisdiction over the copyright bill. But he did not want to talk with the committee; he wanted to meet the members of the House and appeal to them in person, realizing that he could get more support for his bill in that way than by any formal argument he could make anywhere. So he occupied by private office for several days, met nearly all the members of the House, told them stories, gave them cigars, and made his appeal for votes direct."—Saturday Evening Post.

ANOTHER MARSHALL STORY.

For a few days after inauguration the offices of the newly created officials of the federal government in Washington were overrun with photographers from other cities who had been sent by their papers to "cover" the affair and to bring back a stock of pictures of the new men in the high places. Sometimes there would be six or seven in a cabinet officer's office at one time, all requesting him to pose for "just one picture" at his desk.

Two came in to see Vice-president Marshall in his office at the capitol. They entered and explained their errands—simultaneously. The Vice-president consented and the two set up their cameras.

"Now, look into the lens," said one.

"Now, look right into my lens," echoed the other.

As a result the Vice-president's eyes shifted from one to the other. Both were trying to get the picture at once.

"Wait a minute," said the Vice-president, smiling. "You fellows remind me of the story of the cross-eyed butcher, and if you'll wait I'll tell it to you. This cross-eyed butcher was about to kill a steer. A hanger-on about the place was persuaded to hold the animal while the butcher hit it between the eyes.

"'Are you going to hit where you're looking,' asked the helper.

"'Yep,' replied the butcher.

"'Then, you hold the thing yesself!' exclaimed the helper, as he walked away."—Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

A CASE OF MISTAKEN IDENTITY.

Talking about duplicates, perhaps the case of James C. McReynolds, attorney-general, and Representative Gordon Lee of Georgia, eclipses the best. The two are continually being taken for each other by friends and acquaintances, as well as strangers.

They are of about the same age, are both of southern birth, are close personal friends, have the same attractive mannerisms and resemble each other in stature, weight and carriage.

Recently Former Senator Joseph Bailey, of Texas, spied one of them walking ahead of him on busy 15th street.

"Hello, there, Mac!" he shouted. "Wait a minute!"

"Mac" didn't wait and so the former senator chased after him. As he neared the man he pursued, he exclaimed: Oh, hello, Gordon; I thought you were McReynolds."

SECRETARY GARDNER TELLS STORY.

Obadiah Gardner, the new secretary of agriculture, told the following story:

"I was in a small country store in Maine—my native state— one morning when an old lady accompanied by a gawky-looking girl of about fifteen came in and asked the proprietor to show her some cheap calico.

"She pulled at one piece first one way, then another, wetting it meantime and rubbing it with her fingers to ascertain if the colors were fast. She apparently was unable to satisfy herself regarding it.

"Finally she produced a small pair of scissors and snipped off a tiny piece, which she handed to the young girl.

"'Here, Emma,' she said, 'you chew on that an' see if it fades any.'

"Emma put the sample into her mouth and with the most serious expression imaginable went to work."—Lippincott's.

JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS NOT ALWAYS MILD.

In repose Senator John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi, is one of the mildest and best natured and most inoffensive men imaginable, although in debate on the floor of the Senate Mr. Williams can show that he has some fire in his makeup. No one would accuse him of being bloodthirsty or of having ever fought a duel. He did once, though.

It was when he was attending the famous Heidelberg University in Germany. A German student challenged John Sharp.

"In Rome do as Romans do," Mr. Williams counseled himself. Therefore he promptly accepted the challenge.

Being the challenged person, he had choice of weapons. The German was greatly disturbed when the American's second said sabers, the usual dueling device, would not be used. The Yankee fire-eater would fight with United States army revolvers.

This was unheard of and the German the next morning was a wreck. His hand shook and the bullet whizzed by John Sharp several feet distant. The latter calmly aimed at a fleecy cloudlet in the sky and let go.

The principals then shook hands and became fast friends.

PADEREWSKI IN RETIREMENT.

M. Paderewsk has virtually given up the role of virtuoso and devotes his time to composing music, rather than to playing it. After a youth full of pathos, some of the tragedy of which he put into his playing, he has retired to his Swiss home, happy in the comradeship of his wife.

There is a myth that like Samson's, Paderewski's strength is in his hair. But in spite of the adoration he has received all his life from matinee girls and the luxury to which he has always been accustomed, Paderewski is a sturdy, many-sided man of red blood and muscle. He plays sometimes seventeen hours a day, a muscular task that might daunt any champion strong man; he is a powerful swimmer and an expert horse breeder.

The model estate of M. Paderewski at Riond-Bosson, above Morgas, is famed throughout Europe. Many pilgrimages are made there, consisting not simply of lovers of good music, but those interested in model farming.

Mme. Paderewski has a poultry farm, where all species of poultry as well as pheasants are raised. This has been Mme. Paderewski's hobby for some years and she has many valuable specimens. One cock and four hens, it is said, are valued at $7,500.

Surrounding the home of the musician and his wife are enormous gardens and hothouses with their succession of vines so arranged that fresh grapes can be picked from October to April.

In the orchards are pear, apple, plum and cherry trees imported from Canada, England, France, Germany, Scotland, and Poland. M. Paderewski takes particular pride in the size and quality of his fruit.

These are a few of the interesting things to be seen at the Paderewski estate, and constant improvements are being made, for the musician is spending the greater part of his income in adding to and beautifying it.—Daily Magazine.

PLAIN SPEAKING.

Sir Herbert Tree tells a number of good stories.

One of his favorites is about an old lady who had invited some friends down to pass the week-end at her little country cottage.

Her guests arrived in a tremendous downpour of rain.

"Dear, dear!" exclaimed the hostess as she welcomed them in; "what a day! I'm glad you've come, but do hope the weather will clear up, or you won't enjoy yourselves much."

"Oh, but, my dear Mrs. Jones," replied one of her guests politely, "we didn't come to enjoy ourselves; we came to see you!"

IN NEED OF THE BEST HELP.

Apropos of Senator Root's rumored refusal to run again for the Senate, a New York lawyer said:

"Root is admitted to be the greatest corporation lawyer of the day. I heard this fact well brought out once in the Metropolitan Club.

"Two capitalists, over a rickey and a regalia, were talking shop.

"'The Wind Trust, I see,' said the first capitalist, 'is to have dissolution proceedings brought against it by the government. All sorts of iniquities are charged to its account. Does it admit its guilt?'

"'Well,' was the reply, 'it has engaged Root.'"—Chicago Record Herald.

MARK TWAIN AND THE OYSTERS.

Mark Twain was in a restaurant one day and found himself next to two young men who were putting on a great many airs and ordering the waiters about in a most impressive fashion. One of them gave an order and told the waiter to inform the cook whom it was for. "Yes," said the other, "better tell him my name, too, so as to make certain of its being all right."

Mark, who hated swagger, called the waited and said in a loud

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

Cultivate Romance in Middle Life

You read a novel a while ago. The hero was a poor young man, and the heroine was an heiress. You are middle aged, but you read it with entire sympathy with the young people. But in that story the father of the girl objected because the young man had not money enough, and the mother objected because she was dreaming of social advancement for her daughter. Your sympathies were not with the parents, prudent and calculating; you sympathize with the unreckoning young people. But did you learn no lesson that as people grow older they lose some of the fine and uncalculating ardor of youth? That father and mother who behaved so unpleasantly in the novel had a romance of their own twenty-five years before. They have sadly outgrown it, and yielded to the cold and calculating temptations of middle life.

This is one cause of divorce in middle life. Here is a couple married ten, fifteen, twenty years, who suddenly shock the community by a divorce and a scandal with it. What was the trouble? They had settled down into a monotonous life, with no romance left in it, no imagination, no poetry. Then came temptation in the form of a romance; and Satan said, "Why should you suppose that youth is dead within you? Life still has joys in store for you;" and lo, there is a swift and terrible fall before temptation that never would have been considered ten or fifteen years before.

You cannot afford to let romance and poetry die out of your life. Husbands must continue to be lovers. Wives must continue to keep themselves neat, and to cherish something of romance, and to believe their husbands to be heroes. If they do not, then middle age has dangers that youth almost escapes.

Let there be more of youth in middle life. Let middle aged people remain young, and keep some of the very illusions of youth. It is only by becoming young that we can enter into the kingdom of God; for in heaven every one is young.

Mrs. Catherine Waugh McCulloch

Mrs. Catherine Waugh McCulloch, who framed the Woman's Suffrage Bill that the Illinois Legislature passed recently and whose article on woman suffrage appeared in a late issue of this paper is an able speaker, an adroit debater. But she is as capable a housewife, and as devoted a church woman as she is a speaker. Indeed she does many things; and does them all well. She is a lawyer of more than acknowledged ability. Many members of the Chicago Bar who have drawn swords with her in the Court Room have borne testimony to her marked ability as an advocate. She is a member of the firm "McCulloch & McCulloch," the other member of the firm being her husband, Mr. Frank H. McCulloch, who is well known to all social workers in Chicago. This firm does a many-sided legal business and maintains a large and loyal office force. Very recently it has been the adviser of the Marshall Field estate, and the Chicago Milwaukee Electric Railroad.

The best thing that Mrs. McCulloch does is to mother four fine children. Her son, Hugh, has just graduated with honors from Northwestern University. His "social service" task is to carry an automobile load of young people to the Bethesda Church in Chicago every Sunday morning, to play the violin in the orchestra of its Sunday-school, and to teach one of its Sunday-school classes. Mrs. McCulloch is a "good citizen." For several years she was Justice of Peace in Evanston. For the past four years she has been a guiding spirit on the Executive Committee of the Current Events Class, a class that discusses everything that has to do with the extension of the Kingdom of God, and has created any number of good things like playgrounds, and visiting nurses and Humane Societies in the city of Evanston. This past winter she has been the leader of what is called the Legislative Class of the Evanston Woman's Club. This class has met weekly for the study of the legislation that was being considered by the Illinois Legislature.

The McCullochs believe in the Christian Church. They attend its services; they support its work. If they are not in their pew on Sunday morning, they are either seriously ill or out of town. Storm, heat or fair weather does not keep them from church. And they are keenly interested in every department of its work. Indeed they are keenly interested in every good cause. Generously have they given of their time and thought and strength and money to help every reform which has as its goal "the new earth where dwelleth righteousness." There is a host of men and women in Evanston, who a few years ago, did not believe in equal suffrage. But they came to believe in Mrs. McCulloch. They could not help but admire her. And then they came to believe what she believed. They saw that a suffragist could be a charming wife, a devoted mother, a loyal friend, a useful club woman, and a faithful church member.

Mrs. McCulloch is first of all a splendid Christian woman. She believes that "Christianity has been the inspiration which has already partly lifted woman out of the degradation of heathenism and the bondage of the dark ages," and that it aims to bring to all women "full freedom for self-development and helpfulness." Her suffragism is but one phase of her Christianity. With Paul she believes that "there is neither male nor female in Christ Jesus, but that all are one." With Peter, she insists that "husbands and wives are heirs together of the grace of eternal life." In a recent speech she said:

"Women should be joint guardians with their husbands of their children. They should have an equal share in family property. They should be paid equally for equal work. Every school and profession should be open to them. Divorce and inheritance should be equal. Laws should protect them from man's greed by limiting the hours of woman's labor, and protect from man's lust by punishing severely vile assaults on women. Women under official custody should be under the control of women. Troubled childhood should be safeguarded. All these desirable reforms can only come through the vote of women, and such laws have been passed where women vote. To secure this vote for women in the United States Christian women must unite."

Cattle and Sheep, and Boys and Girls

Government experts, in making a study of grazing lands on the national forests, have discovered 125 entirely new species of plants. This discovery came about through the collection of some 9,000 different plant specimens, with notes as to their habits of growth and forage value. This work is part of a comprehensive plan to determine the grazing value of every acre of national forest land, in which the capacity of the soil to grow certain forage crops is to be determined and an effort made to decide for which class of stock—sheep, cattle, or goats—the range is best located. Those who have made these studies have combined the qualities of practical stockmen and trained botanists. The investigators found many areas covered with flourishing plants which apparently should furnish excellent grazing, but which were not of a character relished by stock; these areas, therefore, had little or no stock-carrying capacity. The areas studied were divided into such small subdivisions that maps have been prepared which show exactly the kinds of feed which grow on each acre, and the time of year it is ready for grazing. All this is splendid, but how much is man better than a sheep? How long will it be before we grow boys and girls as carefully as cattle and goats?

Cigarettes!

We must say we have always admired the Outlook, but we are somewhat disturbed to see a magazine of its history and its relations to religion carry a cigarette advertisement as it does in a recent number. It gives us the same sort of feeling we would have if we should happen upon its venerable editor with a coffin-nail in his mouth. We are aware that these matters are of relative morality. A few years ago an American minister stayed a few days in a Welsh resort which is a sort of a Welsh Northfield. After dinner every minister, about a dozen in all, in the hotel, lighted a cigarette and puffed away contentedly. It seemed odd to the American, but the morality of that situation was of a different sort than the moral question involved in the instance under discussion.

"A system of women police might go a long way toward aiding to solve the social evil," said Senator Victor Linley of Superior, Wis., recently. "Of course it would be necessary to exercise a great deal of care in adopting such a system, but the advantage lies here: Women are not as blunted as men, and they are readier to observe conditions that a man would pass by with scarcely a thought." Senator Linley is author of a bill for a legislative investigation of the social evil, and he framed the law under which the injunction is used against immoral houses. He has been named on the investigating committee of the Senate.

In San Francisco in order to vote on the pending $3,500,000 bond issue, to acquire the muncipal street car lines, 143,000 voters have registered, 94,000 of whom are men and 49,000 women. It is the highest registration in the history of the state of California.

A Chicago girl whose business is to plan the electric wiring of thousands of flashing signs throughout the country is Miss Nettie Liepe, who is twenty-four years of age and earning $200 a month.

Disciples Table Talk

Mary E. Bramford, press secretary of the Mount Hermon Federate School of Missions, writes as follows: At the Federate School of Missions, held at Mount Hermon, in the Santa Cruz mountains, California July 20 to 26, the registration was good and the representation of the Disciples at the school was considerably more numerous than the previous year. The daily text-book classes in the two new text-books, "The New America," by Dr. and Mrs. L. C. Barnes, and "The King's Business," by Mrs. Paul Raymond, were taught by Mrs. D. B. Wells, widely known in Eastern summer schools. The daily young people's hour was conducted by Mrs. G. L. Hagman, state Christian Endeavor Society missionary secretary. Among the prominent workers of the Disciples who were in attendance at the Federate School of Missions were: Mrs. N. E. Galloway, president of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, North California; Mrs. H. C. Ingram, vice-president; Mrs. J. N. Lester, who had a display of Christian missionary literature; Mrs. Mattie Scott, treasurer of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. An inspiring "rally" of the Disciples was held on Thursday afternoon. July 24, Mrs. N. E. Galloway presiding, and Miss Elma Irelan, Christian missionary from Monterey, Mexico, spoke interestingly of Mexican social and religious customs. Among the speakers who addressed the Federate School of Missions during the week, were Thos. A. Boyer, pastor of the First Christian Church of Oakland, California, who spoke on the subject, "What time is It and Where are We?" During the summer school, tender mention was made of the recent death of Miss Hortense Stafford, formerly corresponding secretary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, who also held the position of financial secretary of Mount Hermon Federate School of Missions. Mrs. R. E. Beach, chairman of the Federate School, told something of Miss Stafford's life. She was much interested in the Federate School and was a faithful worker for it. Mention was also made of the death of Mrs. M. E. Harlan, and it was voted that a telegram of sympathy be sent to the headquarters of the Christian Board.

Many of the old Bethany students, and many warm friends of Bethany, all over the country, have expressed a strong desire to have the old Bethany Church preserved. This church has done good service for more than sixty years. It was built by Alexander Campbell, who occupied its historic pulpit for many years, delivering therefrom his last sermons, and there ordaining many of our foremost ministers. No other of our churches has such a record as this historic church. There is a movement on foot to put it in good repair, care for and keep it, as a "Memorial" to those who did so much to Christianize the world. Any one who wishes to contribute to this good work, no matter how small the amount, will please send it to Mrs. Decima Campbell Barclay, Bethany, West Virginia, who will gratefully receive and acknowledge it, and see that it is used to the best advantage.

The Illinois State Convention will be held at Jacksonville, Sept. 8 to 11. The Illinois C. W. B. M. will have charge September 8, addresses being given by Mrs. Mary B. Thornberry, of Jacksonville; Mrs. Maude D. Ferris, Taylorville; and W. J. Burmer, LaHarpe. The Illinois C. M. S. will conduct its sessions on the evening of the 9th and on the 10th until 2 o'clock. W. W. Weedon, J. Fred Jones and other state officers will report. H. H. Peters and O. F. Jordan will report as members of the Social Service Committee. The Educational session begins at 2:15, Sept. 10. H. O. Pritchard, H. H. Peters, C. M. Sharpe, and C. M. Chilton will give addresses at the session. Sunday-school conferences will be held the morning of Sept. 11. At the church efficiency session, on Sept. 11, a. m., Andrew Scott, A. K. Adcock, Geo. W. Brown and Prof. A. W. Nolan will speak. In the afternoon, at the missionary session, S H. Zendt, W. R. Warren, A. E. Cory, and C. M. Chilton have prominent places on the program. Each Illinois congregation is asked to send $1 for convention expenses to W. D. Deweese, Bloomington, Ill. Delegates and visitors will be entertained in homes and for lodging and breakfast only, at a reasonable rate. Other meals will be served at popular prices.

The Southern California Convention, meeting at Long Beach, elected the following officers for next year: C. C. Chapman of Fullerton, president; F. M. Rogers, Long Beach, vice-president; S. J. Chapman, Los Angeles, treasurer; M. D. Clubb, Los Angeles, secretary. The committee on the new college reported that "the signs all indicate that the denomination should take immediate steps toward the establishment in some place in Southern California of a first-class educational institution of the college rank. The funds already received and the enthusiasm aroused render the success of the project certain." C. C. Chapman has promised one-sixth of a probable $300,000 to establish such a college.

George A. Miller

A. O. Swartwood writes that he has just closed a pleasant seven month's supply with the churches at Sargent and Coberg, Neb. A. L. Fields, late of Battle Creek, Mich., is now permanently located in this field. Mr. Swartwood is ready to do supply service for other churches. This he feels is his particular work. He may be addressed at Fremont, Neb.

At the Paris, Ill., chautauqua, which opened August 1, the following Disciples were prominent: Roland A. Nichols was platform manager; O. W. Stewart delivered an address on W. C. T. U. day, and Finis Idleman delivered a lecture. Mr. Idleman, who was formerly pastor at Paris, also preached in the church there August 10.

H. M. Hall, pastor of Central Church, Uniontown, Pa., has been acting as superintendent of the Sunday-school during the absence of the regular superintendent for the past month and the attendance has increased as follows: July 6, 383; July 13, 454; July 20, 483; July 27, 645; August 3, 711.

W. H. Bagby, Taylor, Tex., writes that "within a day or so the pastor and his wife will move into the most delightful manse in Texas, erected at a cost of $4,000." Work has begun on the church building, which will be thoroughly overhauled. Twenty persons have recently been added to the membership.

A forward step in religious education is reported from Crawfordsville, Ind. The church at that place paid the expenses of fifteen of its Sunday-school teachers in the school of methods at Bethany Assembly. This move was the result of the efforts of J. M. Alexander, pastor at Crawfordsville.

At the memorial service held at the Auditorium, Milwaukee, Wis., Sunday, August 3, beginning the week's celebration of Perry's victory, Mark Wayne Williams, pastor of the Park and Prospect Christian Church, was one of the leading speakers. Five thousand people were in attendance.

Announcement has been received of the marriage on August 4, of George A. Miller, pastor of the Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C., and president of the American Christian Missionary Society, to Miss Emma Ruth Roy, of Washington.

The new church at Beardstown, G. W. Morton, pastor, was dedicated July 27, by J. Fred Jones. C. L. DePew and Clyde Darsie also gave addresses.

Walter M. White, pastor at Cedar Rapids, Ia., has taken up the practical work of publicly advocating a pure water supply for the town.

THE CHURCHES STAND FOR WHAT WE STAND FOR—THAT ARE HELPED BY CHURCH EXTENSION.

(The last words of Geo. Darsie on Church Extension in 1904.)

They represent the same divine and holy cause that we all represent.

They, too, are marching under a banner on which is inscribed the words "Back to Christ."

They are earnestly contending for the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints.

They are trying to restore the New Testament gospel and the New Testament church. They are seeking to wear, humbly and modestly, only the New Testament name.

They are striving for the union of all of God's people on the one foundation.

They stand for God's word alone as their all-sufficient rule of life, and for a right division and a rational interpretation of the Word.

They stand for Pentecost as the birthday of the church, and for Acts 11, 38, as the law of entrance into it.

They stand for the dispensation of the new covenant as against the dispensation of a confusing and confounding mixture of the two.

They stand for a rejection of the bondage of authoritative human creeds; for the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free; for the gospel as the power of God unto salvation; for the wholesome doctrine that faith cometh by hearing and that baptism is for the remission of sins; for the clear and definite promises of God as the solid assurance of pardon and acceptance; and for all that standing for these things means.

They stand for the courage required to uphold them; for the ceaseless battle involved in their advocacy; for the strength needful to resist the perpetual temptation for their surrender; for the steadfast endurance of the opposition and odium, concealed or unconcealed, with which, in certain quarters, these things are always regarded.

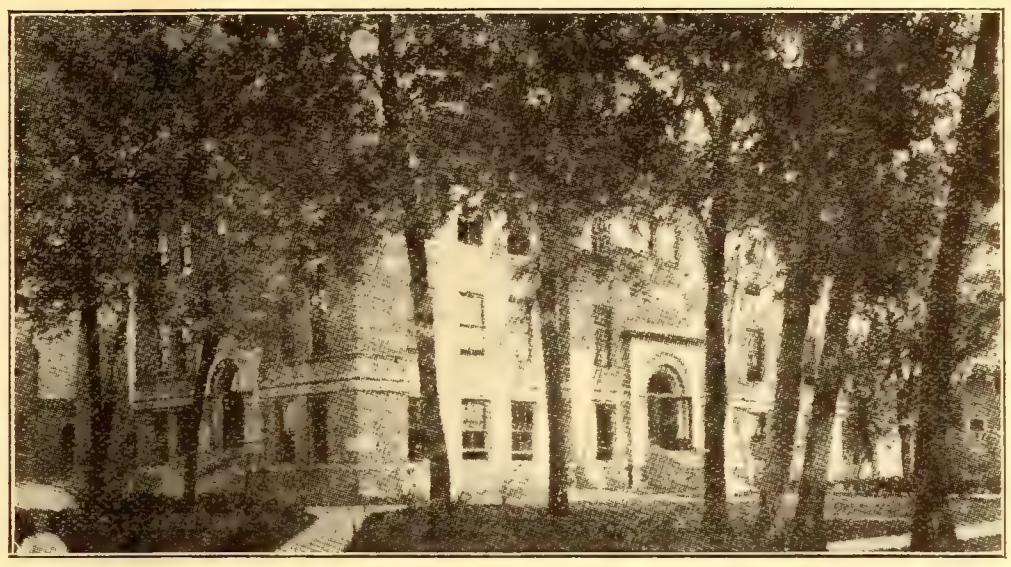
Drake University--A School of Ideals

Liberal Arts—Bible—Law—Education
Music—Dramatic Art—Painting and Drawing
Home Economics—Physical Education



Memorial Hall—College of the Bible.

Drake University is an institution of higher learning devoted to the best in education. It believes in cultivating the religious nature in man as well as the intellectual and physical. It is standard in every department, and is so recognized by every standardizing agency in this country. No short courses leading nowhere are offered. The faculty is composed of thoroughly trained Christian men and women, who, because of their attainments, command the respect of educators everywhere. The equipment in every department is adequate. No matter how valuable your time, you can afford to spend it in Drake University. It is a school that gives value received. There is no pretense—no exaggeration.

The College of the Bible meets the approval of the Disciples of Christ. It is true to the principles of the fathers of the religious movement we would further. This college is sending out an educated ministry to bless the churches. The department of Religious Education is one of the greatest training schools for Sunday-school and other religious workers to be found in this country. The rural church problem receives attention here.

We want Two Hundred new ministerial students to enter next September. We will assist each one in many ways. Scholarships, loan funds, and opportunities that the student appreciates will be available so that he may remain in the college until he is thoroughly prepared for his world task. Last year nearly 1,600 students attended Drake University. This number included 121 ministerial students. We ask 300 to come next year.

The College of Liberal Arts is superior in every respect. Seven hundred and forty-two enrolled last year in this department.

The College of Law enrolls more than One Hundred each year, and is as well situated as any in the country.

The Conservatory of Music is acknowledged to be the peer of any in this country. The teachers are artists of national reputation. Enrollment last year, Five Hundred Twenty-six.

Write for catalogues and particulars concerning any of the departments herein enumerated.

SYSTEM

SUNDAY SCHOOL Workers the nation over have become familiar with the Bethany Graded Lessons. The patronage of these lessons has steadily grown from year to year until many of our most representative schools now use them.

The word "Bethany"--a meaningful word to Disciples, is it not?--has now been enlarged to cover, not the international graded lessons alone (though it still applies to these), but an all-inclusive System of literature for the entire Sunday School.

The Bethany System contains everything you need in your most up-to-date school, and you will find it all spread out before you graphically in our comprehensive order blank and Bulletin.

The Bethany System includes (in addition to the international graded lessons) international uniform lessons for adult classes and the home department, special texts for adult and young people's classes, teacher training courses, and five weekly periodicals—for Primary pupils, for Juniors, for Intermediate boys, for Intermediate girls, and for young people and adults.

This System equips your school from top to bottom.

Why continue to divide your order for supplies among several publishers? It is inconvenient and troublesome in keeping your records. It also adds to the risk of error and delay.

Church Extension Offering Begins Sunday, September 7th

THE FOLLOWING SUPPLIES WILL BE SENT FREE FOR DISTRIBUTION AMONG THE MEMBERS OF YOUR CONGREGATION TO EVERY PREACHER OR CORRESPONDENT ORDERING THEM BY CARD.

1. "Hope and Realization." An illustrated leaflet telling what every Disciple of Christ should know about our Church Extension Work.
2. Collection Envelopes; one should be in the hands of every member of the church previous to day of Annual Offering.
3. Pastoral letters to be ordered only by the pastors.

THE CHURCH EXTENSION OFFERING IS THE LAST OF THE ANNUAL OFFERINGS DURING THIS MISSIONARY YEAR. IT SHOULD BE THE JOY OF EVERY CHURCH TO HELP, BECAUSE—

1. The Board can answer now but one-third of the appeals because of lack of funds.
2. Forty per cent of new churches organized must be helped to build by Church Extension loans.
3. Every preacher knows that he can do no creditable work without proper equipment.
4. Only thirteen out of 1,621 churches aided by Church Extension Loans have failed, which speaks well for the vitality of our Missions.

ARE YOU THINKING OF GOING TO SCHOOL?

Try a Bible College in combination with a great State University. Together we have an equipment worth $3,750,000, and an annual income of $760,000. Do you realize what that means? It insures both equipment and talent. The quantity and quality of work is not surpassed. It is seldom equalled. Over 260 teachers are at your service. Salaries are paid which command the best talent. Yet, tuition is nothing for Missourians, and is only $20 per year for students from elsewhere.

Moreover, the spiritual atmosphere both in schools and in town is of the best. A deep religious spirit results each year in students dedicating themselves to the ministry or to the work of foreign missions.

Is Not This the Lesson?

One of the most remarkable revolutions which the church has known in modern times has taken place in a night, and we have hardly noticed it. Our Christian colleges have been hastening to declare themselves undenominational, and the manner of their doing it is not less remarkable than the comparative absence of protest against the movement. Only when a college, like Vanderbilt University, by declining to join the procession gets into print, is very much said about it. As for the rest, this is the process. A devout Christian community establishes at its heart an institution of learning for the avowed purpose of furnishing Christian education. It collects money from Christian churches, Christian people, and Christian educational societies. No one doubts that it is a Christian college affiliated with a particular denomination. Then of a sudden at a suggestion from Andrew Carnegie it declares that it is not a denominational college at all.

This has happened over and over within the last few years. We are not proposing to discuss it here and now. We want simply to call attention to the occasion which made the sweeping change possible. The reason it happened was this: These institutions had no pension fund for their aged professors.

The colleges had had enough to do without raising pension funds. The problem of living and that of getting a living had been sore ones. There are few things more pathetic than the number of good men broken down in college presidencies, or failing because they were successful in everything but in raising money. The demand for more endowment, for more buildings, and the steady all-the-year-round cry for money for current expenses have given to the Christian colleges a terrible struggle for existence. And they have run a gauntlet between the growing equipment of the high school and the large resources of the state university. We are not condemning the colleges. But we wish to raise this question:

Suppose it were desirable that they should have continued as denominational institutions, was it not manifestly a weak spot in their armor that they had no provision for their superannuated professors?

So far the colleges. Now let us consider the churches. Is there any logical reason why a college professor should be retired at seventy on a pension and a minister thrust out at fifty or sixty without any support? The salary of the average minister is not larger than that on which a professor practices plain living and high thinking. The minister's tenure of office is less secure; his age of enforced retirement averages earlier; he is terribly long-lived. His family shows less sign of race suicide than that of any other man in professional life.

Is there danger of any revolution in the church similar to that which we have seen in the school?

There is danger.

More than that, the revolution is here.

It is keeping desirable young men out of the ministry.

It is removing good men from the ministry in middle life.

Let the Church pension her heroes.

And let her go about it straightway.

It is her next great task.

It is more important, more imperative than any other one great need just now before her.

Let the Church pension her heroes.

Who is to blame for the fact that our aged ministers are cared for in so miserly a fashion?

The laity are to blame. They have not honored as they ought to have honored the men whom they have called to preach the Gospel. They have uttered much cheap nonsense about doing the business of the Church on business principles, and at the same time have talked disparagingly of businesslike efforts to provide for an educated ministry and then to take care of the ministers who are educated. The United States provides free instruction at West Point for its army leaders, and ample pensions for their age, and calls it good business; but the business men of the Church have not had vision concerning either the preparation for the work of the ministry or the care of the aged and disabled.

The clergy are to blame. Ministers have presented the cause of ministerial relief half-heartedly or apologetically, or have neglected it altogether. They are fully as much to blame as are the laymen.

But let us not hurl charges of blame back and forth. There is little to be gained by the pot in calling the kettle black. Our present provision for the support of aged ministers is inadequate—everybody knows it. It is increasingly inadequate, because the conditions of living grow more strenuous and the cost of living is higher. Something ought to be done, and done at once. Let us get at it together, ministers and laymen.

Let the Church pension her heroes!

There are many good causes—yes, but this deserves to be a preferred benevolence.

Take it up in your church this fall, and push the matter.

Let the Church pension her heroes.

The Patriotism of Church Building

Is it patriotic to build churches? Is not Christianity a universal religion? Can it be put into the service of any particular government? Yes, it is a patriotic service to build churches. While Christianity invites all men into its fellowship without distinction of nationality, it adapts itself to the needs of each nation to which it goes. The love of country is a sentiment it encourages. The virtues of Christianity are cultivated by people who have fixed abodes and recognize political obligations. The church is an institution that helps men to live here and now. It interprets and ennobles the common life.

The church builder puts the emphasis in the right place. The agitator who rushes about to warn the people against the growth of "un-American" ideas and customs is too often a common nuisance. He magnifies dangers and creates discord. If he is justly alarmed, he does very little to remove the causes of impending disasters. The unostentatious men and women who build our homes and churches and schools are the real defenders of the nation. They know what is great and what is small. Speakers and writers who know them and their needs may raise the cry of warning and expect to be heard by patriotic people. Whatever gets in the way of the workers needs attention. Ideas that are embodied in homes and churches command respect. If we build institutions that support American ideals, we do not have to cry aloud in order that the world may be compelled to notice our patriotism.

The church imparts a world view which is an essential element in true patriotism. Nations cannot live unto themselves any more than can persons. They must understand each other and respect each other. This they cannot do unless they know the worth of man as man. We are being told repeatedly that the proper business of a government is to take good care of its citizens, that its concern for hogs and cattle and wheat and corn should be a part of its concern for human beings. International justice must be exalted above international trade. Provincialism is not patriotism. If we had the "international mind" which one of our leading educators names as a prerequisite to the peace of the world, it would be easier for us to dispose of the Japanese question and the Mexican question.

We spend enormous sums of money for jails, reformatories, and penitentiaries. These sums would be larger if the churches were out of existence. They would be smaller if the churches were more efficient. We owe much to the students of criminology who are trying to win us to a better view of the purpose of punishment. Our methods are still suggestive of the ways of the barbarian. Much will be gained when we take thought for the offender as well as for the safety of society. But the better way is to quit making criminals. The church is doing and will continue to do a useful service to the state by teaching men to respect each other's rights and to maintain a proper self-respect.

The church is a part of our educational system. It has work to do which the schools cannot do. Its sacred book has been excluded from the schools of more than one state. Yet the man who is unacquainted with the Bible is not educated as he ought to be. He will fail to appreciate many things in English literature and he will be an unsafe interpreter of American life. The church is free to teach the Bible. Instead of bothering itself about the decisions of supreme courts and the acts of constitutional conventions, it should give its attention to the work of teaching. And this we believe it will do. It will moreover impart information concerning its own activities. To be ignorant of what the church is doing is to be ignorant of what ought to be familiar to every one. If men are going to criticise the church, they ought to know a little about it. If they are disposed to help the church, their help will be more wisely given if the church instructs them as to its ideals and works.

If the nation needs the church, it also needs the building in which the church holds its worship and gives instruction. We cannot hope to have a system of education that is adequate unless the teachers and the pupils have a place to meet that gives all possible aid to the learning process. We may temporarily meet under the trees, in halls, in private houses, but for permanent success the church must have its own house. The beauty and convenience of this house are important for knowledge and character. [Midweek Service, Aug. 27. Luke 7:5.]

In Explanation

During the past few months the task of organizing the Disciples Publication Society and securing capital with which to finance it has, in main, fallen to the lot of the editors of The Christian Century. With the foundation work of the Society now approaching completion, it is expected that Mr. Morrison and Dr. Willett will resume direct editorial charge of The Christian Century by September 1, with an enlarged paper and greatly enriched pages.

Was It Kind?

For thirty-six years a man has lived under the shadow of Bunker Hill monument in solitary confinement. When a boy of seventeen he committed several horrible murders. But for his youth he would have been hanged, but it was considered too great a punishment for so young a man.

A great many sentimental people have tried to gain access to him. They have sympathized with his mother. For a long time the officials had one curt and rather pertinent reply to people who out of sympathy for his mother wanted to help the murderer—"Go and sympathize for a while with the mothers of the children he murdered and then come back." It is not on record that any of them came back.

The writer of this editorial has never seen Jesse Pomeroy, but he has been very near him. He has sat in the cell next to that of this notable prisoner, and with only the wall between has been told much about him.

His imprisonment has not made him docile or penitent. He has a determined disposition, and a perpetual complaint. The warden of the prison seldom goes to see him, being weary of his complainings. The only people whom he is supposed to see are the warden, the chaplain, the members of the prison commission, and his necessary guards. The grated door to his cell has a wooden door added, and he does not see people who pass in the corridors.

He was furnished, years ago, with an official copy of the record of his trial and a few law books. He spends his time writing laborious pleas showing that the judge biased the jury by the use of a harsh word—perhaps it was "atrocious." Whatever word it was, it was too mild.

Jesse Pomeroy was a fairly good boy in school, and came from a good home, and his mother every year makes a plea for his release, and now and then tries to send him a file in a banana. He affords little comfort to theorists in eugenics. But he was a monstrous murderer, and the community was not safe with him at large.

What could society do to protect itself against such a boy? Send him to school? He had been sent to school. Teach him a mother's love? He had and has a mother's pitifully steadfast love. Society knew only two terrible things to do in order that it might save its children from his bloody hand—hang him or shut him up for life.

It chose the latter. No prisoner in the United States affords so excellent an example of what society accomplishes when it chooses to imprison a man for life, and then sticks to its choice.

First of all, he has not been corrupted by his prison life. That is something distinctly exceptional. He has seen only good people in prison, being doomed to solitary confinement. By the same token he has corrupted no one. That, too, is exceptionally good. Most bad prisoners are made worse and make others worse in prison.

But he has developed through all the years a spirit of bitter and sullen resentment. He hates the state of Massachusetts which spared his life and feeds him and protects him. Day and night he plots to escape. He refuses to do the slightest stroke of work, though knowing it would be good for him, lest that work should profit the state of Massachusetts. And, as he is legally dead, he is the one prisoner who cannot be compelled to work.

In him America has its most successful example of life imprisonment carried out strictly. Though every year a petition is presented for his pardon, the memory of his horrible crimes still keeps him in confinement. Most murderers would have been pardoned years ago; he still is there.

Society dared not release him; it shrank from hanging him; but has this horrible living death been as kind as hanging would have been?

Whatever his imprisonment has done, it has not made him penitent.

More Men Teachers

The disappearance of men from the teacher's vocation is a serious sign in the educational world. American schools need more men. Blessed as is the influence of women on the development of youth, there comes a time in the life of every boy when he needs to obey men; to shape his ideals through association with men. And it is just as important for every girl to have part of her training under men as it is that every boy should have part of his training under women.

A letter from Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University, with reference to the case of Mrs. Bridget C. Peixotto, the New York school teacher accused of neglect of duty in absenting herself from school to bear a child, has been made public by Thomas W. Churchill, president of the Board of Education. In full it is as follows:

"I have read the paper signed by you on the employment of married women in the public schools, issued from the hall of the Board of Education of New York City, June 19, 1913, and agree in general with its conclusion.

"In my opinion the employment of married women in the schools is not for the interest of the pupils, the teachers or the community as a whole. Furthermore, I believe that it is not for the interest of the community that young women should in practice work as teachers more than five years on the average. Within that time the great majority of normal school graduates can make an ample return for their education at public expense. To this practice there would always be valuable exceptions.

"It follows from these premises that the proportion of male teachers in the public schools should be increased, whatever the necessary cost."

Whatever should be said about the principal question at issue in the letter of Doctor Eliot, the last sentence of his letter is one which deserves most thoughtful attention. We need more manhood in our schools; more manhood in the church; more manhood in the home.

God give us more men, and better men.

Bankruptcy in Antiquity

When archeologists brought to light a few years ago an original tablet containing the code of Hammurabi, the archeological world began anew. The wonder of it has hardly yet entered the modern mind, and the far-reaching results of it are still only conjectural. This discovery seems certain to be supplemented, indeed already to have been supplemented, by the finding of other laws clearly related to that very ancient code. A shattered tablet, upon which are inscribed many of the laws from the code of Hammurabi, was found in the winter of 1901-1902 by M. de Morgan, a French archeologist. It has now been brought to the University of Pennsylvania and deciphered. The inscriptions, it is found, refer to financial transactions, and one of them is said to contain the germ from which sprang practically all the bankruptcy laws of the last four thousand years. The tablet is believed to be a part of the oldest collection of laws and precepts extant. The law relating to bankruptcy provides that, if one borrow grain or money and has neither grain nor money with which to pay back, but movable goods, he shall give whatever he has to the merchant in the presence of witnesses, and the merchant is enjoined from refusing to receive the settlement. Another law deals with interest, and shows that borrowers were required to pay at the rate of twenty per cent. A merchant, however, who charged compound interest was called upon to lose the principal and six times the amount of interest as forfeit. A borrower who had been robbed and had nothing to pay was compelled to go to the temple and take oath to his losses, after which he was given his freedom—a procedure that corresponds to the provisions of modern bankruptcy laws.

It is exceedingly instructive to find how early in human history there was recognition of the principle that under some conditions there must be acceptance of less than the full arithmetical value of a debt. There comes, or may come, a time when it is good public policy to recognize the impossibility of a debtor's discharge of his obligation, and the acceptance of something less than the full cash value. It is hard to adjust this theory to accepted principles of commercial justice, but the principle is accepted, for better or for worse, in laws of most nations.

Sin is not debt; and great harm has been done to clear thinking by forcing commercial ideas into our theology. Yet Jesus taught us to pray, "Forgive us our debts, for we also have forgiven our debtors."

It is not easy to adjust any doctrine of forgiveness to a mathematical conception of the Divine justice. Judged as a problem in commercial arithmetic, the parable of the Prodigal Son does not give the answer in the book. But it gives the answer that God has written in the human heart, and written somewhere in the eternal laws of heaven and earth.

In the justice of both God and man there must be some place for forgiveness.

National Health Insurance in England

The first year of British national health insurance has been completed and a blue book of 660 pages has been issued covering the first annual report. In includes an account of the formation of an insurance fund of nearly $100,000,000, the bringing into insurance of nearly 14,000,000 persons, the constitution and work of 236 insurance committees, the making of regulations and special orders under the act in order to meet the case of insured persons working under a variety of particular conditions. It also includes an account of the work carried out by the 20,000 branches of approved societies in the payment of sickness and maternity benefits to their members, and in performance of other duties under the act. The doctors who at first refused to serve under the act later on agreed to try it out for a three months' period. "It is significant," says the report, "as an indication of the general attitude of the profession, that on the expiration of this period these agreements were voluntarily extended by practically all the doctors who had previously accepted service. On Apr. 14, 18,584 doctors, between 80 and 90 per cent of the total number engaged in industrial practice, were on the panels. It has been found that the better an industry is organized the less likelihood there is of any trouble arising in connection with the act. The most serious obstacles have been found in rural areas. On the whole the commission is satisfied with the manner in which the act has been received.

Siege Guns or Scaffolding

An Episcopal clergyman in Virginia has recently severed his connection with his church in a somewhat spectacular fashion by burning his vestments and prayer-book before the gates of the historic Monticello, the home of Thomas Jefferson, the apostle of the people's political freedom. In explanation of his action, he has issued a manifesto indicting the Episcopal Church in several important particulars.

He charges "that the Episcopal Church is the gentleman's church in general, and in Virginia in particular. It is powerful financially and socially; stupid intellectually, and spiritually dead; that it needs a change of heart; repentance or utter obliteration. It either segregates the poor in missions on the back streets, or relegates them in church to the back pews. In Virginia the Episcopal Church is a mere relic of the old social feudalism, and stands for a dry-rotted conservatism that bars the progress of the kingdom." It is contending, he maintains, with the ritualists about purity of worship when it has lost the spirit of worship. He refers to the prayer-book as "the fetish of a false worship, the idol of the diluted word of God." The final article of this manifesto proclaims the Bible as the sufficient rule of faith and order—as the sufficient guide book and prayer-book for every one that is born of the spirit, which last has something of a familiar sound.

Rightly to estimate the real significance of the action of this brother who has seen fit to discard his ecclesiastical millinery in what some will doubtless consider a rather melodramatic manner, it would be necessary to know something of his previous history. Taking for granted that he is neither one of the erratic or tangential sort, whose eccentricities one denomination is always glad to bequeath to another, nor one who has failed to secure preferment because his estimate of his own abilities has not coincided with that held by his brethren, there still remains an important consideration. What efforts has he made to reform his communion from within?

With what degree of accuracy—making due allowance for rhetoric—he has portrayed the Episcopal Church as it is in Virginia we do not know. Much of what he says is doubtless true. But we are convinced that his description of the Episcopal Church as a whole is far from the truth. While we have no love for stoles and surplices, and, when it comes to high church arrogance and the fatuous change of name controversy, it is difficult for us to use judicial language, on the other hand, a church that could produce a Phillips Brooks and that has in its ranks men of such wide sympathies as Bishop Williams is far from being beyond all help from within.

We are inclined to think that this good brother has taken the easier way. Not indeed that he does not face some hardship as it is. Contempt on the part of those he has left and suspicion on the part of those to whom he goes are part of the price a "come-outer" has to pay. But by far the more difficult task is to accomplish reform from within. That requires patience, self-renunciation, balance, pertinacity. It is a very simple thing to dub bishops a lot of old maids in pants, as this man is said to have done. Such a characterization is rather lacking in imagination, and he may discover in some other denomination that one does not always have to be a bishop to fit that sartorial description.

What he says about the prayer-book and the Bible quite accords with our position, but he may find out that there are thousands of people to whom prayer-books and modern novels are alike anathema, and who claim to believe the Bible from cover to cover; who nevertheless, except for a few passages like the Twenty-third Psalm, know as much about it as they do about the Vedanta and to whom the Bible is as much a fetish as a totem-pole to a savage, and understood as little.

A denomination is like a great cathedral; there is never a time when repairs and restoration are not in order. The one man who need never be out of a job is the religious reformer. It is sometimes necessary to tear down before one begins to build. We have the feeling that, as a rule, the most permanent work of renovation is done by the workmen who have had a life-long familiarity with the building. Now and then, foundations become so insecure, that the only remedy apparently is to withdraw and besiege the walls with cannon-shot until they fall. That, however, should always be the last resort. We fear this good brother took to the siege guns a bit too soon. He should have put his hand to the more difficult task of erecting a scaffolding from within, taking out piece by piece those parts ready to fall away, and it may be that after a lifetime of exacting labor in place of the old a new transept would have begun to appear, devoid of present ugliness, whose symmetry and beauty would have brought fresh inspiration to weary and thirsty seekers after the living God.

A Reporter Who Heard Lincoln Speak

An elderly gentleman walked into the office of Spalding's Commercial College, Chicago, the other day. His step was firm, his eyes bright and his figure straight. He asked to be shown over the college. He used to be an amateur shorthand writer, and his interest in the work had not waned, he said.

He was Henry Binnian, 85 years old, 1006 Haskell avenue, Chicago. And he can still "do seventy words a minute" by the old original Pitman method of shorthand, the method he used to record Lincoln's words sixty years ago, says the Chicago Post.

Mr. Binnian was born in Kidderminster, England. He began work as an apprentice to the printer's trade in the early '40s. His ambition was to be a journalist. He learned the Pitman system of shorthand, which was then just coming into use in England. Isaac Pitman lived 150 miles from Kidderminster.

"In 1852 I came over the water to Peoria, Ill., where my wife had relatives," said Mr. Binnian. "I applied to the editor of a weekly paper in Peoria for a job on my merits as a writer of shorthand. He said he had never heard of shorthand. That was not remarkable. There were but three stenographers in Chicago, and only five in New York at that time. I gave him a specimen of my work as he read the paper aloud to me, and then I asked him if he wouldn't like some political speeches reported.

"Stephen A. Douglas had spoken in Peoria a few days before. Lincoln was to be there that night to answer him.

"The courthouse was packed that night to hear old Abe's answer to the Little Giant. He spoke slowly and distinctly. His high-pitched voice carried easily to all ears in the room. I took down all of that speech and wrote it out that night and the next day in longhand. I told the editor it would make five columns. He said it was too much, and cut it down and ran it in the paper. I never got even a thank you from that editor for my work.

"I thought if a shorthand reporter got no more than that for his work in this country I would go into something else. I have been in the lumber business until I retired a few years ago."

Mr. Binnian watched a red-headed boy type a paragraph on a modern typewriter. The boy made his fingers fly just one minute. When the time was up there were ninety-four words on the sheet and two mistakes, five off for each mistake, making eighty-four words a minute.

"My word," exclaimed the old Englishman, "I wish I had had a machine like that the night I wrote Lincoln's speech for that old editor in Peoria."

Between 6,000 and 7,000 physicians and professors in medical colleges were in London last week for the international medical congress. Every country in the world was represented.

Brewing and distilling interests and the ads of liquor dealers had no place in the woman suffrage edition of the Chicago Examiner, issued recently.

A "Dead Letter" Fight

Back of the announcement that Post-master General Burleson has abolished the annual "dead letter" sale at Washington is the story of a fight which the business men of the capital have waged against this institution for years. Heretofore all undeliverable third and fourth-class mail matter has been assembled at the headquarters of the Postoffice Department, sorted, wrapped in coverings designed to conceal the actual size and character of the various packages, and sold at auction to the highest bidders. These sales invariably were held just before Christmas, and it was to this that the merchants of Washington particularly objected, their theory being that hundreds of dollars which otherwise would have been expended for gifts in the stores were passed over to Uncle Sam in exchange for a "pig in a poke." In reality a "dead letter" sale is a good deal of a lottery, for although a catalogue pretends to give an idea of the contents of each "item," the descriptions of the goods are inadequate. The sales appealed to the gambling instinct of people, and were always largely attended. Hereafter this flotsam and jetsam of the postoffice will be sent to the postoffice of the headquarters of the railway mail service of the division in which the matter is detained. So instead of one annual sale at Washington there will be sales each year in fifteen cities, including Boston. Thus divided the amount of the sale in each city will be small, and Boston merchants doubtless will make no complaint against the practice such as that which has been registered so long, and at last successfully, in Washington.

The wealth of gold and silver and paper money filling the vaults of the federal treasury is due in no small measure to the record breaking drinking, smoking and card playing of the American people during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913. Details of the sources of the $344,424,453 collected in international revenue taxes during the year—the greatest in the history of the country—were disclosed in a recent report to Secretary McAdoo by William H. Osborn, commissioner of internal revenue. The 143,220,000 gallons of whisky and brandy consumed brought in $157,542,000; the 65,246,000 barrels of beer, porter and ale netted the government $65,246,000; the 14,276,771,000 cigarettes smoked increased the revenues by $17,846,000; the 7,699,038,000 cigars puffed benefited Uncle Sam to the extent of $23,097,000; the chewing and smoking of 404, 363,000 pounds of tobacco gave him $32,349,000; taxes on 22,290,000 pounds of snuff amounted to $2,657,000 and the sale of 32,764,155 packs of playing cards, an increase of 1,952,475 over the previous year, brought $655,283.

Robert Bridges' Poetry

Robert Bridges, the new poet laureate, has written no really good poetry but he has produced some undeniably good lines, as the following poem indicates:

I love all beauteous things,
I seek and adore them;
God hath no better praise,
And man in his hasty days
Is honoured for them.

I too will something make
And joy in the making;
Altho' tomorrow it seem
Like the empty words of a dream
Remembered on waking.

I have loved flowers that fade,
Within whose magic tents
Rich hues have marriage made
With sweet unmemoried scents.
A honeymoon delight—
A joy of love at sight,
That ages in an hour—
My song be like a flower!

I have loved airs, that die
Before their charm is writ
Along a liquid sky
Trembling to welcome it.
Notes, that with pulse of fire
Proclaim the spirit's desire,
Then die, and are nowhere;
My song be like an air!

Die, song, die like a breath,
And wither as a bloom;
Fear not a flowery death,
Dread not an airy tomb!
Fly with delight, fly hence!
'Twas thine love's tender sense
To feast; now on thy bier
Beauty shall shed a tear.

From Near and Far

In a bulletin advocating the extension of the school system in federal and state prisons, the United States bureau of education at Washington announced that out of 65 prisons in the United States and Canada reporting to it, 44 maintain classes in which both academic and trade subjects are taught. Dr. A. C. Hill, of the New York state education department, who prepared the bulletin at the request of the bureau, believes the movement will be extended until every correctional institution will afford educational advantages to its involuntary guests. "Schools in prisons," says Dr. Hill, "are the expression of the highest conception yet formed of the best way to deal with men and women segregated from society for violation of its laws. They are an outgrowth of the belief that the door of hope must never be closed to any man." As an economic investment, Dr. Hill contends, society well could afford the schools as a reclaiming agent for those who have fallen under its ban.

The Hague Peace Palace, the $1,500,000 gift of Mr. Andrew Carnegie to the nations of the world, is to be dedicated August 29. Official delegates will probably be sent to the ceremony by all the forty-six civilized nations of the world which were represented at the Second Hague Conference. This ceremony will take place between the meeting of the International Peace Congress at The Hague on August 20 and the Interparliamentary Union Conference early in September. The trustees who have administered the building of the courthouse are the Council of the Parliament Court of Arbitration, consisting of the minister of foreign affairs of The Netherlands and the diplomatic representatives of all the Powers at The Hague. The plans for the palace were obtained by competition in which 216 architects entered.

A receivership for the famous Buffalo Bill show probably means that this season's farewell tour of Buffalo Bill is a real parting between the "truly hero" and the border drama, now an old man, and a public which has been his to command for thirty years. When Buffalo Bill first appeared on the stage, playing himself, he was already a hero to a generation which had grown up on "Ned Buntline's" Indian stories. "Buffalo Bill," while pursuing the vocation of a showman has retained the respect of his fellow citizens as a worthy survivor of a rugged and romantic American type. His enterprise expanded into the Wild West show has undoubtedly been an educational influence. It has been a form of entertainment as wholesome as thrilling.

The International Medical Congress closed recently with a speech by the Right Hon. John Burns, president of the local government board. He said there had been 772,811 less deaths in England and Wales in the years from 1909 to 1911, than if the death rate of two decades earlier had continued. The change, he said, was due to medical science. The next congress is to be held in Munich in 1917. Before adjourning, the doctors passed a resolution declaring: "Experiments on living animals are indispensable." Only one delegate, a woman, voted against the resolution. "Leprosy," according to Major E. R. Rost of the Indian medical service, is curable through the use of serum treatment.

Forty-nine nations have been invited to participate in the Panama-Pacific exposition which opens in San Francisco in February, 1915, and up to a few days ago twenty-seven had officially accepted and eight had declined. The most noteworthy declination came from Great Britain, and numerous American newspapers jumped to the conclusion that this decision was due to British resentment over the action of congress in regard to the Panama tolls question. Sir Edward Grey, the minister of foreign affairs, explained to the house of commons that business, not political reasons, had governed in this decision.

Convinced that the title of their organization, the National Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage, was too lengthy and cumbersome to carry into the fight against "votes for women," members have announced that they would be known hereafter as "Woman Conservationists." The propose to work to offset the possible effect on congress of the meeting last week of the National Council of Women Voters and they are looking forward to a stubborn battle.

The "rainbow flag," emblematic of universal peace, which is to be presented by the state of New York at the dedication of the Temple of Peace at The Hague, where it will be placed in a collection of peace flags contributed by all nations of the world, is now on exhibition in New York. The design of the flag, which is the gift of Andrew Carnegie, consists of a rainbow on a field of blue, surrounded by a broad band of white, bearing the word "Peace." It will be forwarded to The Hague within a few days.

Ninety-four thousand Englishmen came last year to settle in the United States, the Philadelphia Ledger remarks. They were enough to fill 30 Mayflowers. In none of the early years when the British were said by our histories to be "flocking to the shores of America" did so many people leave their mother country as left it in 1912 to sek a home under the stars and stripes.

The Housewives' league of Louisville, Ky., has appointed a committee of 100 which has made several tours of the groceries in behalf of cleanliness and the anti-dirt crusade. Placards, in the nature of certificates of approval, will be given for display in those stores which meet the league's approval and those which do not will receive the unwelcome recognition of the black list.

Deeds transferring the old Buckman Tavern at Lexington, Mass., to the town have been placed on record. The old landmark, situated on the edge of the village green, was the gathering place of the Minute Men of the Revolution on the morning of the battle. Embedded in the walls are the bullets fired by the British soldiery.

A campaign to reduce the death rate resulting from contagious disease and imperfect traffic regulations will form a part of the women voters' political activities in the fall, according to the statement made by Mrs. Harriette Taylor Treadwell, president of the Chicago Political Equality League.

It is reported that the Russians have decided to start a steamship service between Vladivostok, Vancouver, Seattle and Tacoma. Later San Francisco will be included, while eventually it will be a round the world service via the Panama canal. There will be one sailing every six weeks.

The child welfare bureau maintained by the Oregon mothers' congress in the courthouse at Portland has made such a place for itself that the state fair officials have appropriated $1,000 for an exhibit in eugenics and child welfare, to be arranged for their enterprise in the fall.

The ten-day conference of the Missionary Education Movement, which closed recently at Lake Geneva, has been better attended than any other of the conferences held in former years, according to the reports. Rev. J. M. Stifler, of Evanston, Ill., presided over its sessions.

The St. Louis city council has passed an ordinance forbidding tips in hotels or restaurants, under penalty of a fine of from $10 to $50 for each offense. The interesting thing about the anti-tipping ordinance is not that it is an attempt to stop tipping by law, but that it originated in the desire of the waiters themselves.

Illinois has not been deprived of the distinction of being the largest producer of internal revenue of any of the states of the Union. The report of the commissioner of internal revenue, just made public, shows that the state is still the leader in this respect.

Franklin College, Franklin, Ind., after months of devout and courageous effort, has completed the task of raising $200,000, and there was accordingly a jubilant celebration in the community. Of this sum the General Education Board furnished $50,000.

Pennsylvania has joined the moderate eugenists with a new marriage law, prohibiting the issuance of licenses to imbeciles, epileptics, or feeble-minded, or to inmates or former inmates of county asylums or poorhouses, with some exceptions.

The house of commons, England, by a vote of 210 to 138, approved the government agreement giving to the Marconi company a contract for the creation of an imperial chain of wireless telegraph stations circling the world.

Miss Margaret E. Knight is the first American woman to receive a patent for an invention. She secured it at the age of 12 and is still at work after 62 years, now experimenting with a sleeve valve engine.

Paraguay, through Minister Hector Velazquez, has accepted in the main, Secretary Bryan's peace plan. Thirty-nine nations were asked to consider the proposal and twenty-eight have accepted it in principle.

St. Louis has wisely passed an ordinance prohibiting professional fortune tellers, necromancers, clairvoyants, spirit mediums, trance mediums, seers, and prophets from plying their nefarious business.

The peace treaty among the Balkan states was signed August 11, at Bucharest. In honor of the occasion the city was decorated with flags, guns were fired, bells were rung and bands played.

For the Judson Centennial

Then and Now in Burma—A Century of Great Contrasts

By H. H. Tilbe, of Rangoon

"HO, TO RANGOON!"—a limited number of favored ones are crying, while a far larger number with intense interest are awaiting reports of what will be done there and what impressions will be received in those December meetings inaugurating the great Judson celebrations.

The first impressions of our visitors on landing will be a mixture of delight and disappointment—something there will be of magic and romance, but far more of the disillusioning of prosaic fact. Many of the same localities will be visited to which Judson went a hundred years ago; but how different in almost every feature and circumstance! Practically nothing will seem or really be as Judson saw it. The contrast between then and now in the physical features of Rangoon itself furnishes a splendid illustration of the wonderful changes that have taken place in all things during the century since the Judsons went ashore there, in the evening of that memorable thirteenth of July, 1813, and received their first impressions of the town and its inhabitants.

ADONIRAM JUDSON.

In Rangoon.

Arriving at Rangoon our visitors will find a modern occidental city with great blocks of four- and five-storied business houses built of steel, masonry, and reinforced concrete; with straight streets and broad, shaded avenues of macadam, asphalt and concrete, crowded with vehicles of every description, including automobiles and motorcycles; with electric street-cars, electric lighting and electric power; with beautiful public gardens and large, well-laid-out private compounds; with splendid buildings, both public and private, for government, business and residential purposes, besides Christian church buildings, the spires of which, next to beautiful Shwe Dagon, are the most prominent landmarks within the city.

Rangoon is one of the busiest marts in the Far East, being the main port for a large and prosperous country, with its splendid wharfs and docks on either side of the river-harbor accommodating a mass of modern shipping. This shipping from almost every known harbor in the world is constantly bringing in a tremendous tonnage of imports and carrying away an even larger tonnage of exports; for, besides her large exports of teek and other valuable woods and her considerable exports of other commodities, Rangoon is the greatest rice-shipping port in the world. There are many huge mills on the river, both above and below the harbor, where timber is prepared and rice is milled for local and foreign markets. An extensive railroad service and a fine river-steamer service, both providing good and comfortable transportation facilities, have headquarters in the down-town business portions of the city.

Practically every necessity or comfort of life, every convenience of time- or labor-saving device, nearly every luxury of modern civilization can be had at rates little advanced over those of London, New York, Berlin, or Paris.

Charity organizations, asylums, dispensaries, and the largest and best equipped hospital in the Far East relieve suffering and care for the unfortunate, while private, government, and mission schools provide modern western education for the many hundreds of pupils attending them, and several libraries add further educational facilities.

The first impressions of the Judsons were far different from all this. Not really disembarking till the next day, they returned, after a brief, disheartening view, to spend one more night aboard the ship, far more discouraged than they had yet been in all the strange experiences and difficulties through which they had already passed. On landing they found an ugly, squalid delta town of Burma, the largest and best town on the Burman coast, it is true, with a few better houses and a larger, finer pagoda than would have been found in the ordinary towns and villages along the tidal creeks of the delta, but otherwise not different; and it was the worst season of the year to see the place. The majority of the houses were mere bamboo-and-thatch huts built along narrow, crooked, muddy lanes that were without wheeled traffic of any sort and practically impassable for foot passengers except by the high foot-ways built of piles and planks or of brickwork, as works of merit, by the more pious and earnest Buddhists. There was no drainage or attempt of any kind at sanitation, while the site of most of the town was below high-tide level with malarious swamps at both ends and at the back, whose foul waters and filthy scum were never dried up. There were tidal creeks, too, running up into the heart of the town and depositing twice a day their tidal slime. Ponies, cattle, pigs and ducks stabled under the huts, built high on posts to raise them above the water, mud and filth, while chickens and pariah curs went in and out of the dwellings at will, housing with the inhabitants.

The whole place was in utter darkness from a little after sunset till a little before sunrise and was never safe from robbers and other bad characters, day or night, while dangerous wild beasts and poisonous reptiles infested the outskirts and were frequently found within the town itself. General merchants stored their wares in their dwelling houses and sold them from their front rooms or verandahs, but daily marketing was hawked about from house to house or sold in open-air bazaars on the higher ridges and knolls of waste places in the town. Except glittering, gilded Shwe Dagon, marred by the usual clutter of grotesque and decaying debris, there was not an imposing building of any kind in the place.

The sick and suffering were left to private charity or wandered about the town and frequented the pagoda platforms in hordes of importunate and often hideous beggars, lifting sightless eyes, displaying maimed and shriveled limbs, or thrusting their foul diseases and loathsome leprosies under the eye of every passerby to awaken sympathy and win charity.

It was the headquarters for a considerable local and inland trade but there was little foreign commerce and no great milling or other local industry. Only native Burman food and clothing could be had, only such things of any kind as the Burmans used in their own homes and business; practically nothing demanded by the customs or the more delicate and refined tastes of European civilization was available by purchase or exchange. Every foreigner who came to the place suffered for what to him were actual necessities of life.

IMMANUEL BAPTIST CHURCH BUILDING, RANGOON.

The Lack of Efficient Government.

The contrast between then and now in governmental conditions and activities is even more marked than that in the physical features of Rangoon town.

Then an oriental despot at Ava ruled the land and his favorite minions "ate" the districts into which it was divided and farmed out to them. Intrigue and favoritism were the motive powers at court; cruel injustice the rule in the provinces. Successful crime was not often punished; patient virtue and industry were never safe from extortions of forced bribery or unjust fines. Prosperity always invited hostile attack and neither property nor life was secure in any part of the realm. A fertile field, a fruitful garden, a valuable animal might bring an innocent owner into trouble at court through denunciation by an envious neighbor or a grasping official; while the possession of a beautiful and virtuous wife or daughter was well nigh certain to put a man at the mercy of some lustful official, or a favorite menial of his, who had the power as well as the disposition to compass his ends by the imprisonment or even the death, if need be, of a troublesome guardian of such virtuous beauty. The ordinary Burman of that day was mild and kindly in disposition, as he has ever been, and far more inclined to do a favor than an injury; but the officials as a class and their debauched soldiery were vicious and brutal in the extreme, recognizing no rights to property they dared to appropriate, caring nothing for human life that stood in the way of their desires.

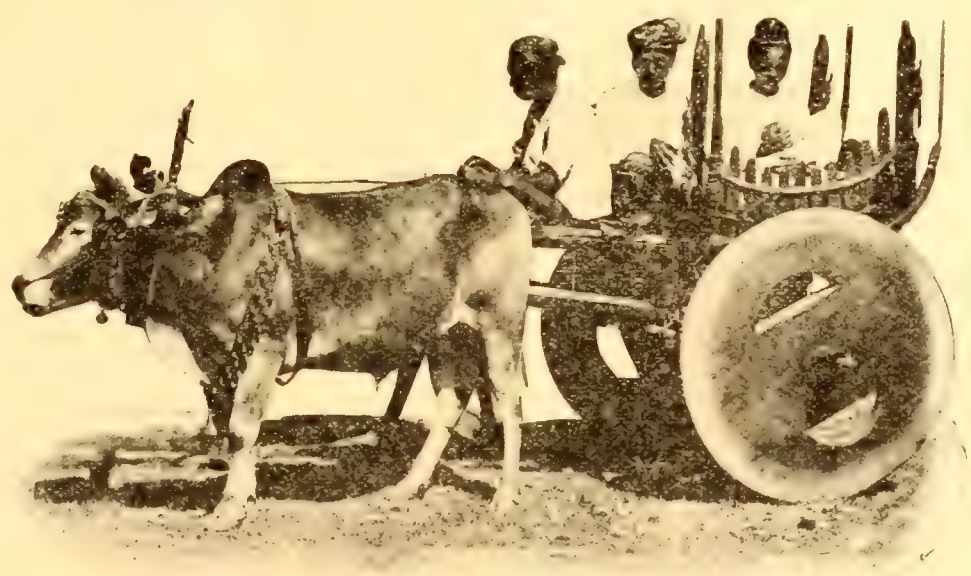
Changes for the Better.

Now the whole country is under settled and righteous law administered through officials bound under the adamantine limitations of British rule, the beneficent sway of which has established not only safety and peace but also even-handed justice in every village and hamlet, no matter how remote — the higher the official, the more careful he is to be clean of hand and righteous of intention in every judgment rendered. Laudable ambition has every governmental encouragement, ability and energy are incited to the highest prosperity, and everywhere the natural rewards of virtue, industry and thrift are assured to the patient well-doer in every honest craft and calling. So clearly manifest, so widely known, so indisputable is all this that no native Burman has ever arisen to impugn the intentional equity of British rule or to call in question the actual peace and prosperity ever and everywhere enjoyed under its sway.



The Means of Transportation in Judson's Day.

But the British government has not only assured safety and justice; it has cared for and furthered other important interests of the people of the land.

Communication between all parts of the country, even the most remote, has been made both easy and inexpensive by the splendid postal and telegraph services of the government, which, though at less cost to the user, are superior in some ways to the postal and telegraph services with which we in the United States are served.

In transportation facilities the country is well provided and new needs are constantly being met. Besides good and satisfactory lines of coast and river steamer service by encouraged private companies, the government itself has built several different but connected lines of railroad, opening up vast tracts of country and making it possible to transport passengers and freight quickly, safely and at small cost to most of the important points in all parts of the land—many of which points were formerly practically inaccessible or at least prohibitive in the danger and cost of transportation.

Town and municipal development has been aided and wisely directed. In a land where nothing of the sort had ever before been attempted or even ever dreamed of, the results attained have been little short of marvelous. The larger towns have been organized into self-supporting and self-directing municipalities and then aided and directed by the general government in all those activities of modern civilization that minister to the comfort, the safety and the health of urban populations. Besides all this, scores of towns and larger villages, too small or too backward for independent municipal government, have been taken in hand directly by the general government and laid out in regular order according to stringent site and building rules; have been made sanitary and required to maintain good sanitation; have been given free hospitals, free dispensaries, and efficient medical attendance; have had public bazaars built and permanently inspected; have been provided with sufficient and suitable public buildings and with good roads throughout, well-made, well-drained, bridged and macadamed; and have then been placed under responsible officials whose business it is to keep them up and constantly improve them.

Cushing Memorial Rangoon Baptist College.

Government-made roads kept in good repair, totaling many hundreds of miles, lie outside of such municipalities and towns, radiating from each such place several miles in every direction to provide quick and easy access to the town by the surrounding peoples and extending in trunk lines from place to place throughout the land so as to connect the more important points.

All natural resources of the country are owned and conserved by the general government, as ought always to be the case, and, while the government itself has carried on a careful and wise exploitation of these resources or has leased the privileges of such exploitation under its own supervision to responsible private companies, wanton destruction and useless waste are always guarded against and both natural and artificial renewal as well as increased development are carefully cultivated.

Natural Resources Conserved.

The country is peculiarly rich as an agricultural province and hitherto its products have been most largely from the land. The government is wisely, therefore, interesting itself in all sane and efficient movements for conserving and developing agricultural resources. Recovery of waste lands; irrigation; care and development of soils; wider diversity and rotation of crops in certain districts; improvement and greater variety in the same families of standard crops through imported or more carefully developed seed; improvement in breed and larger diversity in kinds of domestic animals; practical knowledge of insect pests and of destructive diseases among both crops and animals as well as of preventative and remedial measures for combating them; agricultural societies for mutual help and information; agricultural cooperative banks under government supervision for safe low-interest loans for developing and moving annual crops—in all of these the government is actively aiding, teaching, encouraging and is beginning to win a response that augurs well for the future.

Educational Progress.

The government has been active, too, in general education. Through the British system of grant-in-aid, thousands of private and religious schools have been brought into connection with the Government Education Department in addition to a large number of municipal and government schools directly controlled by that department. In this way primary schools are scattered widely through the towns and villages and even in many jungle places, secondary schools are found in most of the important municipalities throughout the country, and two well-equipped colleges in Rangoon complete the system. Many thousands of children and youth are studying in these government-directed schools, securing education according to western methods, and being fitted for that broader, more strenuous life which contact with the rest of the world is bringing to the whole of the Far East. No other activity of government, perhaps, has ever been so successful and so popular with the mass of the people; certainly no other has accomplished what promises so much for the stability and prosperity of the country.

Growing out of this change in governmental conditions and directly dependent on it is the equally great contrast in the influx of foreign population, in the bulk of foreign imports and exports, and in the number and extent of important local business activities.

In Judson's day there were few foreigners, even of other eastern peoples, anywhere in the land except at Ava and Rangoon, and even at those two centers they were not numerous enough to make a really appreciable proportion of the whole population. Now Rangoon is one of the most cosmopolitan of the world's great cities, having representatives from the inhabitants of almost every land on the globe. The representation from some of the eastern peoples is large, indeed, that from the Indians and from the Chinese outnumbering the native Burman population. Other peoples, too, especially the Europeans and the ever more important Eurasian element, form a large percentage of the whole population and are constantly increasing in numbers and consequence. These foreigners, too, have brought in their own costumes, customs, and architecture, so that the place is no longer in any real sense a true Burman town. In the same way foreigners and foreign conditions have gone largely into all the more important towns and municipalities, have penetrated into many villages, and are found to some extent even in remote jungle places.

Economic Progress.

The building up and development of foreign commerce, in both imports and exports, has been even more wonderful and the amount of sea-borne trade now centering in Rangoon, Bassein, and the ports on the Tenasserim and Arracan coasts is truly enormous. The amount of such trade at the time of Judson's arrival was petty indeed.

In the same way the great local business activities—in merchandise, in rice-milling, in logging and timber-milling, in the production and refining of oil, in cotton-ginning, in mining, and in transportation—have all been built up from practically nothing since the British occupation. There is only one regret in connection with all this wonderful development in the business activities of the land and that is the fact that the native Burman has had so small a share in it all, leaving it practically entirely to incoming foreigners from Europe, from India, and from China. Though the Burman is a natural petty trader, he has never been moved by any great commercial ambition or shared in the establishment and development of any gigantic business.

Missionary Progress.

The greatest contrast of all between then and now is that in the conditions and results of missionary activities.

Then the attitude of the Burman toward the Christian missionary was one of curiosity, suspicion, and contempt. A kalapyu or white foreigner in a land where the few foreigners ever met with were brown or black men from the neighboring countries, his white skin, his peculiar costume, and the unfamiliar customs of his western civilization made the missionary appear strange and grotesque, an object of suspicion and ridicule. To the great mass of the people he was simply an interesting show, a strange creature from a distant and unknown country. To the more thoughtful and cautious, however, he was also an object of suspicion. What was he there for anyhow? With no business connected with money-making, seeking no open material advantages, he was easily suspected of harboring secret and sinister intentions, especially as he was quietly teaching new and strange doctrines subversive of the national religion and of customs universally practiced and revered. Moreover, the Burmans knew of the rise and progress of the power of the East India Company across the bay and had had some unpleasant local experiences of their own with Portuguese and others. To the prosperous and powerful among the upper classes of the people, he was an object of ridicule and contempt. Their haughty oriental pride, as ever, would despise the strange and unknown, would ignore qualities and abilities that were never displayed conspicuously and were never blatant. Today this attitude is absolutely changed. In every part of the land constant and long-continued familiarity with the white man as official, as merchant, as missionary and teacher, has given a truer conception of his character and awakened confidence and respect, continually enhanced by oft-repeated comparisons of him with the eastern peoples among whom he lives and works. In this confidence and respect the missionary is held preëminent by all because of his teaching and practice of a clean, honest, temperate, chaste life; because of his unselfish devotion to those among whom he labors, helping them with instruction, advice, medicines, personal service, and even pecuniary aid in cases of urgent need; and because he is a religious teacher, like the best among their own monks, giving his whole life to religious propaganda, while, unlike them, he never seeks or receives in return aught of personal support or benefit from them.

Religious Changes.

In his attitude toward his native Buddhism, too, the Burman has changed tremendously, and now occupies a materially different position. Instead of the old-time active and unquestioning maintenance of all teachings of the Pali scriptures, he now frankly repudiates the whole of their cosmogony and cosmography and is seriously skeptical of much else, while his critical acceptance of other tenets and his adaptation of them to the western ideas and the Christian doctrines he has imbibed makes modern belief in Buddhism far different from what it was a century ago and far easier for the missionary to meet. Moreover, there are few even among the most intelligent of Burmans today who are familiar with the text and understand the import of the Pali scriptures as the mass of Burman men were familiar and understood them in the days of the earlier missionaries.
